If the Common-wealth impose a Tax upon the Body, it is [72]understood to be layd upon[72] every Member proportionably to his particular adventure[w] in the Company. For [73]there is in this case[73] no other common stock, but what is [74]made of their particular adventures.[74]

If a Mulct[x] be layd upon the Body for some unlawfull act, they only are lyable by whose votes the act was decreed, or by whose assistance it was executed; for in none of the rest is there any [75]other crime but being of the Body; which if[75] a crime, (because the Body was ordeyned by the authority of the Common-wealth,) °is not his.°

If one of the Members be indebted to the Body, [76]he may[76] be sued by the Body; but his goods cannot be taken, nor his person imprisoned by the authority of the Body; but only by Authority of the Common-wealth: for [77]if they can doe it by their own Authority, they can by their own Authority give judgement that the debt is due; which is as much as to be Judge in their own Cause.[77]

be [87]propounded, nor debated[87] by them, the Body is dissolved. For if they [88]were the absolute Representative of the people, then were it the Soveraign Assembly;[88] and so there would be two Soveraign [89]Assemblies, or two Soveraigns,[89] over the same people; which cannot consist with their [90]Peace. And therefore where there is once a Soveraignty, there can be no absolute Representation of the people, but by it. And for the limits of how farre such a Body shall represent the whole People, they are set forth[90] in the Writing by which they were sent for. For the People cannot choose their Deputies to other intent, than is in the Writing directed to them from their [91]Soveraign[91] expressed.

A Regular Private Body, Lawfull, as a Family.

Private Bodies Regular, and Lawfull, are those that are constituted without Letters, or [92]other written Authority,[92] saving the Lawes common to all [93]other Subjects. And because they be united in one Person Representative, they are held for[93] Regular; such as are all Families, in which the Father, [94]or Master ordereth the whole Family. For he obligeth his Children, and Servants, as farre as the Law permitteth, though not further, because none of them are bound to obedience in those actions, which the Law hath forbidden to be done. In all other actions, during the time they are under domestique government, they are subject to their Fathers, and Masters, as to their immediate Soveraigns. For the Father, and Master being before the Institution of Common-wealth, absolute Soveraigns in their own Families, they lose afterward no more of their Authority, than the Law of the Common-wealth taketh from them.[94]

Private Bodies Regular, but Unlawfull.

Private Bodies Regular, but Unlawfull, are those that [95] unite themselves into one person °Representative,° without any publique Authority at all; such as are the Corporations of Beggars, [96]Theeves and Gipsies,[96] the better to order their trade of begging, and stealing; and the Corporations [97]of men, that by Authority from any forraign Person, unite themselves in anothers Dominion, for the easier[97] propagation of Doctrines, and for making a party, against the [98] Power of the Common-wealth.

Systemes Irregular, such as are Private Leagues

Irregular Systemes, in their nature, but Leagues, or sometimes meer concourse of people (without °union to° any particular designe, by obligation of one to another) proceeding onely from a similitude of wills and [99]inclinations, become[99] Lawfull, or Unlawfull, according to the lawfulnesse, or unlawfulnesse of every particular mans designe therein: And his designe is to be understood by the occasion.

The Leagues of [100]Subjects,[100] (because Leagues are commonly made for mutuall defence,) are in a Common-wealth (which is [101]no more than a League of all the Subjects together) for the most part unnecessary, and savour of unlawfull designe;[101] and are for that cause Unlawfull, [122] and go commonly by the name of Factions, or Conspiracies. For [102]a League being a connexion of men by Covenants, if there be no power given to any one Man, or Assembly (as in the condition of meer Nature) to compell them to performance, is so long onely valid, as there ariseth no just cause of distrust: and therefore Leagues between Common-wealths, over whom there is no humane Power established, to keep them all in awe, are not onely lawfull, but also profitable for the time they last. But Leagues of the Subjects of one and the same Common-wealth, where every one may obtain his right by means of the Soveraign Power, are unnecessary to the maintaining of Peace and Justice, and (in case the designe of them be evill, or Unknown to the Common-wealth) unlawfull. For all uniting of strength by private men, is, if for evill intent, unjust; if for intent unknown, dangerous to the Publique,[102] and unjustly concealed.

Secret Cabals.

If the Soveraign Power be in a great Assembly, and a °number of men,° part of the Assembly, without [103]authority, consult a part,[y] to contrive the guidance of the rest;[103] This is a Faction, or [104]Conspiracy unlawfull, as being a fraudulent seducing of the Assembly for their particular interest. But if he, whose private interest is to be debated, and judged in the Assembly, make as many friends as he can; in him it is no Injustice; because in this case he is no part of the Assembly. And though he hire such friends with mony, (unlesse there be an expresse Law against it,) yet it is not Injustice. For sometimes, (as mens manners are,) Justice cannot be had without mony; and every man may think his own cause just, till it be heard, and judged.[104]

Feuds of private Families.

In all Common-wealths, if a [105]private man entertain more servants, than the government of his estate, and lawfull employment he has for them requires,[105] it is Faction, and unlawfull. For having the protection of the Common-wealth, [106] he needeth not °the defence of° private force. °And whereas in Nations not throughly[z] civilized, severall numerous Families have lived in continuall hostility, and invaded one another with private force; yet it is evident enough, that they have done unjustly; or else that they had no Common-wealth.°

Concourse of people, is [107]an Irregular Systeme,[107] the lawfulnesse, or unlawfulesse, whereof dependeth on [108]the occasion, and on the number of them that are assembled.[108] If the occasion be lawfull, and manifest, the Concourse is lawfull; as the usuall meeting of men at [109]Church,[109] or at a publique Shew, in usuall numbers: for if the numbers be extraordinarily great, [110]the occasion is not evident; and consequently he that cannot render a particular and good account of his being amongst them, is to be judged conscious of an unlawfull, and tumultuous designe. It may be lawfull for a thousand men, to joyn in a Petition to be delivered to a Judge, or Magistrate; yet if a thousand [123] men come to present it, it is a tumultuous Assembly;[110] because there needs but one or two for that purpose. But °in such cases as these,° it is not a set number that makes the Assembly Unlawfull, but [111] such a number, as the present Officers are not able to suppresse, [112]and bring to Justice.[112]

When [113] an unusuall number of men, assemble [114] against a man whom they accuse; the Assembly is an Unlawfull [115]tumult;[115] because they may deliver their accusation °to the Magistrate° by a few, or by one man. Such was the [116]case of St. Paul at Ephesus; where Demetrius, and a great number of other men, brought two of Pauls companions before the Magistrate, saying with one Voyce,[116] Great is Diana of the Ephesians;[aa] °which was their way of demanding Justice against them for teaching the people such doctrine, as was against their Religion, and Trade.° The occasion here, considering the Lawes of that People, was just; yet was their Assembly °Judged° Unlawfull, and the Magistrate reprehended them for it, °in these words,° * If Demetrius and the other work-men [117]can accuse any man, of any thing,[117] there be Pleas, and Deputies, let them accuse one another. And if you have any other thing to demand, your case may be judged in an Assembly Lawfully called. For we are in danger to be accused for this dayes sedition, because, there is no cause by which any man can render any reason of this Concourse of People. °Where he calleth an Assembly, whereof men can give no just account, a Sedition, and such as they could not answer for.° And this is all I shall say concerning Systemes, °and Assemblyes of People,° which may be compared °(as I said,)° to the Similar[ac] parts of mans Body; such as be Lawfull, to the Muscles; such as are Unlawfull, to Wens,[ad] Biles,[ae] and Apostemes,[af] engendred by the unnaturall conflux[ag] of evill humours.

Concursus Populi Systema est, sed Irregulare, quia sine Personae unitate. Licitum autem vel Illicitum est, prout causa concurrendi Licita vel concurrentium numerus Civitati periculosus est. Si causa justa & cognita sit, concursus Licitus est; qualis est concursus hominum ad Pompas, & ad Theatrum numero non insolito. Nam si numerus solito insigniter major sit is qui causam legitimam, quare multitudini tantae interfuit reddere non potest Consilii seditiosi conscius judicabitur. Ut cum mille homines Magistratui vel Iudici supplicationem offerant, Lex fortasse civilis nulla prohibet, concursus tamen ille tumultus est seditiosus, quia per unum vel duos homines idem fieri potuit. Multitudo autem quae concursum illicitum reddit, non numero certo definitur, sed tanta videri debet, quantam, si opus est, publici Ministri consueti superare sine periculo non possunt. Similiter si numerus hominum insolitus ad Tribunal concurrunt, alicujus hominis accusandi causa; concursus ille Illicitus est, quia paucis vel unico homine accusare illum potuerunt. Talis in Epheso erat concursus contra Discipulos, infidelium clamantium, Magna est Diana Ephesiorum.[aa] Ubi causa (consideratis Civitatis illius legibus) justa erat; concursus tamen illegitimus fuit & à Magistratu reprehensus. *Quod si Demetrius & qui cum eo sunt artifices; negotium habent cum aliquo, agitur forum, & Proconsules adsunt, alii alios postulanto. CHAP. XXIII.

Of the PUBLIQUE MINISTERS of Soveraign Power.

°In the last Chapter I have spoken of the Similar[a] parts of a Common-wealth: In this I shall speak of the parts Organicall,[b] which are Publique Ministers.°

Publique Minister Who.

A PUBLIQUE MINISTER, is he, that by the [1]Soveraign, (whether a Monarch, or an Assembly,) is employed in any affaires, with Authority to represent in that employment,[1] the Person of the Common-wealth. And whereas every man, °or assembly° that hath Soveraignty, [2]representeth[2] two Persons, or (as the °more° common phrase is) has two Capacities, one Naturall, and another Politique, °(as a Monarch, hath the person not onely of the Common-wealth, but also of a man; and a Soveraign Assembly hath the Person not onely of the Common-wealth, but also of the Assembly);° they that be servants to them in their naturall Capacity, are not Publique Ministers; but those onely that serve them in the Administration of [124] the Publique businesse. And therefore neither Ushers, nor [3]Sergeants,[3] nor other Officers that waite on the Assembly, for no other purpose, but for the commodity[c] of the men assembled, [4]in an Aristocracy, or Democracy; nor Stewards, Chamberlains, Cofferers,[d] or any other Officers of the houshold of a Monarch, are Publique Ministers in a Monarchy.[4]

Ministers for the generall Administration.

Of Publique Ministers, some have charge committed to them of °a generall Administration, either of° the whole Dominion, [5]or of a part thereof. Of the whole, as to a Protector, or Regent, may bee committed by the Predecessor of an Infant King, during his minority,[5] the whole Administration of his Kingdome. In which case, every [6]Subject is so far obliged to obedience, as the Ordinances he shall make, and the commands he shall give be in the[6] Kings name, and not inconsistent with his Soveraigne Power. [7]Of a part, or[7] Province; as when either a Monarch, or a Soveraign Assembly, shall give [8]the generall charge thereof to a Governour,[8] Lieutenant, Praefect or Vice-Roy: And in this case also, every one of that Province, is obliged to all he shall

CAPVT XXIII.

De Potestatis Summae Ministris Publicis.

Minister Publicus is est qui in rebus, quae ad Civitatem pertinent per Authoritatem Summam habentis Potestatem, Civitatis Personam repraesentat. Quoniam autem, qui Summo loco Imperat, Personas duas gerit, sive (ut loquuntur multi) duas habet Capacitates, aliam Naturalem aliam Politicam; ille qui Summam habenti Potestatem Minister est ut Personae Naturali, Minister Publicus non est. Qui vero Minister ejusdem est in Administratione Rei Publicae, ille Minister Publicus est. Ianitores ergo Nuntii, aliique Ministri qui inserviunt Coetui Summo, propter nihil aliud praeter commoditatem ipsorum qui congregati sunt, Ministri Publici non sunt. Idem de Servis & Famulis domesticis Monarchae, in Persona naturali considerati, dicendum est.

Ministrorum Publicorum aliquibus totius Dominii administrandi cura committitur; ut quando Protectori Monarchae Infantis ab Antecessore suo, committitur Tutela cum tota Regni administratione. Quando id fit, Civis unusquisque illi obedire obligatur, & Imperata ejus facere, quatenus in Regis Infantis nomine imperabitur, & quatenus imperata ipsa Potestati Summae Infantis non repugnabunt. Ministris aliquibus Provinciae tantùm committitur administratio; ut quando Monarcha vel Coetus Summus, Provinciae alicujus Praefectum, Locum tenentem, vel Pro-regem facit. Quod cum fit un-

[9]doe[9] in the name of the Soveraign, and that not incompatible with the Soveraigns Right. For such [10]Protectors, Vice-Roys, and Governors,[10] have no other right, but what depends on the Soveraigns Will; °and no Commission that can be given them, can be interpreted for a Declaration of the will to transferre the Soveraignty, without expresse and perspicuous words to that purpose.° And this kind of Publique Ministers resembleth the Nerves, and Tendons that move the severall limbs of a [11]body naturall.[11]

For speciall Administration, as for Oeconomy.

Others have °speciall Administration; that is to say,° charges of some speciall businesse, either at home, or abroad: As at home, [12]First, for the Oeconomy of a Common-wealth, They that have Authority concerning the Treasure, as Tributes, Impositions, Rents, Fines, or whatsoever publique revenue, to collect, receive, issue, or take the Accounts thereof, are Publique Ministers: Ministers, because they serve the Person Representative, and can doe nothing against his Command, nor without his Authority: Publique, because they serve him in his Politicall Capacity.[12]

Secondly, they that have [13]Authority concerning the Militia; to have[13] the custody of Armes, Forts, Ports; [14] to Levy, Pay, or Conduct[e] Souldiers; or to provide for any necessary thing for the use of war, either by Land or Sea, are publique Ministers. But a Souldier °without Command,° though he fight for the Common-wealth, does not [15]therefore represent the Person of it; because there is none to represent it to. For every one that hath command, represents it to them only whom he commandeth.[15]

For instruction of the People.

They also that have [16]authority to teach, or to enable others to teach the people their duty to the Soveraign Power, and instruct them in the knowledge of what is just, and unjust, thereby to render them more apt to live in godlinesse, and in peace amongst themselves, and resist the publique enemy, are Publique Ministers: Ministers, in that they doe it not by their own Authority, but by anothers; and Publique, because they doe it (or should doe it) by [125] no Authority, but that of the Soveraign.[16] The Monarch, or the Soveraign Assembly only hath immediate Authority from God, to teach and instruct the people; [17]and no man but the Soveraign, receiveth his power Dei gratiâ[f] simply; that is to say, from the favour of none but God: All other, receive theirs from the favour and providence of God, and their Soveraigns; as in a Monarchy[17] Dei gratiâ & Regis;[g] or Dei providentiâ & voluntate Regis[18].[h]

Ejusmodi enim Ministri Ius nullum habent, quod non dependeat à voluntate Summae Potestatis. Hujusmodi autem Ministri Publici Nervis Tendinibusque, quibus corporis humani moventur artus, comparari possunt.

[9] command [10] ministers [11] human body.

[12] there is a public minister for the economy of the commonwealth, a treasurer, to whom authority has been given by the sovereign power to receive, keep, and make payments from the revenues of the commonwealth, and who is charged with the rendering of accounts of the revenues. He is a public minister, by virtue of the fact that he serves the sovereign power as it is the person of the commonwealth.

[17] as they alone are said to teach and command Dei gratia[f] simply. But a minister receives his power of teaching immediately from the sovereign power, although he also receives it mediately from God. Therefore he has his power [18] ^ vel Civitatis [or of the commonwealth]

For Judicature. They also to whom Jurisdiction is given[19], are Publique Ministers. For in their Seats of Justice they represent the person of the Soveraign; and their Sentence, is [20]his Sentence;[20] For (as hath been before declared) all Judicature is °essentially° annexed to the Soveraignty; and therefore [21]all other Judges are but Ministers of him, or them that have the Soveraign Power. And as Controversies[21] are of two sorts, namely of Fact, and of Law; so [22]are Judgements, some of Fact, some of Law: And consequently in the same controversie, there may be two Judges, one of Fact, another of Law.[22]

°And in both these controversies, there may arise a controversie between the party Judged, and the Judge; which because they be both Subjects to the Soveraign, ought in Equity to be Judged by men agreed on by consent of both; for no man can be Judge in his own cause. But the Soveraign is already agreed on for Judge by them both, and is therefore either to heare the Cause, and determine it himself, or appoint for Judge such as they shall both agree on. And this agreement is then understood to be made between them divers wayes; as first, if the Defendant be allowed to except against[i] such of his Judges, whose interest maketh him suspect them, (for as to the Complaynant he hath already chosen his own Judge,) those which he excepteth not against, are Judges he himself agrees on. Secondly, if he appeale to any other Judge, he can appeale no further; for his appeale is his choice. Thirdly, if he appeale to the Soveraign himself, and he by himself, or by Delegates which the parties shall agree on, give Sentence; that Sentence is finall: for the Defendant is Judged by his own Judges, that is to say, by himself.°

°These properties of just and rationall Judicature considered, I cannot forbeare to observe the excellent constitution of the Courts of Justice, established both for Common, and also for Publique Pleas in England. By Common Pleas, I meane those, where both the Complaynant and Defendant are Subjects: and by Publique, (which are also called Pleas of the Crown) those, where the Complaynant is the Soveraign.[j] For whereas there were two orders of men, whereof one was Lords, the other Commons; The Lords had this Priviledge, to have for Judges in all Capitall crimes, none but Lords; and of them, as many as would be present; which being ever acknowledged as a Priviledge of favour, their Judges were none but such as they had themselves desired. And in all controversies, every Subject (as also in civill controversies the Lords) had for Judges, men of the Country[k] where the matter in controversie lay; against which he might make his exceptions, till at last Twelve [126] men without exception being agreed on, they were Judged by those

These publique persons, with Authority from the Soveraign Power, either to Instruct, or Judge the people, are such members of the Common-wealth, as may fitly be compared to the organs of Voice in a Body naturall.°

For Execution. Publique Ministers are also all those, that have [23]Authority[23] from the Soveraign, to procure the Execution of Judgements given; to publish the Soveraigns Commands; to suppresse Tumults; to apprehend and imprison Malefactors; and other acts tending to the conservation of the Peace. For every act [24]they doe by such Authority,[24] is the act of the Common-wealth; and [25]their service, answerable[m] to that of the Hands, in a Bodie naturall.[25]

Publique Ministers abroad, are those that represent the Person of their own [26]Soveraign,[26] to forraign States. Such are Ambassadors, Messengers, Agents, and Heralds, sent by publique Authoritie, and on publique Businesse.

But such as are sent by Authoritie only of some private partie of a [27]troubled State,[27] though they be received, are neither Publique, nor Private Ministers [28]of the Common-wealth; because none of their actions have the Common-wealth for Author.[28] Likewise, an Ambassador sent from a Prince[29], to congratulate, condole, or to assist at a solemnity, though the Authority be Publique; yet because the businesse is Private, [30]and belonging to him in his naturall capacity; is a Private person. Also if a man be[30] sent into another Country, °secretly° to explore their counsels, °and strength;° though both the Authority, and the Businesse be Publique; yet because [31]there is none to take notice of any Person in him, but his own; he is but a Private Minister; but yet a Minister of the Common-wealth;[31] and may be compared to an Eye in the [32]Body naturall. Neither a Counsellor [33](nor a Councell of State, if we consider it with no Authority of Judicature or Command, but only of giving Advice to the Soveraign when it is required, or of offering it when it is not required,) is a Publique Person.[33] For the Advice is [34]addressed to[34] the Soveraign only, whose person cannot in his own presence, be represented to him, by another. [35]But a Body of Counsellors, are never without some other Authority, either of Judicature, or of immediate Administration: As in a Monarchy, they represent the Monarch, in delivering his Commands to the Publique Ministers: In a Democracy, the Councell, or Senate propounds the Result of their deliberations to the people, as a Councell; but when they appoint Judges, or heare Causes, or give Audience to Ambassadors, it is in the quality of a Minister of the People: And in an Aristocracy the Councell of State is the Soveraign Assembly it self; and gives counsell to none but themselves.[35]

CHAP. XXIV.

Of the [1]NUTRITION, and PROCREATION[1] of a Common-wealth.

The Nourishment of a Common-wealth consisteth in the Commodities of Sea and Land:

The NUTRITION of a Common-wealth [2]consisteth, in the Plenty, and Distribution of Materials conducing to Life: In Concoction,[a] or Preparation; and (when concocted) in the Conveyance of it, by convenient[b] conduits,[2] to the Publique use.

As for the Plenty of [3]Matter,[3] it is a thing limited by Nature, to those commodities, which from (the two breasts of our common Mother) Land, and Sea, God °usually° either freely giveth, or for labour selleth to man-kind.

[4]For the Matter of this Nutriment, consisting in Animals, Vegetals, and Minerals, God hath freely layd them before us, in or[4] neer to the face of the Earth; so as there needeth no more but the [5]labour, and industry of receiving them. Insomuch as[5] Plenty dependeth (next to Gods favour) meerly[c] on the labour and industry of men.

This Matter, [6]commonly called Commodities, is partly Native, and partly Forraign: Native, that which is to be had within the Territory of the Common-wealth: Forraign, that which is imported from without.[6] And because there is no Territory under the Dominion of one Common-wealth, (except it be of very vast extent,) that produceth all things needfull for the maintenance, and motion of the [7]whole Body;[7] and few that produce not something more than necessary; the superfluous commodities to be had within, become no more superfluous, but supply these wants at home, °by importation of that which may be had abroad,° either by Exchange, or by °just° Warre, or by Labour: for a mans Labour also, is a commodity exchangeable for [8]benefit,[8] as well as any other thing: °And there have been Common-wealths that having no more Territory, than hath served them for habitation, have neverthelesse, not onely maintained, but also encreased their Power, partly by the labour of trading from one place to another, and partly by selling the Manifactures, whereof the Materials were brought in from other places.°

Civitatis Nutritio à Copia & Distributione rerum ad vitam necessariarum dependet, & ab earum praeparatione, & applicatione ad usum publicum.

Quarum rerum copia, nempe Nutritionis Materia, terminata ab ipsa Natura est; constatque ex fructibus, quos, à communis matris nostrae Vberibus Terra & Mari, procedentes, humano generi aut libere donat aut solo labore vendit Deus. Sunt autem Animalia, Vegetabilia, & Mineralia, quae omnia non longè collocavit Deus à Superficie Telluris; adeo ut ad ea habenda, alia re opus non est, quam ut accipere velimus. Dependet ergo rerum necessariarum copia à sola (post benevolentiam divinam) industria & labore hominum.

Materia haec, id est ea quae proveniunt à Terra, Mari, & eorum Cultura Bona, partim Nativa Civitatibus singulis sunt, partim Externa in Civitates singulas importata. Quoniam autem Terra nulla sub unius Civitatis Dominio (nisi valde magna sit) necessaria omnia ad alimenta & motum Civitatis producit; neque rursus ulla quae non aliqua producat superflua; bona illa superflua quae Nativa sunt, superflua amplius non sunt, sed Commutatione vel Bello, vel Labore (nam etiam labores hominum, non minùs quam res aliae cum bonis aliis quibuscunque commutabiles sunt) bonorum Nativorum defectum supplent.

And the right Distribution of them.

The Distribution of [9]the Materials of this Nourishment,[9] is the constitution of Mine, and Thine, and His; that is to say, in one word Propriety; and [10]belongeth in all kinds of Common-wealth to[10] the Soveraign Power. For where there is no Common-wealth, there [11]is (as hath been already shewn)[d] a perpetuall warre of every man against his neighbour;[11] And therefore every thing is his that getteth it, and keepeth it by force; which is neither Propriety, nor Community;[e] but [12]Uncertainty.[12] Which is so evident, that even Cicero, (a passionate defender of Liberty,) °in a publique pleading,° attributeth all Propriety to the Law Civil, Let the Civill Law, saith he, be once abandoned, or but negligently guarded, °(not to say oppressed,)°[f] and there is nothing, [128] that any man can be sure to receive from his Ancestor, or leave to his Children.[g] And again; Take away the Civill Law, and no man knows what is his own, and what another mans.[h] Seeing therefore the Introduction of Propriety is an effect of Common-wealth; [13]which can do nothing but by the Person that Represents it, it is the act onely of the Soveraign; and consisteth in the Lawes, which none can make that have not the Soveraign Power. And this they well knew of old,[13] who called that Νόμος, (that is to say, Distribution,) which we call Law;[i] and defined Justice, [14] by distributing to every man his own.[j]

All private Estates of land proceed originally from the Arbitrary Distribution of the Soveraign.

[15]In this Distribution, the First Law, is for Division of the Land it selfe: wherein the Soveraign assigneth to every man a portion, according as he,[15] and not according as any Subject, or any number of them, shall judge agreeable to Equity, and the Common Good. The Children of Israel, were a Common-wealth in the Wildernesse; but [16]wanted the commodities of the Earth, till they were[16] masters of the Land of Promise; which afterward [17] was divided amongst them, not by their own discretion, but by the discretion of Eleazar the Priest, and Joshua their Generall: °who when there were twelve Tribes, making them thirteen by subdivision of the Tribe of Joseph; made neverthelesse but twelve portions of the Land; and ordained for the Tribe of Levi no land; but assigned them the Tenth part of the whole fruits; which division was therefore Arbitrary.[k] And though a People comming into possession of a Land by warre, do not alwaies exterminate the antient Inhabitants, (as did the Jewes,) but leave to many, or most, or all of them their Estates; yet it is manifest they hold them afterwards, as of the Victors distribution; as the people of England held all theirs of William the Conquerour.°

[9] goods [10] in all kinds of commonwealth had its origin from [11] all things belong to all men, and there is perpetual war; [12] strife.
[13] it is the act of the sovereign. For property depends on the civil laws; and the sovereign is the legislator in every commonwealth. This seems to have been observed by those ancient Greeks

Bonorum autem distributio, est Mei, Tui, Sui constitutio; vocaturque Proprietas. Proprietas autem in omni genere Civitatis originem habuit à Summa Potestate. Vbi enim Civitas non est, ibi omnia [122] omnium sunt, & Bellum perpetuum est; & Bonum unumquodque illius est, à quo rapitur & armis conservatur; quod neque Proprietas neque Communitas est, sed Concertatio. Id quod ita manifestum est, ut etiam ipse Cicero (Libertatis defensor vehementissimus) Proprietatem omnem attribuat Legibus Civilibus, quibus sublatis, vel negligenter custoditis nihil esse dicit, quod quis aut à Majoribus accipere aut filiis relinquere pro certo possit.[g] Et rursus tolle inquit Leges Civiles, quid suum, quid alienum sit, sciet nemo.[h] Quoniam ergo constitutio Proprietatis Civitatis opus est; illius opus est, qui Summam in Civitate habet Potestatem. Dependet enim Proprietas à Legibus Civilibus; & is qui Summam habet Potestatem in omni Civitate Legislator est. Id quod observasse videntur illi Graeci veteres, qui Legem nominaverunt Νόμον (id est Distributionem) & Iustitiam (consequenter) esse cuique Distributionem Sui definiverunt.[j]

Itaque si Civitas terram vacuam, aut Bello superatam acquisierit, distributio terrae illius inter Cives dependet ab eo, qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem; habebuntque portiones suas, non ut cuiquam Civi, aut Numero Civium aequum esse, vel ad Bonum Publicum conducere videbitur, sed ut videbitur Summam habenti Potestatem. [h] Ibid., XXV.70.

[i] νόμος was derived from the verb νέμω, meaning to 'distribute', and could mean a thing distributed, assigned, or possessed; a custom; or a law.

[j] E.g., Plato, Republic, I.6 (331e), but with 'his due' (ὀφειλόμενον) rather than 'his own'; Digest, I.1.10, 'a constant and perpetual wish to give each person that which is rightfully his' ('constans et perpetua voluntas jus suum cuique tribuendi').

[k] Josh. 14–18, esp. 14: 1; 18: 51 (Eleazar and Joshua); 17: 14–18 (second lot for the children of Joseph); 18: 7 (Levites).

Propriety of a Subject excludes not the Dominion of the Soveraign, but onely of another Subject.

From whence we may collect,[l] that the Propriety which a [18]subject[18] hath in his lands, consisteth in a right to exclude all [19]other subjects[19] from the use of them; and not to exclude their Soveraign, be it an Assembly, or a Monarch. For [20]seeing the Soveraign, that is to say, the Common-wealth (whose Person he representeth,) is understood to do nothing but in order to the common Peace and Security, this Distribution of lands, is to be understood as done in order to the same: And consequently, whatsoever Distribution he shall make in prejudice thereof,[m] is contrary to the will of every subject, that committed his Peace, and safety to his discretion, and conscience; and therefore by the will of every one of them, is to be reputed voyd.[20] It is true, that a Soveraign Monarch, or °the greater part of° a Soveraign Assembly, may [21]ordain the doing of many things in pursuit of their Passions,[21] contrary to their own consciences, [22]which is a[22] breach of trust, and of the Law of Nature; but [23]this is not enough to authorise any subject, either[23] to make warre upon, or so much as to accuse of Injustice, or any way to speak evill of their Soveraign; because they have [24] authorised all his actions, °and in bestowing the Soveraign Power, made them their own. But in what cases the Commands of Soveraigns are contrary to Equity, and the Law of Nature, is to be considered hereafter in another place.° [p]

The Publique is not to be dieted.

In the Distribution of land, the [25]Common-wealth it selfe, may be [129] conceived to have a portion, and possesse, and improve the same by their Representative; and that such portion may be made sufficient, to susteine the whole expence to the common Peace, and defence necessarily required: Which were very true, if there could be any Representative conceived free from humane passions, and infirmities. But[25] the nature of men being as it is, the setting forth of [26]Publique[26] Land, or of any certaine Revenue °for the Common-wealth,° is in vaine; and tendeth to the dissolution of Government, [27]and to the condition of meere Nature, and War,[27] assoon as ever the Soveraign Power falleth into the hands of a Monarch, or of an Assembly, that are either too negligent of [28]mony, or too hazardous in engaging the publique stock, into a long, or[28] costly war. Common-wealths can endure no Diet: For seeing their expence is not limited by their own appetite, but by externall

[m] The text seems corrupted here. Grammatically, 'thereof' seems to refer to 'the common Peace and Security'; but this is impossible, as the resulting meaning would conflict both with the sense of the passage and with Hobbes's basic theory. The reference of 'thereof' should be to the sovereign's 'Dominion' (as mentioned in the marginal note). It is possible that the phrase 'of his Dominion' (with 'Dominion' in a contracted form) was mis-transcribed in an early manuscript version as 'of his Distribution', and that this was later wrongly reduced to 'thereof'. Hobbes saw that there was a problem when correcting the MS, but the solution he applied there is unconvincing, as it was not necessary to demonstrate in this way that a seditious or illegal distribution was 'voyd'.

[n] 68 is lacking a word or words after 'dicere'; the 'possint' supplied by the corrector of 70 remedies this defect, but the original may have been some other wording, such as 'liceat' or 'licitum sit'.

[p] Nowhere in Leviathan is there a detailed discussion of such cases.

Accidents, and the appetites of their neighbours, the Publique Riches cannot be limited by other limits, than those °which the emergent[q] occasions shall require. And whereas in England, there were by the Conquerour, divers Lands reserved to his own use, (besides Forrests, and Chases,[r] either for his recreation, or for preservation of Woods,) and divers services reserved on the Land he gave his Subjects; yet it seems they were not reserved for his Maintenance in his Publique, but in his Naturall capacity: For he, and his Successors did for all that, lay Arbitrary Taxes on all Subjects Land, when they judged it necessary. Or if those publique Lands, and Services, were ordained as a sufficient maintenance of the Common-wealth, it was contrary to the scope of the Institution; being (as it appeared by those ensuing Taxes) insufficient, and (as it appeares by the late small Revenue of the Crown) Subject to Alienation, and Diminution.° It is therefore in vaine, to assign a portion to the Common-wealth; [29]which[29] may sell, or give it away; and does sell, and give it away °when tis done by their Representative.°

The Places and matter of Traffique depend, as their Distribution, on the Sovereign.

°As the Distribution of Lands at home; so° also to assigne in what places, and for what commodities, the [30]°Subject[30] shall traffique abroad, belongeth to the Soveraign. For if it did belong to private persons to use their own discretion therein, some of them would bee drawn for gaine, both to furnish the enemy with means to hurt the Common-wealth, and hurt it themselves, by importing such things, as pleasing [31]mens appetites,[31] be neverthelesse noxious, or at least unprofitable to them. And therefore it belongeth to the [32]Common-wealth, (that is, to the Soveraign only,) to approve, or disapprove both of[32] the places, and matter of forraign Traffique.

The Laws of transferring propriety belong also to the Soveraign.

Further, seeing it is not enough [33]to the Sustentation[s] of a Common-wealth, that every man have a propriety in a portion of Land, or in some few commodities, or a naturall property in some usefull art, and there is no art in the world, but is necessary either for the being, or well being almost of every particular man; it is necessary, that men distribute that which they can spare, and transferre their propriety therein, mutually one to another, by exchange, and mutuall contract. And therefore it belongeth to the Common-wealth, [130] (that is to say, to the Soveraign,) to appoint in what manner, all kinds of contract between Subjects, (as buying, selling, exchanging, borrowing, lending, letting, and taking to hire,) are to bee made; and by what words, and signes they shall be understood for[33] valid. And for the Matter, and Distribution of the [34]Nourishment, to the severall Members of the Common-wealth,[34] thus much (considering the modell of the whole worke) is sufficient.

Mony the Bloud of a Common-wealth.

By Concoction,[t] I understand the reducing of all commodities, which are not presently[u] consumed, but reserved for Nourishment in time to come, to some thing of equall value, and withall [35]so portable, as not to hinder the motion of men from place to place; to the end a man may have in what place soever, such Nourishment as the place affordeth. And this is nothing else but Gold, and Silver, and Mony.[35] For Gold and Silver, being (as it happens) almost in all Countries of the world highly valued, [36]is a[36] commodious measure of the value of all things else [37]between Nations; and Mony (of what matter soever coyned by the Soveraign of a Common-wealth,) is a sufficient measure of the value of all things else, between the Subjects of that Common-wealth. By the means of which measures, all commodities, Moveable, and Immoveable, are made to accompany a man, to all places of his resort, within and without the place of his ordinary residence; and the same passeth from Man to Man, within the Common-wealth; and goes round about, Nourishing (as it passeth) every part thereof; In so much as this Concoction, is as it were the Sanguification[37] [v] of the Common-wealth: For naturall Bloud is in like manner made of the fruits of the Earth; and circulating, nourisheth by the way, [38] every Member of the Body of Man.

And because Silver and Gold, have their value from the matter it self; they have first this priviledge, that the value of them cannot be [39]altered[39] by the power of one, nor of a few Common-wealths; °as being a common measure of the commodities of all places.° But base Mony, may easily be enhansed, or abased. [40]Secondly, they have the priviledge to[40] make Common-wealths °move, and° stretch out their armes,[w] when need is, into forraign Countries; and [41]supply, not only private Subjects that travell, but also whole Armies with Provision. But that Coyne, which is not considerable for the Matter, but for the Stamp of the place, being unable to endure change of ayr, hath its effect at home only; where also it is subject to the change of Laws, and thereby to have the value[41] diminished, to the prejudice many times of those that have it.

But gold and silver money is valuable everywhere; it passes through the commonwealth; and in passing through, it imparts to the individual citizens a part of itself, by which they are to be nourished; and it is as it were the blood

The Conduits and Way of mony to the Publique use.

The Conduits, and Wayes by which [42]it is conveyed to the Publique use, are of two sorts; One, that Conveyeth it to the Publique Coffers; The other, that Issueth the same out againe for publique payments. Of the first sort, are Collectors, Receivers, and Treasurers; of the second are the Treasurers againe, and the Officers appointed for payment of severall publique or private Ministers.[42] And in this also, the Artificiall Man maintains his resemblance with the Naturall; whose Veins receiving the Bloud from the [43]severall[43] [131] Parts of the Body, carry it to the Heart; [44]where being made Vitall, the Heart by the Arteries sends it out again, to enliven, and enable for motion all the Members of the same.[44]

The Children of a Common-wealth Colonies.

The Procreation, or Children of a Common-wealth, are those we call Plantations, or Colonies; which are numbers of men sent out from the Common-wealth, under a Conductor,[x] or Governour, to inhabit a Forraign Country, [45]either formerly voyd of Inhabitants, or made voyd then, by warre. And when a Colony is setled, they are either a Common-wealth of themselves, discharged of their subjection to their Soveraign that sent them, (as hath been done by many Common-wealths of antient time,)[45] in which case the Common-wealth from which they went, was called their Metropolis, °or Mother,° and requires no more of them, then Fathers require of the Children, whom they emancipate, °and make free from their domestique government,° which is Honour, and Friendship; or else they remain °united to their Metropolis, as were the Colonies of the people of Rome; and then they are no Common-wealths themselves, but° Provinces, and parts of the Common-wealth that sent them. So that the Right of Colonies [46](saving Honour, and League with their Metropolis,) dependeth wholly on their Licence, or Letters, by which their Soveraign authorised them to Plant.[46] [y]

Reditus fit per Collectores, Receptores, ad Thesaurarios; Exitus fit per Thesaurarios, ad Ministros illos, qui pecuniam publicam erogant, & ab illis ad Cives privatos. Atque in hoc quoque hominis Artificialis apparet similitudo cum Naturali; cujus Venae Sanguinem à partibus corporis exterioribus recipientes ferunt ad Cor; unde rursus per Arterias fertur, membra vivificans, & singulis motum tribuens.

CHAP. XXV.

Of COUNSELL.

Counsell what.

How fallacious it is to judge of the nature of things, by the ordinary °and inconstant° use of words, appeareth in nothing more, than in the [1]confusion of Counsels, and Commands, arising from the Imperative manner of speaking in them both, and in many other occasions besides. For the words Doe this,[1] are the words not onely of him that Commandeth; but also of him that giveth Counsell; and of him that Exhorteth; and yet there are but few, that see not, that these are very different things; or that cannot distinguish between them, when they perceive who it is that speaketh, and to whom the Speech is directed, [2]and upon what occasion. But finding[2] those phrases in mens writings, [3]and being not able, or not willing to enter into a consideration of the circumstances, they mistake sometimes[3] the Precepts of Counsellours, for the Precepts of them that Command; [4]and sometimes the contrary; according as it best agreeth with the conclusions they would inferre, or the actions they approve. To avoyd which mistakes, and[4] render to those termes of Commanding, Counselling, and Exhorting, their proper and distinct significations, I define them thus.

Differences between Command, and Counsell.

COMMAND is, where a man saith, Doe this, or Doe not this, [5]without expecting[a] other reason than[5] the Will of him that sayes it. From this it followeth °manifestly,° that he that Commandeth, [6]pretendeth thereby[6] his own Benefit: For the reason of his Command is his own [132] Will onely, and the proper object of every mans Will, is some Good to himselfe.

COUNSELL, is where a man saith, Doe, or Doe not this, and deduceth his reasons from the benefit that arriveth by it to him to whom he saith it. And from this it is evident, that he that giveth Counsell, pretendeth onely °(whatsoever he intendeth)° the good of him, to whom he giveth it.

[a] = needing, requiring (OED, 'expect', v., 5.c).
[b] The Latin here may contain an echo of Juvenal, Satirae, VI, l. 223, 'sit pro ratione voluntas' ('let my will stand for a reason').

CAPVT XXV.

De Consilio.

De Natura rerum ex loquendi consuetudine judicare, quam sit fallax, nusquam magis apparet quam in vocibus Consilium, & Imperatum; quorum utrumque significatur dicendo Hoc fac, quae vox non modo Imperantis, sed etiam Consulentis & Hortantis est. Pauci tamen sunt qui diversa esse Imperatum, & Consultum non satis sciant, vel (quoties quis ad quem loquitur cognoscunt) non satis inter ea possunt discernere. Sed in Scriptoribus voces illas negligenter [125] praetereuntes, multi Praeceptum illius qui Consilium dat, & Praeceptum illius qui imperat idem esse putant. Vt ergo rectè intelligatur quid sit Imperare, quid sit Consilium dare, & quid Hortari, voces illas sic definio. Imperare dicitur qui dicit Hoc fac, vel non fac, ad illum qui rationem dicti in voluntate dicentis sitam esse scit. Sequitur hinc eum qui Imperat sui ipsius boni causa id facere, cum voluntatem propriam pro ratione[b] haberi postulat. Objectum autem Voluntatis semper aliquod Volenti Bonum est.

Consilium dare dicitur, quando quis dicit Hoc fac vel non fac Consilii rationem ab eo ducens, quod bonum ei sit, cui Consilium datur. Vnde manifestum est Consilium dantem, bonum praetendere solius accipientis.

8 possunt] possint 70

Therefore between Counsell and Command, one great difference is, that Command is [7] directed to a mans own benefit; and Counsell to the benefit of another man. And from this ariseth another difference, that a man [8] may be obliged to do what he is Commanded; as when he hath covenanted to obey: But he [9] cannot be obliged to do as he is Counselled, °because the hurt of not following it, is his own;° or if he should covenant to follow it, then is the Counsell turned into the nature of a Command. A third difference between them is, that no man can pretend a right to be of another mans Counsell;[c] because he is not to pretend benefit by it to himselfe: °but to demand right to Counsell another, argues a will to know his designes, or to gain some other Good to himselfe; which (as I said before) is of every mans will the proper object.°

This also is incident to the nature of Counsell; that °whatsoever it be,° he that asketh it, cannot [10]°in equity[10] accuse, or punish it: For to ask Counsell of another, is to permit him to give such Counsell as he shall think best; And consequently, he that giveth counsell to °his Soveraign, (whether° a Monarch, or an Assembly) when he asketh it, cannot °in equity° be punished for it, whether the same be [11]conformable to the opinion of the most, or not, so it be to the Proposition in debate. For if the sense of the Assembly can be taken notice of, before the Debate be ended, they should neither ask, nor take any further Counsell; For the Sense of the Assembly, is the Resolution of the Debate, and End of all Deliberation. And generally he that demandeth Counsell, is Author of it; and therefore cannot punish it; and what the Soveraign cannot, no man else can. But if one Subject[11] giveth Counsell to another, to do any thing contrary to the Lawes, whether that Counsell proceed from evill intention, or from ignorance onely, it is punishable by the Common-wealth; because ignorance of the Law, is no good excuse, [12]where every man is bound to take notice of the Lawes to which he is subject.[12]

Exhortation and Dehortation what.

EXHORTATION, and DEHORTATION,[d] is Counsell, [13]accompanied with signes in him that giveth it, of vehement desire to have it followed; or to say it more briefly, Counsell vehemently pressed.[13] For he that Exhorteth, doth not [14]deduce the consequences of what he adviseth to be done, and tye himselfe therein to[14] the rigour of true reasoning; but encourages [15]him he Counselleth, to Action: As he that Dehorteth, deterreth him from it. And therefore[15] they have in their speeches, a regard to the °common° Passions, and [16] opinions of men, in deducing their reasons; and make use of Similitudes, Metaphors, Examples, and other tooles of Oratory, °to perswade their Hearers of the Utility, Honour, or Justice of following their advise.° [133]

30 and Dehortation] om. MS

Itaque inter Consilium & Imperium differentia una magna est, quod hoc ad proprium, illud ad alienum bonum tendere intelligitur. Atque hinc differentia oritur alia, quod is cui imperatur ad obedientiam obligari possit, nempe si obedire pactus fuerit. Sed is cui Consilium datum est, ut juxta Consilium datum agat obligari non potest. Si enim obligaretur Pacto, non amplius Consilium sed Imperium esset. Tertia inter eadem differentia est, quod jus Consilii dandi postulare nemo potest, quia bonum sibi ex Consilio postulare se negat.

Ad naturam Consilii pertinet etiam hoc, quod dantem, is qui petit neque punire, neque accusare jure potest. Nam qui petit, Consilium arbitrio dantis dari voluit. Itaque qui Monarchae, vel Coetui Consilium dat petenti, sive placeat, sive displiceat, puniri non potest ut quod volentibus datum est. Caeterùm si Civis Civi Consilium det faciendi aliquid, quod lege prohibitum est, sive Consilium illud à prava intentione, sive ab ignorantia tantùm procedat, puniri à Civitate potest; quia ignorantia Legis illum, qui Legis notitiam habere debuit, non excusat.

Hortatio & Dehortatio Consilium quidem est, sed ut fiat, quod fieri consulit vehementer cupientis. Nam qui hortatur, severitate ratiocinationis non utitur, sed quibuscunque potest argumentis, ad actionem incitat. Itaque in Hortationibus à Passionibus & opinionibus communibus argumenta ducunt, utunturque persuadendi causâ Similitudinibus, Exemplis, Metaphoris, aliisque artis Oratoriae utensilibus.

[7] ^ understood to be [8] ^ who is given a command [9] ^ to whom counsel is given
[10] by right [11] pleasing or displeasing, because it was given to those who wished for it. But if one citizen [12] for him who should have taken notice of the law.
[13] but given by someone who vehemently desires that the thing he counsels to be done should be done.
[14] use [15] to action with whatever arguments he can. In exhortations, therefore, [16] ^ common

[c] To be 'of someone's counsel' was to be one of that person's advisers (OED, 'counsel', n., 6).
[d] = earnest dissuasion (OED, 'dehortation'; 'dehort', v.).

From whence may be inferred, First, that Exhortation and Dehortation,[e] is directed [17] to the Good of him that giveth the Counsell, [18]not of him that asketh it, which is contrary to the duty of a Counsellour; who (by the definition of Counsell) ought to regard, not his own benefit, but his whom he adviseth. And that he directeth his Counsell to his own benefit, is manifest enough, by the long and vehement urging, or by the artificiall[f] giving thereof; which being not required of him, and consequently proceeding from his own occasions,[g] is directed principally to his own benefit, and but accidentarily[h] to the good of him that is Counselled, or not at all.[18]

°Secondly,° that the [19]use[19] of Exhortation and Dehortation[i] lyeth onely, where a man is to speak to a Multitude; because when the Speech is addressed to one, [20]he may interrupt him, and examine his reasons more rigorously, than can be done in a Multitude; which are too many to enter into Dispute, and Dialogue with him that speaketh indifferently to them all at once.[20]

°Thirdly,° that they that Exhort °and Dehort,° [j] where they are required to give Counsell, are [21]corrupt Counsellours, and as it were bribed by their own interest. For[21] though the Counsell they give be °never so° good; yet he that gives it, is no more a good Counsellour, than he that giveth a Just Sentence for a reward, is a Just Judge. But where a man may lawfully Command, as a Father in his Family, or a Leader in an Army, his Exhortations and Dehortations, are [22]not onely lawfull, but also necessary, and laudable: But then they are no more Counsells, but Commands;[22] which when they are for Execution of [23]soure[23] [k] labour; sometimes necessity, and alwayes humanity requireth [24]to be sweetned in the delivery, by encouragement, and in the tune and phrase of Counsell, rather then in the harsher[24] language of Command.

Examples of the difference between Command and Counsell, we may take from °the formes of Speech that expresse them in° Holy Scripture. Have no other Gods [25]but me;[25] Make to thy selfe no graven Image[26]; Take not [27] Gods name in vain; Sanctifie the Sabbath; Honour thy [28]Parents;[28] Kill not; [29] Steale not, &c.[l] are Commands; because the reason for which we are to obey them, is drawn from the will of God °our King,° whom we are obliged to obey. But these words, Sell all thou hast; give it to the poore; and follow me,[m] are Counsell; because the reason for which we are to do so, is drawn from our own ben-

[17] ^ somewhat

[18] since men are generally more vehement in their own interests than in those of others.

[19] effectiveness

[20] it is often interrupted; from being an uninterrupted speech, it becomes a dialogue; and reasons are examined more rigorously, than in an assembly.

Constat ergo Hortationes & Dehortationes ad Hortantis & Dehortantis bonum non nihil respicere, cum homines in suis plerumque rebus vehementiores sint, quam in alienis.

Hortationes & Dehortationes in multitudine tantùm efficaces sunt. [126] Vbi enim hominem singularem alloquitur aliquis, saepenumero interrumpitur; ex Oratione perpetua fit Dialogus; rationes rigidius pensitantur quam in Coetu.

Petenti Consilium, is qui Hortationem offert, Consiliarius bonus non est. Corrumpitur enim à cupiditate illa (quaecunque ea fuit) quae vehementiam & artificium in Orationem intulit; quibus factum est, ut quanquam Consilium bonum fuerit, ipse tamen bonus Consiliarius non sit, nisi etiam qui accepto dono, justè Iudicaverit, bonus sit Iudex. Illius autem qui jure Imperat, ut in Familia Paterfamilias, in exercitu Dux, Hortationes aliquando non modo laudabiles, sed etiam necessariae sunt; nimirum, si labor imperetur durus, interdum necessitas, humanitas semper requirit, ut consulentium dulci emolliatur potius quam aspero Imperii stilo fiat durior.

Differentiae inter Imperatum & Consilium exempla è Sacris Scripturis sumi possunt: Ne habeas alios Deos coram me. Ne facito tibi sculptile, &c. Ne assumito nomen Dei tui in vanum. Sanctifica Sabbatum. Honora Patrem tuum. Ne Occidito. Ne scortator. Ne furator, &c.[l] Imperata sunt; quia ratio obedientiae à voluntate ducitur Dei cui obedire obligamur. Sed verba haec Vende omnia quae habes, da pauperibus; & sequere me,[m] Consilium est, propterea quod ratio propter quam ita faciendum est, à Bono nostro derivatur, nempe ut The- efit; which is this, that we shall have Treasure in heaven. These words[30], Go into the Village over against you, and you shall find an Asse °tyed,° and her Colt[31]; loose her, and bring her to me,[n] are a Command: for [32]the reason of their fact is drawn from the will of their[32] Master: but these words, Repent, and be Baptized in the Name of Jesus,[p] are Counsell; because the reason why we should so do, tendeth not to any benefit of God °Almighty,° who shall still be King in what manner soever we rebell; but of our selves, who have no other means of avoyding the punishment °hanging over us° for our sins.

Differences of fit and unfit Counsellours.

[33]As the difference of Counsell from Command, hath been now deduced from the nature of Counsell, consisting in a deducing of the [134] benefit, or hurt that may arise to him that is to be Counselled, by the necessary or probable consequences of the action he propoundeth; so may also the differences between apt, and inept Counsellours be derived from the same. For Experience, being but Memory of the consequences of like actions formerly observed, and Counsell but the Speech whereby that experience is made known to another; the Vertues, and Defects of Counsell, are the same with the Vertues, and Defects Intellectuall: And to the Person of a Common-wealth, his Counsellours serve him in the place of Memory, and Mentall Discourse.[33] But with this resemblance of the Common-wealth, to a naturall man, there is one dissimilitude joyned, of great importance; which is, that a naturall man [34]receiveth his experience, from the naturall objects of sense, which work upon him without passion, or interest of their own;[34] whereas they that give Counsell to °the Representative person of° a Common-wealth, may have, and have [35] often their particular ends, [36]and passions, that render their Counsells alwayes suspected, and many times unfaithfull.[36] And therefore we may set down for the first condition of a good Counsellour, That his Ends, and Interest, be not inconsistent with the [37]Ends and Interest of him he Counselleth.[37]

[33] The difference between apt and inept counsellors depends on the difference between intellectual virtues and defects (about which we have spoken before).[q] For they serve as the memory and understanding of the sovereign.

saurum in Coelis habeamus. Sed verba haec Christi Matth. 21. 2. Ite in vicum qui vobis ex adverso est, & invenietis asinam & pullum cum ea, solvite & adducite, pro Imperio dicuntur, quia Domini sunt; Verba autem haec, Resipiscite & Baptizamini in nomine Iesu,[p] Consilium est, quia non ad Bonum aliquod, quod ad Deum perveniat (qui quantumcunque contumaces sumus semper regnabit;) sed ad Bonum nostrum, qui poenam propter peccata nostra alia via effugere non possumus.

Differentia inter Consiliarios idoneos & ineptos, à differentia dependet inter Virtutes & Defectus (de quibus ante loquuti sumus)[q] intellectuales. Illi enim qui Summam habet Potestatem pro Memoria & Intellectu sunt. Sed cum similitudine hac inter Civitatem & Hominem, dissimilitudo quaedam magni momenti conjuncta est. Memoriam enim & Intellectum habet Homo ab ipsis rebus, quae Sensuum objecta sunt; quae objecta illum sine omni Passione, & Boni sui respectu quid agendum sit docent, nec aliter docere possunt; sed qui Civitati Consilium dat, habere potest, & saepissimè habet scopum proprium, nec semper cum scopo Civitatis congruentem. Itaque pro virtute prima Consiliarii boni habendam censeo; ut Fines ejus & Bonum proprium non sint Finibus & Bono publico repugnantes. [127]

Secondly, Because the office of a Counsellour, when an action comes into deliberation, is to make manifest the consequences of it, [38] in such manner, as he that is Counselled may [39]be truly and evidently informed;[39] he ought to propound his advise, in such forme of speech, as may [40]make the truth most evidently appear; that is to say, with as firme ratiocination, as significant and proper language, and as briefly, as the evidence will permit. And therefore rash, and unevident Inferences; (such as are fetched onely from Examples, or authority of Books, and are not arguments of what is good, or evill, but witnesses of fact, or of opinion,) obscure, confused, and ambiguous Expressions, also all metaphoricall Speeches, tending to the stirring up of Passion, (because such reasoning, and such expressions, are usefull onely to deceive, or to lead him we Counsell towards other ends than his own)[40] are repugnant to the Office of a Counsellour.

Thirdly, Because the Ability of Counselling [41]proceedeth from Experience, and long study; and no man is presumed to have experience in all those things that to the Administration of a great Common-wealth are necessary to be known, No man is[41] presumed to be a good Counsellour, but in such Businesse, as he hath not onely been much versed in, but hath also much meditated on, and considered. [42]For seeing the businesse of a Common-wealth is this, to preserve the people in Peace at home, and defend them against forraign Invasion, we shall find, it requires great knowledge of the disposition of Man-kind, of the Rights of Government, and of the nature of Equity, Law, Justice, and Honour, not to be attained without study; And[42] of the Strength, Commodities, [43]Places,[43 r] both of their own Country, and their Neighbours; as also of [44]the inclinations, and designes of all Nations that may any way annoy[s] them. And this is not attained to, without much experience. Of which things, not onely the whole summe, [135] but every one of the particulars requires the age, and observation of a man in years, and of more than ordinary study. The wit required for Counsel, as I have said before (Chap. 8.) is Judgement. And the differences of men in that point come from different education, of some to one kind of study, or businesse, and of others to another. When for the doing of any thing, there be Infallible rules, (as in Engines,[t] and Edifices, the rules of Geometry,) all the experience of the world cannot equall his Counsell, that has learnt, or found out the Rule. And when there is no such Rule, he that hath most experience in that particular kind of businesse, has therein the best Judgement, and is the best Counsellour.[44]

Secundò quia quoties de Actione aliqua agenda deliberatur, Consiliarii boni officium est Actionis consequentias, sive ea, quae Actionem verisimiliter sequutura sunt, ita declarare, ut is cui datur Consilium ea perfectè intelligat; Consilium suum forma Orationis tali explicare debet, qualis veritati & perspicuitati maximè consentanea est, id est perspicuè loqui & firmè ratiocinari. Itaque Illationes temerariae (quales sunt Illationes ab Authoritate Librorum) obscurae & ambiguae; item dictiones Metaphoricae, & quae Passiones hominum excitare solent, cum officio Consiliarii boni consistere non possunt.

Tertiò, Quoniam, ut quis Consilium Civitati rectum dare possit, non modo Experientia multa, sed etiam Meditatione longa opus est; nec quae ad Administrationem publicam necessaria sunt, omnia scire quisquam praesumi debet; Consiliarium bonum, nisi circa res in quibus diu versatus fuerit, & de quibus diu cogitaverit, neminem esse, praesumendum est. Ad Administrationem autem publicam scitu necessaria sunt, hominum (id est Materiae ex qua Civitas constituitur) Ingenium, Iura Summae Potestatis, Aequum, Iustum, Honestum, & eorum contraria quid sunt; quae multam postulant ut rectè cognoscantur experientiam. Item quae sint tam suae, quam vicinarum Civitatum Vires, Opes, Praesidia, Classes, & Oportunitates; etiam qui Socii, qui Aditus, qui Affectus, quae Factiones, & quae agitent Consilia. Quarum rerum sine multorum simul hominum observationibus cognitio haberi non potest. Denique cognita haec omnia, nisi recta adhibeatur ratiocinatio, inutilia sunt. Vtile enim, nescienti rectè uti, nihil est.

[38] ^ or the likely consequences, [39] understand them perfectly;

[40] be most consistent with the truth and with perspicuity; that is to say, speaking perspicuously, and using firm ratiocination. Therefore rash inferences (such as are inferences drawn from the authority of books), obscure and ambiguous ones, and also metaphorical speeches, and those which tend to stir up men's passions,

[41] the commonwealth correctly requires not only much experience, but also long study; and no man should be presumed to know all those things that are necessary for public administration; No man should be

[42] Now, the things that need to be known for public administration are: the disposition of mankind (of, that is, the material from which the commonwealth is made); the rights of the sovereign power; and fairness, justice, virtue, and their opposites. To know these correctly requires much experience. Knowledge is also needed

[43] garrisons, armies, and advantages

[44] their allies, means of approach, and inclinations, their factions, and the designs that agitate them – knowledge of which cannot be had without the observations of many men together. Finally, all this knowledge is useless without correct ratiocination. For nothing is useful to him who does not know how to use it correctly.

[t] 'Engines' could mean mechanical contrivances generally, or, more particularly, instruments of warfare (OED, 'engine', n., 4, 5).

Fourthly, to be able to give Counsell to a Common-wealth, in a businesse [45]that hath reference to another Common-wealth, It is necessary to be acquainted with the Intelligences, and Letters that come from thence, and with all the records of Treaties, and other transactions of State between them;[45] which none can doe, but such as the [46]Representative[46] shall think fit. By which we may see, that they who are not called to Counsell, can have no [47]good Counsell in such cases to obtrude.[47]

Fifthly, [48]Supposing the number of Counsellors equall, a man[48] is better Counselled by hearing them apart, then in an Assembly; °and that for many causes. First,° in hearing them apart, you have the advice of [49]every man; but in an Assembly many of them deliver their advise with I,[u] or No, or with their hands, or feet, not moved by their own sense, but by the eloquence of another, or for feare of displeasing some that have spoken, or the whole Assembly, by contradiction; or for feare of appearing duller in apprehension, than those that have applauded the contrary opinion. Secondly, in an Assembly of many, there cannot choose but be some whose interests are contrary to that of the Publique; and these their Interests make passionate, and Passion eloquent, and Eloquence drawes others into the same advice. For the Passions of men, which asunder are moderate, as the heat of one brand; in Assembly are like many brands, that[49] enflame one another, (especially when they blow one

For an assembly is one person, and its members state their opinion moved not by their own sense, but by the eloquence, or power, or friendship, of others; and sometimes (for fear of appearing slow-witted) they state an opinion which they do not understand. Also many of them put their own interest before the public interest. This would be less harmful if they stated their opinions separately, without witnesses. For the passions of individual men are more moderate in themselves than they are in an assembly (as brands burn less fiercely apart than when they are brought together), where sometimes they

Coetus enim persona una est, cujus membra non ex suo ipsorum sensu, sed ex aliorum eloquentia, vel potentia, vel amicitia sententiam dicunt, eam aliquando (ne ingenii tardi esse videantur) quam non intelligunt. Plurimi etiam eorum, commodo suo [128] publicum postponunt. Quod, si sententias seorsim sine testibus dicant, minus noxium est. Passiones enim hominum singularium moderatiores sunt per se, quam in Coetu (non aliter quàm torres igniti disjuncti quam conferti minus ardent) ubi se nonnunquam flatu Rhetorico ad

another with Orations) to the setting of the Common-wealth on fire, [50]under pretence of Counselling it. Thirdly, in hearing every man apart, one may examine (when there is need) the truth, or probability of his reasons, and of the grounds of the advise he gives, by frequent interruptions, and objections; which cannot be done in an Assembly, where (in every difficult question) a man is rather astonied,[v] and dazled with the variety of discourse upon it, than informed of the course he ought to take. Besides, there cannot be an Assembly of many, called together for advice, wherein there be not some, that have the ambition to be thought eloquent, and also learned in the Politiques; and give not their advice with care of the businesse propounded, but of the applause of their motly orations, made of the divers colored threds, or shreds of Authors; which is an Impertinence at least, that takes away the time of serious Consultation, and in the secret way of Counselling apart, is easily avoided. [136] Fourthly, in Deliberations that ought to be kept secret, (whereof there be many occasions in Publique Businesse,) the Counsells of many, and especially in Assemblies, are dangerous; And therefore great Assemblies are necessitated to commit such affaires to lesser numbers, and of such persons as are most versed, and in whose fidelity they have most confidence.[50]

To conclude, [51]who is there that so far approves the taking of Counsell from a great Assembly of Counsellours, that wisheth for, or would accept of their pains, when there is a question of marrying his Children, disposing of his Lands, governing his Household, or managing his private Estate, especially if there be amongst them such as wish not his prosperity? A man that doth his businesse by the help of many and prudent Counsellours, with every one consulting apart in his proper element, does it best, as he that useth able Seconds at Tennis play,[51] placed in their proper stations. He does next best, that [52]useth his own Judgement only; as he that has[52] no Second at all.[w]

15 Counsells] counsayle MS 18 versed] versed {in them added by TH} MS

[50] . Besides, when their opinions are stated separately, the reasons for them are more easily examined than in an assembly, where the multitude and variety of speeches bewilder the listeners rather than enlighten them. For there are some who, when they are summoned to give advice, being eager to gain a reputation for learning or eloquence, make speeches that are not relevant to the deliberation – which cannot happen if advice is given one-to-one. Finally, in deliberations that ought to be kept secret, since opinions are stated openly in an assembly, there is a danger that they will become known to the enemy.

[51] there is no one who would willingly use an assembly of counsellors in his private affairs, though he could easily do so. If the father of a family was uncertain about the choice of a husband for his daughter, or of a wife for his son, or about which tenants he should take for his land, and at what rents, or about who should become his household steward, or his farm manager, he would never ask an assembly of counsellors, especially not if he thought that the assembly contained people who wished him ill. Therefore, although the counsel of many is preferable to the counsel of few, it is to be preferred only when they expound their counsel individually and separately. For in deliberations I see a resemblance to what happens in the game of tennis, where he does best who uses seconds incendium Civitatis mutuò inflammant. Praeterea sententiarum quas dicunt seorsim, rationes faciliùs examinantur, quam in Coetu, ubi multitudo & varietas Orationum auditores stupere potiùs quam intelligere faciunt. Nonnulli etiam sunt, qui cum convocantur ad Consilium, doctrinae aut eloquentiae famam captantes, ad ea quae deliberantur impertinenter dicunt, quod in Consilio unius ad unum fieri non potest. In deliberationibus denique quae tacendae sunt, (cum in Coetu sententiae dicantur palam) periculum est ne hostibus patefiant.

Postremò, nemo est qui in rebus suis privatis Consiliariorum Coetu libenter uti vellet, quanquam id facile posset. Etsi ergo multorum Consilium Consilio paucorum anteferendum sit, tunc tamen tantùm anteferendum est, quando Consilia singuli sua seorsim explicant. In deliberationibus enim simile aliquid video ejus quod fit in ludo pilae; ubi optimè facit qui Secundis utitur proprias habentibus stationes. But he that is carried up and down to his businesse in a framed [53]Counsell, which cannot move but by the plurality of consenting opinions, the execution whereof is commonly (out of envy, or interest) retarded by the part dissenting,[53] does it worst of all, and like one that is carried to the ball, °though by good Players, yet° in a Wheele-barrough, °or other frame,° heavy of it self, and retarded also by the inconcurrent[x] judgements, [54]and endeavours of them that drive it; and so much the more, as they be more that set their hands to it; and most of all, when there is one, or more amongst them, that desire to have him lose. And though it be true, that many eys see more then one;[y] yet it is not to be understood of many Counsellours; but then only, when the finall Resolution is in one man. Otherwise, because many eyes see the same thing in divers lines, and are apt to look asquint towards their private benefit; they that desire not to misse their marke, though they look about with two eyes, yet they never ayme but with one; And therefore no great Popular Commonwealth was ever kept up; but either by a forraign Enemy that united them; or by the reputation of some one eminent Man amongst them; or by the secret Counsell of a few; or by the mutuall feare of equall factions; and not by the open Consultations of the Assembly. And as for very little Common-wealths, be they Popular, or Monarchicall, there is no humane wisdome can uphold them, longer then the Jealousy[z] lasteth of their potent Neighbours.[54]

CHAP. XXVI.

Of CIVILL LAWES.

Civill Law what.

[1]BY CIVILL LAWES, I understand the Lawes, that men are therefore bound to observe, because they are Members, not of this, or that Common-wealth in particular, but of a Common-wealth. For the knowledge of particular Lawes [137] belongeth to them, that professe the study of the Lawes of their severall Countries; but the knowledge of Civill Law in generall, to any man. The antient Law of Rome was called their Civil Law, from the word Civitas, which signifies a Common-wealth: And those Countries, which having been under the Roman Empire, and governed by that Law, retaine still such part thereof as they think fit, call that part the Civill Law, to distinguish it from the rest of their own Civill Lawes. But that is not it I intend to speak of here; my designe being not to shew what is Law here, and there; but what is[1] Law; as Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, and divers others have done, without taking upon them the profession of the study of the Law.

And first it is manifest, that Law °in generall,° is not Counsell, but Command; [2]nor a Command of any man to any man; but only of him, whose Command is addressed to one formerly obliged to obey him. And as for Civill Law, it addeth only the name of the person Commanding, which is Persona Civitatis, the Person of the Common-wealth.[2]

Which considered, I define Civill Law in this manner. CIVILL LAW, Is to every Subject, those Rules, which the Common-wealth hath Commanded him, by Word, Writing, or other sufficient Sign of the Will, to make use of, for the Distinction of [3]Right, and Wrong; that is to say, of what is contrary, and what is not contrary to the Rule.[3]

[1] Just as the laws of nature are those we are bound to obey as men, so the civil laws are those we are bound to obey as citizens. Concerning them, it is necessary to consider not what they are in this or that commonwealth, but what civil law is. I know that in the commonwealths that were once subject to the commonwealth of Rome, the ancient laws of the Roman commonwealth are generally called the civil laws. My design here is not to discuss them, but to discuss the general nature of

CAPVT XXVI.

De Legibus Civilibus.

Sicut Leges Naturae illae sunt, quibus obedire tenemur quatenus Homines; ita Leges Civiles eae sunt, quibus tenemur obedire, quatenus Cives. De quibus, non quaenam illae sint, in hac vel illa Civitate, sed Lex Civilis quid sit, considerandum est. Scio in Civitatibus, quae Civitati Romanae subditae olim erant, Leges Civiles plerumque [129] dici Civitatis Romanae Leges Antiquas. De illis disputare hujus instituti non est, sed (quod fecerunt Plato, Aristoteles, Cicero aliique multi, qui Iuris peritiam tamen professi non sunt) generaliter de Lege.

Manifestum autem est Legem Consilium non esse; sed Imperatum; quod (ut in praecedente Capite dictum est) à Consilio differt.

Legem igitur Civilem sic definio: Lex Civilis unicuique Civi est Regula qua, Civitas Verbo vel Scripto, vel alio quocunque Voluntatis signo idoneo, ad distinctionem Boni & Mali, uti imperat.

5 Civilis 68-Errata] Civiles 68

In which definition, there is nothing that is [4]not at first sight evident. For every man seeth, that[4] some Lawes are addressed to all the [5]Subjects[5] in generall; some to particular Provinces; some to particular [6]Vocations;[6] and some to particular Men; and are therefore Lawes, to every of those to whom the Command is directed; and to none else. As also, that [7]Lawes are the Rules of Just, and Unjust; nothing being reputed Unjust, that is not contrary to some Law. Likewise, that none can make Lawes but the Common-wealth; because our Subjection is to the Common-wealth only: and that Commands, are to be signified by sufficient Signs; because a man knows not otherwise how to obey them.[7] And therefore, whatsoever can from this definition °by necessary consequence° be deduced, ought to be acknowledged for truth. Now I deduce from it this that followeth.

The Soveraign is Legislator:

1 The Legislator in all Common-wealths, is only the Soveraign, be he one Man, °as in a Monarchy,° or one Assembly of men, [8]as in a Democracy, or Aristocracy. For the Legislator, is he that maketh the Law. And the Common-wealth only, praescribes, and commandeth the observation of those rules, which we call Law: Therefore the Common-wealth is the Legislator. But the Common-wealth is no Person, nor has capacity to doe any thing, but by the Representative, (that is, the Soveraign;) and therefore the Soveraign[8] is the sole Legislator. For the same reason, none can abrogate a Law made, but the Soveraign; because a Law is not abrogated, but by another Law, that forbiddeth it to be put in execution.

And not Subject to Civill Law.

2 The Soveraign of a Common-wealth, °be it an Assembly, or one Man,° is not Subject to the Civill Lawes. For having power to [138] make, and repeale Lawes[9], he may when he pleaseth, free himselfe from that subjection, [10]by repealing those Lawes that trouble him, and making of new; and consequently he was free before.[10] For he is free, that can be free when he will: Nor is it possible for any person to be bound to himselfe; because he that can bind, can release; °and therefore he that is bound to himselfe onely, is not bound.°

Use, a Law not by vertue of Time, but of the Soveraigns consent.

3. When long Use obtaineth the [11]authority[11] of a Law, it is not the Length of Time that maketh the [12]Authority,[12] but the Will of the Soveraign signified by his silence, (for Silence is sometimes an argument of Consent;) and it is no longer Law, then the Soveraign shall be silent therein. And therefore if [13]the Soveraign have a question of Right grounded, not upon his present Will, but upon the Lawes formerly made; the Length of Time shal bring no prejudice to his Right;[13] but the question shal be judged by Equity. For many °unjust°

In qua Definitione ambigui nihil est. Legum autem, alia Civibus statuitur universis; alia certis Provinciis; alia certo hominum generi; alia homini quandoque singulari. Quibus autem Lex ponitur, illis solis Lex est. Neque Injustum facit quisquam, quod non sit contra Legem sibimetipsi positam. Quod autem Signis idoneis declarari ex Legis Natura debeat Lex, manifestum ex eo est, quod injustum nihil est, quod non sit transgressio alicujus Legis. Quicquid ergo à definitione hac inferri potest, negari non debet, quin sit verum. Infero autem primò, Legislatorem in omni Civitate eum esse, sive homo, sive Coetus sit, qui Summam habet Potestatem. Civitatis enim solius est praescribere Civibus Leges. Illa autem neque praescribere, neque dicere aut facere quicquam potest, nisi per Personam ejus, id est per illum, qui Summam habet Potestatem. Is ergo Legislator solus est. Ob eandem rationem solus etiam Legem abrogare potest; quia Lex abrogari non potest, nisi per aliam Legem.

Secundò, is qui habet Summam Potestatem Legibus Civilibus non subjicitur; cum enim arbitrio suo Leges & facit & abrogat, potest quoties visum erit, subjectione illa & molestia se liberare. Legibus ergo ante solutus erat. Liberi enim sunt, qui quando volunt esse, possunt; nec potest quisquam sibiipsi obligari; quia qui obligare, idem liberare potest.

Tertiò, quando consuetudo longa vim obtinuit Legis, non à longitudine temporis vim Legis habet, sed à voluntate ejus, qui Summam habet Potestatem, per Silentium ejus significata; voluntatis enim signum aliquando etiam est Silentium. Neque diutius vim Legis consuetudo habet, quam silentium illud durat. Itaque si quaestio Iuris inter Civem & Summam Potestatem oriatur, longitudo temporis Summae Potestati pro Praejudicio non habebitur; sed quaestio secundum Aequitatem terminabitur. Actiones enim

[13] a question of right arises between a citizen and the sovereign power, the length of time shall not be held prejudicial to the sovereign power;

Actions, and °unjust° Sentences, go [14]uncontrolled[14] [a] a longer time, than any man can remember. And [15]our Lawyers account no Customes Law, but such as are reasonable, and that evill Customes are to be abolished:[15] But the Judgement of what is reasonable, and of what is [16]to be abolished, belongeth to him that maketh the Law, which is the Soveraign Assembly, or Monarch.[16]

The Law of Nature, and the Civill Law contain each other.

4. The Law of Nature, and the Civill Law, [17] contain each other, °and are of equall extent.° For the Lawes of Nature, [18]which consist in[18] Equity, Justice, Gratitude, [19]and other morall Vertues on these depending, in the condition of meer Nature[19] (as I have said before in the end of the 15th Chapter,) are not properly Lawes, but qualities [20]that dispose men to peace, and to obedience. When a Common-wealth is once settled,[b] then are they actually Lawes, and not before; as being then[20] the commands of the Common-wealth; and therefore also Civill Lawes: [21]For it is the Soveraign Power that obliges men to obey them. For in the differences of private men, to declare, what is Equity, what is Justice, and what is morall Vertue, and to make them binding, there is need of the Ordinances of Soveraign Power, and Punishments to be ordained for such as shall break them; which Ordinances are therefore part of the Civill Law. The Law of Nature therefore is a part of the Civill Law in all Common-wealths of the world. Reciprocally also, the Civill Law is a part of the Dictates of Nature. For Justice, that is to say, Performance of Covenant, and giving to every man his own, is a Dictate of the Law of Nature. But every subject in a Common-wealth, hath covenanted to obey the Civill Law, (either one with another, as when they assemble to make a common Representative, or with the Representative it selfe one by one, when subdued by the Sword they promise obedience, that they may receive life;)[21] And therefore Obedience to the Civill Law is part also of the Law of Nature. Civill, and Naturall Law are not different kinds, but different parts of Law; whereof one part being written, is called Civill, the other unwritten, Naturall. [22]But the Right of Nature, that is, the naturall Liberty of man, may by the Civill Law be abridged, and restrained: nay, the end of making Lawes, is no other, but such Restraint; without the which there cannot possibly be any Peace. And Law was brought into the world for nothing else, [139] but to limit the naturall liberty of particular men, in such manner, as they might not hurt, but assist one another, and joyn together against a common Enemy.[22]

Leges propriè dictae non sunt; sed Qualitates. Tum, vero Leges sunt, eaedemque Civiles, quando à Civitate observari imperantur. Leges ergo Naturales etiam Civiles sunt, quod autem omnis Lex Civilis etiam Lex Naturae sit, ex eo patet, quod Pactum violare, & per consequens Legem Civilem transgredi Legis Naturae transgressio est. Itaque ut Legibus Civitatis obediamus, Lex Naturalis est; neque diversa genera Legum sunt Lex Naturae & Civilis, sed diversae partes; quarum una scripta est, quam Civilem, altera non scripta, quam Naturalem vocant. Leges itaque Naturales à Lege Civili non mutantur, neque restringuntur; sed Ius Naturale tantum. [21] . Therefore natural laws are also civil laws, and the fact that every civil law is also a law of nature is obvious from the fact that to break a covenant, and consequently to violate a civil law, is a violation of the law of nature.
[22] Therefore it is not the natural laws that are changed or restricted by the civil law, but only the right of nature. Indeed the end of making civil laws was to restrict natural right, or the right of all men to all things, since, while that right stayed in place, there could be no peace.

Provinciall Lawes are not made by Custome, but by the Soveraign Power.

5. If the Soveraign of one Common-wealth, [23]subdue a People that have lived under other written Lawes, and afterwards govern them by the same Lawes, by which they were governed before; yet those Lawes are the Civill Lawes of the Victor, and not of the Vanquished Common-wealth.[23] For the Legislator is he, not by whose authority the Lawes were first made, but by whose authority they now continue to be Lawes. And therefore where there be divers Provinces, within the Dominion of a Common-wealth, and in those Provinces diversity of Lawes, [24]which commonly are called the Customes of each severall Province, we are not to understand that such Customes have their force, onely from Length of Time; but that they were antiently Lawes written, or otherwise made known, for the Constitutions,[c] and Statutes of their Soveraigns; and are now Lawes, not by vertue of the Praescription of time, but by the Constitutions of their present Soveraigns. But if an unwritten Law, in all the Provinces of a Dominion, shall be generally observed, and no iniquity appear in the use thereof; that Law can be no other but a Law of Nature, equally obliging all man-kind.[24]

Some foolish opinions of Lawyers concerning the making of Lawes.

6. Seeing then all Lawes, written, and unwritten, have their °Authority, and° force, from the Will of the Common-wealth; [25]that is to say, from the Will of the Representative; which in a Monarchy is the Monarch, and in other Common-wealths the Soveraign Assembly; a man may wonder from whence proceed such opinions, as are found in the Books of Lawyers of eminence in severall Common-wealths, directly, or by consequence making the Legislative Power depend on private men, or subordinate Judges. As for example, That the Common Law, hath no Controuler[d] but the Parlament;[e] which is true onely where a Parlament has the Soveraign Power, and cannot be assembled, nor dissolved, but by their own discretion. For if there be a right in any else to dissolve them, there is a right also to controule them, and consequently to controule their controulings. And if there be no such right, then the Controuler of Lawes is not Parlamentum, but Rex in Parlamento.[f] And where a Parlament is Soveraign, if it should assemble never so many, or so wise men, from the Countries subject to them, for whatsoever cause; yet there is no man will believe, that such an Assembly hath thereby acquired to themselves a Legislative Power. Item,[g] that the two arms of a Common-wealth, are Force, and Justice; the first whereof is in the King; the other deposited in the hands of the Parlament. As if a Common-wealth could consist, where the Force were in any hand, which Justice had not the Authority to command and govern.[25]

7. That Law can never be against Reason, our Lawyers are agreed; and that not the Letter, °(that is, every construction of it,)° but °that which is according to° the Intention of the Legislator, is the Law. [26]And it is true: but the doubt is, of whose Reason it is, that shall be received for Law. It is not meant of any private Reason; for [140] then there would be as much contradiction in the Lawes, as there is in the Schooles; nor yet, (as Sr. Ed. Coke makes it,) an Artificiall perfection of Reason, gotten by long study, observation, and experience,[h] (as his was.) For it is possible long study may encrease, and confirm erroneous Sentences:[i] and where men build on false grounds, the more they build, the greater is the ruine: and of those that study, and observe with equall time, and diligence, the reasons and resolutions are, and must remain discordant: and therefore it is not that Juris prudentia,[j] or wisedome of subordinate Judges; but the Reason of this our Artificiall Man the Common-wealth, and his Command, that maketh Law: And the Common-wealth being in their Representative but one Person, there cannot easily arise any contradiction in the Lawes; and when there doth, the same Reason is able, by interpretation, or alteration, to take it away. In all Courts of Justice, the Soveraign (which is the Person of the Common-wealth,) is he that Judgeth: The subordinate Judge, ought to have regard to the reason, which moved his Soveraign to make such Law, that his Sentence may be according thereunto; which then is his Soveraigns Sentence; otherwise it is his own, and an unjust one.[26]

Law made, if not also made known, is no Law.

8. From this, that the Law is a Command, and a Command consisteth in declaration, °or manifestation° of the will of him that commandeth, by voyce, writing, or some other sufficient argument of the same, we may understand, that the Command of the Common-wealth, [27]is Law onely to those, that have means to take notice of it. Over naturall fooles, children, or mad-men there is no Law, no more than over brute beasts; nor are they capable of the title of just, or unjust; because they had never power to make any covenant, or to understand the consequences thereof; and consequently never took upon them to authorise the actions of any Soveraign, as they must do that make to themselves a Common-wealth. And as those from whom Nature, or Accident hath taken away the notice of all Lawes in generall; so also every man, from whom any accident, not proceeding from his own default, hath taken away the means to take notice of any particular Law, is excused, if he observe it not; And to speak properly, that Law is no Law to him.[27] It is therefore necessary, to consider in this place, what arguments, and signes [28]be sufficient for the knowledge of what is the Law; that is to say, what is the will of the Soveraign, as well in Monarchies, as in other formes of government.[28]

Non ergo Iudicum subordinatorum, sed Civitatis, id est ejus, qui habet in Civitate Summam [131] Potestatem Prudentia, Prudentiam facit Legis; & Iudex subordinatus non suam, sed ejus qui habet Summam Potestatem, pro Tribunali Sententiam dicere intelligendus est.

[26] But it is evident that the authority of the law does not depend on the reason of a private man, nor on the skill in the laws of some expert in jurisprudence; for if that were true, there would be no fewer disputes among citizens about the authority of the laws than there are among schoolmen about philosophical and theological questions. Therefore it is not the prudence of subordinate judges that makes the prudence of the law, but that of the sovereign; and a subordinate judge must be understood to give to the court not his own opinion, but that of the sovereign.

[27] that is, the civil law, is law only to those people to whom it has been declared. Therefore, the civil laws do not apply to children or mad-men, who cannot understand commands, do not know what is just or unjust, and do not understand covenants. Nor, therefore, do they apply to those people – although they understand all these things – to whom they have not been declared or promulgated in such a way that they could have known them if they had wanted to.

[28] should be thought sufficient for promulgating the law.

Unwritten Lawes are all of them Lawes of Nature.

And first, if it be a Law that obliges all the [29]Subjects[29] without exception, and is not written, [30]nor otherwise published in such places as they may take notice thereof,[30] it is a Law of Nature. For whatsoever men are to take °knowledge of° for Law, not upon other mens words, but every one from his own reason, must be such as is agreeable [31]to the reason of all men; which no Law can be, but the[31] Law of Nature. The Lawes of Nature therefore need not any publishing, nor Proclamation; [32] as being contained in this one Sentence,[k] [33]approved by all the world, Do not that to another, which thou thinkest unreasonable to be done by another to thy selfe.[33] [l] [141]

Secondly, if it be a Law that obliges [34] only some condition of men, or one particular man, and be not written, nor published by word, then also it is a Law of Nature; [35]and known by the same arguments, and signs, that distinguish those in such a condition, from other Subjects. For whatsoever Law is not written, or some way published by him that makes it Law, can be known no way, but by the reason of him that is to obey it; and is therefore also a Law not only Civill, but Naturall. For Example, if the Soveraign employ[35] a Publique Minister, without written Instructions what to doe; he is obliged to take for Instructions the Dictates of Reason; As [36]if he make a Judge, The Judge is to take notice, that his Sentence ought to be according to the reason of his Soveraign, which being alwaies understood to be Equity, he is bound to it by the Law of Nature: Or if an Ambassador, he is (in all things not conteined in his written Instructions) to take for Instruction that which Reason dictates to be most conducing to his Soveraigns interest; and so of all other Ministers of the Soveraignty, publique and private. All which Instructions of naturall Reason may be comprehended under one name of Fidelity; which is a branch of naturall Justice.[36]

The Law of Nature excepted, it belongeth to the [37] essence of all other Lawes, to be made known, [38]to every man that shall be obliged to obey them, either by word, or writing, or some other act, known to proceed from the Soveraign Authority. For the will of another, cannot be understood, but by his own word, or act, or by conjecture taken from his scope and purpose; which in the person of the Common-wealth, is to be supposed alwaies consonant to Equity and Reason.[38] And in antient time, before letters were in common Nothing is Law where the Legislator cannot be known.

Nor is it enough the Law be [43]written, and published; but also that there be manifest signs, that it proceedeth from the will of the Soveraign. For private men, when they have, or think they have force enough to secure their unjust designes, and convoy[m] them safely to their ambitious ends, may publish for Lawes what they please, without, or against the Legislative Authority. There is therefore requisite, not only a Declaration of the Law, but also sufficient signes of the Author, and Authority. The Author, or[43] Legislator is supposed in every Common-wealth to be evident, because he [44]is the Soveraign, who having been[44] Constituted by the consent of every one, [45]is supposed by every one to be sufficiently known. And though the ignorance, and security[n] of men be such, for the most part, as that when [142] the memory of the first Constitution of their Common-wealth is worn out, they doe not consider, by whose power they use to be defended against their enemies, and to have their industry protected, and to be righted when injury is done them; yet because no man that considers, can make question of it, no excuse can be derived from the ignorance of where the Soveraignty is placed. And it is a Dictate of Naturall Reason, and consequently an evident Law of Nature, that no man ought to weaken that power, the protection whereof he hath himself demanded, or wittingly received against others. Therefore of who is Soveraign, no man, but by his own fault, (whatsoever evill men suggest,) can make any doubt. The difficulty consisteth in the evidence of the Authority derived from him; The removing whereof, dependeth on the knowledge of the publique Registers,[p] publique Counsels, publique Ministers, and publique Seales; by which all Lawes are sufficiently verified; Verifyed, I say, not Authorised: for the Verification, is but the Testimony and Record; not the Authority of the Law; which consisteth in the Command of the Soveraign only.[45]

Neque satis est, ut Lex ipsa à Civibus cognoscatur, sed etiam, ut ab Authoritate processerit illius, qui Summam habet Potestatem. Legislator quidem quis sit, in omni Civitate notum esse supponitur, ex eo quod consensu singulorum Civium omnium constitutus erat; cognoscere autem, quod Lex ab illo, qui Summam habet Potestatem profecta sit, difficilius est; & propterea signis indiget, id est testimoniis, quibus Verificetur, id est verum esse sciatur, Legem à Summa Potestate latam esse; quae quidem signa plerumque sunt, vel Archiva publica, vel Civitatis sigilla, vel Ministri, quibus Authoritas jus dicendi data est per Literas Sigillo publico signatas.

To know that the law has proceeded from the sovereign is, however, more difficult; and therefore it needs signs, that is to say, evidence by which it may be verified (in other words, known for truth that the law was made by the sovereign power). These signs are usually either public archives, or seals of the commonwealth, or ministers who have been given authority, by letters sealed with the public seal, to state the law.

The Law Verifyed by the subordinate Judge.

If therefore a man have a question of Injury, depending on the Law of Nature; [46]that is to say, on common Equity; the Sentence of the Judge, that by Commission hath Authority to take cognisance of such causes, is a sufficient Verification of the Law of Nature in that individuall case. For though the advice of one that professeth the study of the Law, be usefull for the avoyding of contention; yet it is but advice: tis the Judge must tell men what is Law, upon the hearing of the Controversy.[46]

By the Publique Registers.

But when the [47]question is of injury, or crime, upon a written Law; every man by recourse to the Registers, by himself, or others, may (if he will) be sufficiently enformed, before he doe such injury, or commit the crime, whither it be an injury, or not: Nay he ought to doe so: For when a man doubts whether the act he goeth about, be just, or injust; and may informe himself, if he will; the doing is unlawfull. In like manner, he that supposeth himself injured, in a case determined by the written Law, which he may by himself, or others see and consider; if he complaine before he consults with the Law, he does unjustly, and bewrayeth[q] a disposition rather to vex other men, than to demand his own right.[47]

By Letters Patent, and Publique Seale.

If the question be of Obedience to [48] a publique Officer; °To have seen° his Commission, with the Publique Seale, [49]and heard it read; or to have had the means to be informed of it, if a man would, is a sufficient Verification of his Authority. For every man is obliged to doe his best endeavour, to informe himself of all written Lawes, that may concerne his own future actions.[49]

The Interpretation of the Law dependeth on the Soveraign Power.

The Legislator known; and the Lawes, °either by writing, or by the light of Nature, sufficiently published;° there wanteth yet another °very materiall° circumstance to make them obligatory. °For it is not the Letter, but the Intendment, or Meaning;° that is to say, the authentique Interpretation of the Law [50](which is the sense of the Legislator,) in which the nature of the Law consisteth;[50] And therefore [143] the Interpretation of all Lawes dependeth on the [51]Authority Soveraign; and the Interpreters can be none but those, which the Soveraign, (to whom only the Subject oweth obedience) shall appoint. For else, by the craft of an Interpreter, the Law may be made to beare a sense, contrary to that of the Soveraign; by which means the Interpreter becomes the Legislator.[51]

All Lawes need Interpretation.

All Laws, written, and unwritten, have need of Interpretation. The °unwritten° Law of Nature, though it be easy to [52]such, as without partiality, and passion, make use of their naturall reason, and therefore leaves the violaters thereof without excuse; yet considering there be very few, perhaps none, that in some cases are not blinded by self love, or some other passion, it is now become[52] of all Laws the most obscure; and has consequently the greatest need of able Interpreters. The written Laws, if they be short, [53]are easily mis-interpreted,[53] from the divers significations of a word, or two: if long they be more obscure by the diverse significations of many words: in so much as no written Law, delivered in few, or many words, can be well understood, [54]without a perfect understanding[54] of the finall causes, for which the Law was made; the knowledge of which finall causes is in the Legislator[55]. To him [56]therefore there can not be any knot in the Law, insoluble; either by finding out the ends, to undoe it by; or else by making what ends he will, (as Alexander did with his sword in the Gordian knot,)[r] by the Legislative power; which no other Interpreter can doe.[56]

The Authenticall Interpretation of Law is not that of writers.

The Interpretation of the Lawes of Nature, in a [57] Common-wealth, dependeth not on the [58]books of Morall Philosophy. The Authority of writers, without the Authority of the Common-wealth, maketh not their opinions Law, be they never so true. That which I have written in this Treatise, concerning the Morall Vertues, and of their necessity, for the procuring, and maintaining peace, though it bee evident Truth, is not therefore presently[s] Law; but because in all Common-wealths in the world, it is part of the Civill Law: For though it be naturally reasonable; yet it is by the Soveraigne Power that it is Law: Otherwise, it were a great errour, to call the Lawes of Nature unwritten Law; whereof wee see so many volumes published,[t] and in them so many contradictions of one another, and of themselves.[58]

The Interpreter of the Law is the Judge giving sentence vivâ voce in every particular case.

The [59]Interpretation of the[59] Law of Nature, is the Sentence of the [60]Judge constituted by the Soveraign Authority, to heare and determine such controversies, as depend thereon;[60] and consisteth in the application of the Law to the present case. °For in the act of Judicature, the Judge doth no more but consider, whither the demand of the party, be consonant to naturall reason, and Equity; and the Sentence he giveth, is therefore the Interpretation of the Law of Nature;° which Interpretation is Authentique; not because it is his [61]private Sentence; but because he giveth it by Authority of the Soveraign, whereby it becomes the Soveraigns Sentence; which is Law for that time, to the parties pleading.[61] [144]

Leges omnes Scriptae & Non Scriptae Interpretatione indigent. Leges Naturae, quanquam intellectu faciles sint illis quidem, qui causas cognoscunt alienas; difficiles tamen sunt illis, quorum ipsorum causae cognoscuntur, & fortasse Legum omnium difficilimae, & maximè opus habent Interpretatione. In Legibus Scriptis, si breves sint, unius tamen aut duarum vocum ambiguitas facere potest, ut sint obscurae; si longae sint, obscuriores eas reddit multarum vocum ambiguitas. Itaque Lex Scripta nulla, sive multis sive paucis verbis contineatur, intelligi potest nisi ex Legis ipsius causis Finalibus; quarum causarum cognitio in Legislatore solo est; & illi soli difficultates Legum, nodique aut extricando aut secando solubiles sunt.

In Civitate constituta, Legum Naturae Interpretatio non à Doctoribus & Scriptoribus Moralis Philosophiae dependet, sed ab Authoritate [133] Civitatis. Doctrinae quidem verae esse possunt; sed Authoritas non Veritas facit Legem.

Legis cujuscunque Naturalis Interpretatio recta, Sententia est ejus qui Summam habet Potestatem, vel ejus, qui Authoritatem ab eo habet causas cognoscendi; qui tunc Interpretatur cum Legem Facto applicat. Interpretatio autem illa Authentica est, non quia sua, sed quia Civitatis Sententia est; & Lex fit illis inter quos Lege agebatur, non autem Civibus universis.

The Sentence[u] of a Judge, does not bind him, or another Judge to give like Sentence in like Cases ever after.

But because there is no Judge Subordinate, nor Soveraign, but may erre [62]in a Judgement of Equity;[62] if afterward in another like case he [63]find it more consonant to Equity to give a contrary Sentence, he is obliged to doe it.[63] No mans error becomes his own Law; nor obliges him to persist in [64]it. Neither (for the same reason) becomes it a Law to other Judges, though sworn to follow it. For though a wrong Sentence given by authority of the Soveraign, if he know and allow it,[64] in such Lawes as are mutable, be a constitution[v] of a new Law, °in cases, in which every little circumstance is the same;° yet in Lawes immutable, such as are the Lawes of Nature, they are no Lawes to the same, or other Judges, in the like cases for ever after. [65]Princes succeed one another; and one Iudge passeth, another commeth; nay, Heaven and Earth shall passe; but not one title[w] of the Law of Nature shall passe;[x] for it is the Eternall Law of God. Therefore all the Sentences of precedent Judges that have ever been, cannot all together make a Law contrary to naturall Equity: Nor any Examples of former Judges, can warrant an unreasonable Sentence, or discharge the present Judge of the trouble of studying what is Equity (in the case he is to Judge,) from the principles of his own naturall reason.[65] For example sake, 'Tis against the Law of Nature, To punish the Innocent; and Inno-

[65] Civil laws, and all civil things, pass away and change; but the natural laws cannot pass away or change, since they are divine. In judgements, therefore, precedents should not prevail, nor can they justify an iniquitous sentence. So it is incumbent on every judge to give his sentence, based on his own conscience and natural reason, and his own skill concerning what is equitable and what is good – not based on the precedents set by previous judges.

Quoniam autem Iudex nullus est neque Subordinatus neque Supremus, qui interdum non erret & iniquam Sententiam ferat; idem si postea in quaestione simili errorem suum cognoscat, sententiam ferre aequiorem obligatur. Suus enim sibi error Lex non est, neque eum obligat ad persistendum in iniquitate sua. Multo minus Iudices alios obligabit. Quanquam enim Sententia, etiam iniqua, per Authoritatem Summam tacitè probata in Legibus quae mutabiles sunt, instar novae Legis sit; in Legibus tamen immutabilibus, quales sunt Leges Naturales, transire in Legem non potest, ut obliget ad similem sententiam semper ferendam, eundem aut alium Iudicem. Leges Civiles, & Civilia omnia transeunt & mutantur; sed Leges Naturales, cum sint divinae transire aut mutari non possunt. In Iudiciis ergo Praejudicia valere non debent, neque sententiam iniquam excusare possunt. Vnicuique ergo Iudici incumbit, ut sententiam ferat ex sua ipsius Conscientia, & Ratione Naturali, peritiaque propria circa Aequum & Bonum, nec à Praejudiciis Iudicum praecedentium. Exempli causa puniri innocentem, contra Legem Naturae est. Innocens autem est, qui coram Iudice absolutus est. Accusacent is he that °acquitteth himselfe Judicially, and° is acknowledged for Innocent by the Judge. °Put the case now, that° a man is accused of a capitall crime, and seeing the power and malice of some enemy, and the frequent [66]corruption and partiality[66] of Judges, runneth away for feare of [67]the event,[67 y] and afterwards is taken, and brought to a legall triall, and [68]maketh it sufficiently appear, he was not guilty of the crime, and being thereof acquitted, is nevertheless condemned to lose his goods; this is a manifest condemnation of the Innocent. I say therefore, that there is no place in the world, where this can be an interpretation of a Law of Nature, or be made a Law by the Sentences of precedent Judges, that had done the same. For he that judged it first, judged unjustly; and no Injustice can be a pattern of Judgement to succeeding Judges. A written Law may forbid innocent men to fly, and they may be punished for flying: But that flying for feare of injury, should be taken for presumption of guilt, after a man is already absolved of the crime Judicially, is contrary to the nature of a Presumption,[z] which hath no place after Judgement given. Yet this is set down by a great Lawyer for the common Law of England. If a man (saith he) that is Innocent, be accused of Felony, and for feare flyeth for the same; albeit he judicially acquitteth himselfe of the Felony; yet if it be found that he fled for the Felony, he shall notwithstanding his Innocency, Forfeit all his goods, chattells, debts, and duties. For as to the Forfeiture of them, the Law will admit no proofe against the Presumption in Law, grounded upon his flight.[aa] Here you see, An Innocent man, Judicially acquitted, notwithstanding his Innocency, (when no written Law forbad him to fly) after his acquitall, upon a Presumption in Law, condemned to lose all the goods he hath. If the Law ground upon his flight a Presumption of the fact,[ab] (which was Capitall,) the Sentence [145] ought to have been Capitall: if the Presumption were not of the Fact, for what then ought he to lose his goods? This therefore is no Law of England; nor is the condemnation grounded upon a Presumption of Law, but upon the Presumption[ac] of the Judges. It is also against Law, to say that no Proofe shall be admitted against a Presumption of Law.[ad] For all Judges, Soveraign and subordinate, if they refuse to heare Proofe, refuse to do Justice: for though the Sentence be Just, yet the Judges that condemn without hearing the Proofes offered, are Unjust Judges; and their Presumption is but Prejudice; which no man ought to bring with him to the Seat of Justice, whatsoever precedent judgements, or examples he shall pretend to follow. There be other things of this nature, wherein mens Judgements have been perverted, by trusting to Precedents: but this is enough to shew, that though the Sentence of the Judge, be a Law to the party pleading, yet it is no Law to any Judge, that shall succeed him in that Office.[68]

[66] iniquity [67] being condemned,

[68] pleads his cause, and is acquitted. But because there has been a custom in the commonwealth, based on many precedents established by previous judges, that a man who has fled should have all his goods confiscated even if he is later acquitted, he is deprived of his goods. I deny that this custom can be made law by precedents, no matter how many or who made them. For to punish the innocent is forbidden by the eternal and divine law of nature. No law forbade him to flee for fear of powerful enemies. Moreover, being acquitted, he was innocent. The acquittal removed the presumption of guilt. Thus he was deprived of all his goods inequitably and against the law of nature. Therefore it is the mark of either an unskilled judge or an iniquitous one to have regard to precedents in his judgements. Also inequitable is that lawyers' axiom, 'No proof is admissible against a presumption in law';[ad] for those judges who refuse to hear what an accused man puts forward in his defence are unjust.

[ac] Here Hobbes apparently brings in the meaning of 'presumption' as arrogance, effrontery (OED, 'presumption', n., 1).

[ad] This 'axiom' was much less general than Hobbes's remark in the Latin implies. In the Roman Law (and canon law) tradition, there were certain exceptional cases of presumptions in law, called 'praesumptio iuris et de iure', to which a counter-proof was not admitted; but normally presumptions in law were subject to counter-proof, and the maxim usually cited in the English Common Law tradition was 'stabit praesumptio donec probatur in contrarium' ('the presumption shall stand until it is proved to the contrary') (see Wingate, Maximes of Reason, pp. 712–16).

In like manner, when question is of the Meaning of written Lawes, he is not the Interpreter of them, that writeth a Commentary upon them. For Commentaries are commonly more [69]subject to cavill,[69] than the Text; and therefore need other Commentaries; and so there will be no end of such Interpretation. And therefore unlesse there be an Interpreter authorised by the Soveraign, from which the subordinate Judges are not to recede,[ae] the Interpreter can be no other than the [70]ordinary[70] [af] Judges, in the same manner, as they are in cases of the [71]unwritten Law;[71] and their Sentences[ag] are to be taken by them that plead, for Lawes in that particular case; but not to bind other Judges, in like cases to give like judgements. °For a Judge may erre in the Interpretation even of written Lawes; but no errour of a subordinate Judge, can change the Law, which is the generall Sentence of the Soveraigne.°

The difference between the Letter and Sentence of the Law.

[72]In written Lawes, men[72] use to make a difference between the Letter, and the Sentence[ah] [73]of the Law: And when by the Letter, is meant whatsoever can be gathered from the bare words,[73] 'tis well distinguished. [74]For the significations of almost all words, are either in themselves, or in the metaphoricall use of them, ambiguous; and may be drawn in argument, to make many senses; but there is onely one sense of the Law. But if by the Letter, be meant the literall sense, then the Letter, and the Sentence or intention of the Law, is all one. For the literall sense is that, which the Legislator intended, should by the letter of the Law be signified. Now the Intention of the Legislator is alwayes supposed to be Equity: For it were a great contumely for a Judge to think otherwise of the Soveraigne. He ought therefore, if the Word of the Law doe not fully authorise a reasonable Sentence, to supply[ai] it with the Law of Nature;[74] °or if the case be difficult, to respit[aj] Judgement till he have received more ample authority. For Example, a written Law ordaineth, that he which is thrust out of his house by force, shall be restored by force: It happens that a man by negligence leaves his house empty, and returning is kept out by force, in which case there is no speciall Law ordained. It is evident, [146] that this case is contained in the same Law: for else there is no remedy for him at all; which is to be supposed against the Intention of the Legislator. Again, the word of the Law, commandeth to Judge according to the Evidence: A man is accused falsly of a fact,[ak] which the Judge saw himself done by another; and not by him that is accused. In this case neither shall the Letter of the Law be followed to the condemnation of the Innocent, nor shall the Judge give Sentence against the evidence of the Witnesses; because the Letter of the Law is to the contrary: but procure of the Soveraign that another be made Judge, and himself Witnesse. So that the incommodity that follows

Similiter quando sententia quaeritur Legis scriptae, Interpres non erit, qui in Legem Commentarios scribit. Commentarii enim obscuriores plerumque sunt ipso Textu; & proinde opus habent Commentariis; adeo ut interpretandi nullus sit finis. Nisi ergo Authoritate Summae Potestatis Interpres aliquis constitutus sit, à cujus Interpretatione Iudicibus Subordinatis discedere non liceat, ipsi Iudices Subordinati Interpretes erunt, ut in Legibus Naturalibus; & eorum Sententiae ad praesentis litis decisionem, pro Legibus habendae erunt. Differentiam inter Literam & Sententiam ponere solent Scriptores. [74] But how can one know what the legislator wished to be understood by the words of a law? It is known from the fact that the legislator (that is, the person of the commonwealth) must always be understood to wish that which is equitable. So, if the words themselves do not suggest an equitable meaning, the laws of nature must be consulted; otherwise there could be no remedy against the injury, which must be supposed to be contrary to the will of the legislator.

The abilities required in a Judge.

The abilities required in a good Interpreter of the Law, that is to say, in a good Judge, are not the same with those of [75]an[75] Advocate; namely the study of the Lawes. For a Judge, as he ought to take notice of the Fact,[al] from none but the Witnesses; so also he ought to [76]take notice of[76] the Law, from nothing but the Statutes, and Constitutions[am] of the [77]Soveraign, alledged[an] in the pleading, or declared to him by some that have authority from the Soveraign Power to declare them; and need not take care before-hand, what hee shall Judge; for it shall bee given him what hee shall say concerning the Fact, by Witnesses; and what hee shall say in point of Law, from those that shall in their pleadings shew it, and by authority interpret it upon the place.[77] °The Lords of Parlament in England were Judges, and most difficult causes have been heard and determined by them; yet few of them were much versed in the study of the Lawes, and fewer had made profession of them: and though they consulted with Lawyers, that were appointed to be present there for that purpose; yet they alone had the authority of giving Sentence. In like manner, in the ordinary trialls of Right, Twelve men of the common People, are the Judges, and give Sentence, not onely of the Fact, but of the Right; and pronounce simply for the Complaynant, or for the Defendant; that is to say, are Judges not onely of the Fact, but also of the Right: and in a question of crime, not onely determine whether done, or not done; but also whether it be Murder, Homicide, Felony, Assault, and the like, which are determinations of Law: but because they are not supposed to know the Law of themselves, there is one that hath Authority to enforme them of it, in the particular case they are to Judge of. But yet if they judge not according to that he tells them, they are not subject thereby to any penalty; unlesse it be made appear, they did it against their consciences, or had been corrupted by reward.°

The things that make a good Judge, [78]or good Interpreter of the Lawes, are, first,[78] A right understanding of that principall Law of Nature called Equity; which depending not on the reading of other mens Writings, but on the goodnesse of a mans own naturall [147] Reason, and Meditation, is presumed to be in those most, that have [79]had most leisure, and had the most inclination[79] to meditate thereon. Divisions of Law.

The difference and division of the Lawes, has been made in divers manners, according to the different methods, of those men that have written of them. °For it is a thing that dependeth not on Nature, but on the scope of the Writer; and is subservient to every mans proper method.° In the Institutions of Justinian, we find seven sorts of Civill Lawes.[ao] 1. The Edicts, Constitutions,[ap] and Epistles of the Prince, that is, of the Emperour; because the whole power of the people was in him. Like these, are the [81]Proclamations of the Kings of England.[81]

2. The Decrees of the whole people of Rome °(comprehending the Senate,) when they were put to the Question by the Senate.° These were Lawes, at first, by the vertue of the Soveraign Power residing in the people; and such of them as by the Emperours were not abrogated, remained Lawes by the Authority Imperiall. °For all Lawes that bind, are understood to be Lawes by his authority that has power to repeale them.° Somewhat like to these Lawes, are the Acts of Parliament °in England.°

3. The Decrees of the Common people [82] (excluding the Senate,) °when they were put to the question by the Tribune of the people.° For such of them as were not abrogated by the Emperours, remained Lawes °by the Authority Imperiall. Like to these, were the Orders of the House of Commons in England.°

4. Senatûs consulta, the Orders of the Senate; because when the people of Rome grew so numerous, as it was inconvenient to assemble them; it was thought fit by the Emperour, that men should Consult the Senate, in stead of the people: And these have some resemblance with the Acts of [83] Counsell.

5. The Edicts of Praetors, [84]and (in some Cases) of the Aediles:[aq] such as are the Chiefe Justices in the Courts of England.[84]

6. Responsa Prudentum; which were the Sentences, and Opinions of those Lawyers, to whom the Emperour gave Authority to °interpret the Law, and to° give answer to such as in matter of Law demanded their advice; [85]which Answers, the Judges in giving Judgement were obliged by the Constitutions[ar] of the Emperour to observe: And should be like the Reports of Cases Judged, if other Judges be by the Law of England bound to observe them. For the Judges of the Common Law of England, are not properly Judges, but Juris Consulti;[as] of whom the Judges, who are either the Lords, or Twelve men of the Country,[at] are in point of Law to ask advice.[85]

7. Also, Unwritten Customes, [86](which in their own nature are an imitation of Law,)[86] by the tacite consent of the Emperour, °in case they be not contrary to the Law of Nature, are very[au] Lawes.°

Another division of Lawes, is into Naturall and Positive. Naturall [148] are those which have been Lawes from all Eternity; [87]and are called not onely Naturall, but also Morall Lawes; consisting in the Morall Vertues, as Justice, Equity, and all habits of the mind that conduce to Peace, and Charity; of which I have already spoken in the fourteenth and fifteenth Chapters.[87]

Positive, are those which have not been from Eternity; but have been made Lawes by the Will of those that have had the Soveraign Power °over others; and are either written, or made known to men, by some other argument of the Will of their Legislator.°

Another Division of Law.

Again, of Positive Lawes, some are Humane, some Divine: And of Humane positive lawes, some are Distributive, some Penal. Distributive are those that determine the Rights of the [88]Subjects, declaring to every man what it is, by which he acquireth and holdeth a propriety in lands, or goods, and a right or liberty of action: and these speak to all the Subjects.[88] Penal are those, which declare, what Penalty shall be inflicted on those that violate the Law; and speak [89] to the Ministers and Officers ordained for execution. [90]For though every one ought to be informed of the Punishments ordained beforehand for their transgression; neverthelesse the Command is not addressed to the Delinquent, (who cannot be supposed will faithfully punish himselfe,) but to publique Ministers appointed to see the Penalty executed. And these Penal Lawes are for the most part written together with the Lawes Distributive; and are sometimes called Judgements. For all Lawes are generall Judgements, or Sentences[av] of the Legislator; as also every particular Judgement, is a Law to him, whose case is Judged.[90]

Divine Positive Law how made known to be Law.

Divine Positive Lawes (for Naturall Lawes °being Eternall, and Universall,° are all Divine,) are those, which being the Commandements of God, (not from all Eternity, nor universally addressed to all men, but onely to a certain people, °or to certain persons,°) are declared for such, by those whom

God hath authorised to declare them. But this Authority [91]of man to declare what be these Positive Lawes of God,[91] how can it be known? God may command a man by a supernaturall way, to deliver [92] Lawes to other men. But because it is of the essence of Law, that he who is to be obliged, be assured of the Authority of him that declareth it, which we cannot [93]naturally take notice[93] to be from God, [94]How can a man without supernaturall Revelation be assured of the Revelation received by the declarer? and how can he be bound to obey them? For the first question, how a man can be assured of the Revelation of another, without a Revelation particularly to himselfe, it is evidently impossible:[94] For though a man may be induced to believe [95]such Revelation,[95] from the Miracles they see him doe, or from seeing the Extraordinary sanctity of his life, or from seeing the Extraordinary wisedome, or Extraordinary felicity of his Actions, all which are [96] marks of Gods [o]extraordinary[o] favour; yet they [97]are not assured evidences of speciall Revelation. Miracles are Marvellous workes: but that which is marvellous to one, may not be so to another. Sanctity may be feigned; and the visible felicities of this world, are most often the work of God by Naturall, [149] and ordinary causes. And therefore no man can infallibly know by naturall reason, that another has had a supernaturall revelation of Gods will; but only a beliefe; every one (as the signs thereof shall appear greater, or lesser) a firmer, or a weaker belief.[97]

But [98]for the second, how he can be bound to obey them; it is not so hard. For if the Law declared, be not against the Law of Nature (which is undoubtedly Gods Law) and he undertake to obey it, he is bound by his own act; bound I say to obey it, but not bound to believe it: for mens beliefe, and interiour cogitations, are not subject to the commands, but only to the operation of God, ordinary, or extraordinary. Faith of Supernaturall Law, is not a fulfilling, but only an assenting to the same; and not a duty that we exhibite to God, but a gift which God freely giveth to whom he pleaseth; as also Unbelief is not a breach of any of his Lawes; but a rejection of them all, except the Laws Naturall. But this that I say, will be made yet cleerer, by the Examples, and Testimonies concerning this point in holy Scripture.[98] The Covenant

Authoritas autem declarandi Leges Divinas ita ut Obligatoriae sint, unde cognosci potest? Modo quidem supernaturali, homini alicui ut Leges Divinas aliis Praedicet Imperare potest Deus. Sed quia de Essentia Legis est, ut neminem obliget qui Praedicantis Authoritatem, [136] quod à Deo sit, scire non potest, unde oritur obediendi obligatio? Quid Deus aliis dicat scire non possumus naturaliter; neque sine Revelatione Divina nobis concessa, supernaturaliter. Quanquam enim à Deo Revelatum esse alicui aliquid credere inducatur aliquis, vel propter Miracula, quae ab eo facta esse viderit, vel propter egregiam Sanctitatem, vel egregiam Sapientiam, vel propter egregiam felicitatem, quae omnia gratiae divinae signa sunt satis magna, certitudinem tamen non efficiunt. Miracula enim ex quo tempore nobis Christianis positae sunt Leges Divinae, cessaverunt. Miracula narrantibus credere non obligamur. Etiam ipsa Miracula non omnibus Miracula sunt.

Caeterum ut Divina Supernaturalia Praedicantibus obedire aliquando, & alicubi debeamus, causa in promptu est; Nempe si ea quae Praedicant pro Legibus haberi jusserit Civitas. Est enim de Lege Naturali, quae Divina etiam est, ut in iis omnibus quae jusserit Civitas, Civitati obediamus, quanquam non, ut credamus. Credere enim animi actus est, non à Deo jussus sed factus, quem quando & quibus vult, Deus dat negatque; & Non credere, Legum Divinarum Positivarum, Negatio, non Transgressio est. [94] whence does the obligation to obey them arise? We cannot know naturally what God says to others; nor supernaturally, unless we have been given a divine revelation.

[95] that something has been revealed to someone by God,

[96] ^ sufficient [or: fairly great]

[97] do not make it certain. For miracles ceased from the moment divine laws were instituted for us Christians. We are not obliged to believe those who report miracles. Even miracles themselves are not miracles to everyone.

[98] the reason why we should sometimes and in some places obey those who proclaim divine supernatural things is to hand: namely, if the commonwealth has commanded us to take what they proclaim as laws. For it is dictated by natural law, which is also divine, that in all those things that the commonwealth has commanded, we should obey – though not that we should believe. For to believe is an act of the mind, not commanded by God, but made to happen by him, which he gives (or denies) when and to whom he wishes; and unbelief is not a breach of the divine positive laws, but a denial of them.

God made with Abraham (in a Supernaturall manner) was thus, This is the
Gen. 17. 10. Covenant which thou shalt observe between Me and Thee and thy Seed after thee. [99]Abrahams Seed had not this revelation, nor were yet in being; yet they are a party to the Covenant, and bound to obey what Abraham should declare to them for Gods Law; which they could not be, but in vertue of the obedience they owed to their Parents; who (if they be Subject to no other earthly power, as here in the case of Abraham) have Soveraign power over their children, and servants.[99] Againe, where God saith [100]to Abraham, In thee shall all Nations of the earth be blessed: For I know thou wilt command thy children, and thy house after thee to keep the way of the Lord, and to observe Righteousnesse and Judgement,[100] [aw] it is manifest, the obedience [101]of[101] his Family, who had no Revelation, depended on [102]their[102] former obligation to obey their Soveraign. At Mount Sinai Moses only went up to God; the people were forbidden to approach on paine of death; yet were they bound to obey °all that Moses declared to them for Gods Law.° Upon what ground, [103]but on this submission of their own,[103] Speak thou to us, and we will heare thee; but let not God speak to us, lest we dye?[ax] By which two places it sufficiently appeareth, that in [104]a Common-wealth, a subject that has no certain and assured Revelation particularly to himself[104] concerning the Will of God, is to obey for such, the [105]Command[105] of the Common-wealth: for if [106]men were at liberty, to take[106] for Gods Commandements, their own dreams, and fancies, or the dreams and fancies of private men; scarce two men would agree upon what is Gods Commandement; [107]and yet in respect of[ay] them, every man would[107] despise the Commandements of the Common-wealth. [99] This covenant could not have been revealed to Abraham's seed, who did not yet exist. So why were the Israelites obliged to take as divine law what had been declared as divine law by Abraham, unless it was because Abraham had sovereign power over his children and servants?

supernaturali cum Abrahamo Pactus est Deus tale est: Foedus meum inter me & te & semen tuum post te, quod servabitis hoc est. Semini Abrahami nondum existenti Pactum hoc revelatum esse non potuit. Quare ergo pro Lege Divina habere obligati fuerunt Israëlitae, id quod pro Lege divina ab Abrahamo declaratum est, nisi quia in filios & servos suos summam habuerit Abrahamus Potestatem? Rursus ubi Deus de Abrahamo loquens (Gen. 18. 18.) In eo, dicit, benedicendae sunt omnes gentes terrae. Nam agnovi eum, ut quum praeceperit filiis suis & familiae suae post se, etiam observent viam Iehovae, &c. Manifestum est obedientiam Abrahamo à familia sua debitam dependisse ab obedientia antè ipsi debita ut Summam habenti in ipsos filios & servos suos Potestatem. Nulla enim Familiae facta est Revelatio Divina. In montem Sinai ad Deum ascendit solus Moses; populus ne ascenderet vetitus est ne moreretur. Obligabatur tamen. Cur? quia ipsi Mosi promisserant facere omnia quae imperaret, dixerantque loquere tu nobiscum & audiemus; sed ne loquatur nobiscum Deus, ut non moriamur.[ax] Ex quibus duobus locis, satis constat, in omni Civitate, Civem cui non sit facta Divinae voluntatis Revelatio certa & immediata, debere pro voluntate Divina, Legibus obedire Civitatis. Nam si pro mandatis Dei, sua vel privatorum hominum quorumcunque somnia, & Phantasmata Cives sumerent, vix duo essent, qui de mandatis Dei inter [137] se non dissentirent, imò etiam Mandata Civitatis non contemnerent. Dico ergo, in that in all things not contrary to the Morall Law, (that is to say, to the Law of Nature,) all [108]Subjects[108] are bound to obey that for divine Law, which is declared to be so, by the Lawes of the Common-wealth. Which also is evident °to any mans reason;° for whatsoever is not against the Law of Nature, may be made [109]Law in the name of them [150] that have[109] the Soveraign power; °and there is no reason men should be the lesse obliged by it, when tis propounded in the name of God.° Besides, there is no place in the world where [110]men are[110] permitted to pretend other Commandements of God, than are declared for such by the Common-wealth. Christian States punish those that revolt from Christian Religion, and all other States, [111]those that set up any Religion by them forbidden. For in whatsoever is not regulated by the Common-wealth, tis Equity (which is the Law of Nature, and therefore an eternall Law of God) that every man equally enjoy his liberty.[111]

Another division of Lawes.

There is also another distinction of Laws, into Fundamentall, and not Fundamentall: °but I could never see in any Author, what a Fundamentall Law signifieth. Neverthelesse one may very reasonably distinguish Laws in that manner.°

A Fundamentall Law what.

For a Fundamentall Law in every Common-wealth is that, which being taken away, the Common-wealth [112]faileth, and is utterly dissolved; as a building whose Foundation is destroyed. And therefore a Fundamentall Law is that, by which Subjects are bound to uphold whatsoever power is given to the Soveraign, whether a Monarch, or a Soveraign Assembly, without which the Common-wealth cannot stand; such as is the power of War and Peace, of Judicature, of Election of Officers, and of doing whatsoever he shall think necessary for the Publique good. Not Fundamentall is that, the abrogating whereof, draweth not with it the dissolution of the Common-Wealth; such as are the Lawes concerning Controversies between subject and subject.[112] Thus much of the Division of Lawes.

[112] is dissolved. Now, the one fundamental law is that individual citizens should give obedience to the person of the commonwealth, that is, to the sovereign. For if that is taken away, there is no commonwealth; but while it holds, the commonwealth remains.

rebus omnibus Legi Morali, id est Legi Naturae non contrariis, Cives omnes obligari ut pro Lege Divina habeant, quicquid à Lege Civili pro Lege Divina declaratur. Manifestum enim est, id quod non est contra Legem Naturalem, fieri posse à Summa Potestate Legem Civilem. Neque in ulla parte orbis Terrarum permissum est, aut fuit Civibus Mandata Divina alia factis suis praetendere, praeter ea, quae à Civitate approbantur. Et ut Civitates Christianae, deficientes à Religione Christiana, ita Civitates non Christianae, à Religione sua deficientes puniri solent.

Distinxerunt Leges alii, in Fundamentales, & non Fundamentales. Fundamentalis in unaquaque Civitate illa est, quâ sublatâ Civitas dissolvitur. Lex autem unica Fundamentalis est, ut singuli Cives Personae Civitatis, id est Summam habenti Potestatem obedientiam praestent. Nam eâ sublatâ, Civitas nulla est; ea stante Civitas manet. De Divisione Legum tantum esto.

Difference between Law and Right:

I find the words Lex Civilis, and Jus Civile, that is to say, Law and Right Civil, promiscuously used [113]for the same thing, even in the most learned[113] Authors; which neverthelesse ought not to be so. For Right is Liberty, namely [114]that Liberty which the Civil Law leaves us:[114] But Civill Law is an Obligation; and takes from us [115] the Liberty which the Law of Nature gave us. Nature gave a Right to every man to [116]secure himselfe by his own strength, and to invade a suspected neighbour, by way of prevention:[116] but the Civill Law takes away that Liberty, in all cases where the protection of the Law may be safely stayd for. °Insomuch as Lex and Jus, are as different as Obligation and Liberty.°

And between a Law and a Charter.

°Likewise Lawes and Charters are taken promiscuously for the same thing. Yet Charters are Donations of the Soveraign; and not Lawes, but exemptions from Law. The phrase of a Law is Jubeo, Injungo, I Command, and Enjoyn: the phrase of a Charter is Dedi, Concessi, I have Given, I have Granted: but what is given or granted, to a man, is not forced upon him, by a Law. A Law may be made to bind All the Subjects of a Common-wealth: a Liberty, or Charter is only to One man, or some One part of the people. For to say all the people of a Common-wealth, have Liberty in any case whatsoever; is to say, that in such case, there hath been no Law made; or else having been made, is now abrogated.°

CHAP. XXVII.

Of CRIMES, EXCUSES, and EXTENUATIONS.

Sinne what.

[1]A Sinne, is not onely a Transgression of a Law, but also any Contempt of the Legislator. For such Contempt, is[1] a breach of all his Lawes at once. And therefore [2] may consist, not onely in the Commission of a Fact,[a] or in the Speaking of Words by the Lawes forbidden, or in the Omission of what the Law commandeth, but also in the Intention, or purpose to transgresse. [o]For the purpose to breake the Law, is some degree of Contempt of him, to whom it belongeth to see it executed.[o] To be delighted in the Imagination onely, of being possessed of another mans goods, servants, or wife, without any intention [3] to take them from him by force, or fraud, is no [4] breach of the Law, that sayth, Thou shalt not covet:[b] nor is the pleasure a man may have in imagining, or dreaming of the death of him, from whose life he expecteth nothing but [5]dammage, and displeasure, a Sinne; but the resolving to put some Act in execution, that tendeth thereto.[5] For to be pleased in the fiction of [6]that, which would please a man if it were reall, is a Passion so adhaerent to the Nature both of man, and every other living creature, as to make it a Sinne, were to make Sinne of being a man. The consideration of this, has made[6] me think them too severe, both to themselves, and others, that maintain, that the First motions of the mind, [7](though checked with the fear of God) be Sinnes.[c] But I confesse it is safer to erre on that hand, than on the other.[7]

A Crime what.

[8]A CRIME, is a sinne, consisting in the Committing (by Deed, or Word) of that which the Law forbiddeth, or the Omission of what it hath commanded. So that every Crime is a sinne; but not every sinne[8] a Crime. To intend to steale, or kill, is a sinne, though it never appeare in Word, or Fact: for God that seeth the thoughts of man, can lay it to his charge: but till it appear by some thing done, or said, [9]by which the intention may be argued by a humane

CAPVT XXVII.

De Criminibus, Excusationibus, & Extenuationibus.

In Transgressione Legis non modo Peccatum inest, sed etiam Legislatoris contemptio aliqua, quae Legum ejus simul omnium instar violationis habita est. Peccatum ergo est, non solum quod factum, dictum, aut neglectum est contra Legem, sed etiam ipsa transgrediendi Intentio, sive propositum. Si quis tamen Bona, Servos, Uxorem videns proximi sui, frui illis, cum delectatione imaginatus tantum fuerit absque omni intentione vel consilio per fraudem aut vim ea occupandi, Peccatum non est, neque Praecepti Non concupisces[b] violatio. Neque Voluptas quam quis habere potest dum inimici, à quo vivente nihil expectat nisi malum, mortem imaginatur, vel somniat, modo nihil contra illum moliatur, Peccatum est. Nam Iucundi etiam imaginatione delectari ita homini naturale est, ut Lex quae id [138] prohiberet, etiam Hominem esse prohiberet. Sententia igitur eorum qui Motus animi primos peccata esse ajunt, tum aliis tum sibimetipsis nimium severa mihi videtur. Magnum enim est, si homo existens malum facere quo delectatur ne quidem velit. Aliud enim est Imaginantem delectari; aliud velle.

Crimen omne Peccatum quidem est; ut quae sit Legis alicujus violatio. Non autem vicissim omne peccatum Crimen est. Velle occidere vel furari peccatum est, etiamsi neque facto neque dicto voluntas occidendi vel furandi patefiat. Nam à Deo, qui consilia hominum intuetur, Reus fiet. Sed ab hominibus consilium hominis neque dicto neque facto cognitum accusari non

[1] In a transgression of a law there is not only sin, but also some contempt of the legislator, which is like [2] ^ sin [3] ^ or design [4] ^ sin, nor a

[5] evil, a sin, provided that he undertakes no action against him.

[6] something delightful is so natural to man, that a law which prohibited it would also prohibit being a man. This makes

[7] are sins. For it is a great thing if, being a man, one does not even wish to do the evil in which one takes pleasure. For it is one thing to take pleasure in imagining, and another thing to wish.

[8] Every crime is indeed a sin, insofar as it is the violation of some law. But, on the other hand, not every sin is [9] it cannot be accused by men, and therefore

[a] Throughout this chapter, the basic sense of 'fact' is 'deed, thing done'; in many cases it may also have the connotation 'evil deed, crime' (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a, 1.c).

[b] Exod. 20: 17; Deut. 5: 21.

[c] That such 'first motions' were sins, even if the will did not consent to them, was a standard view in Protestant homiletic writings (see, e.g., Downame, Abstract of the Duties, sigs. G4v–G5r).

Judge, it[9] hath not the name of Crime: [10]which distinction the Greeks observed, in the words ἁμάρτημα, and ἔγκλημα, or αἰτία; whereof the former, (which is translated Sinne,) signifieth any swarving[d] from the Law whatsoever; but the two later, (which are translated Crime,) signifie that sinne onely, whereof one man may accuse another. But of Intentions, which never appear by any outward act, there is no place for humane accusation. In like manner the Latines by Peccatum, which is Sinne, signifie all manner of deviation from the Law; but by Crimen, (which word they derive from Cerno, which signifies to perceive,)[e] they mean onely such sinnes, as may be made appear before a Judge; and therfore are not meer Intentions.[10]

Where no Civill Law is, there is no Crime.

°From this relation of Sinne to the Law, and of Crime to the Civill Law, may be inferred, First, that° where Law ceaseth, Sinne ceaseth. [152] But because the Law of Nature is eternall, Violation of [11]Covenants, Ingratitude, Arrogance,[f] and all Facts contrary to any Morall vertue, can never cease to be Sinne. Secondly, that[11] the Civill Law ceasing, Crimes cease: for there being no other Law remaining, but that of Nature, [12]there is no place for Accusation; every man being his own Judge, and accused onely by his own Conscience, and cleared by the Uprightnesse of his own Intention. When therefore his Intention is Right, his fact is no Sinne: if otherwise, his fact is Sinne; but not Crime. Thirdly, That when the Soveraign[12] Power ceaseth, Crime also ceaseth: [13]for where there is no such Power, there is no protection to be had from the Law; and therefore every one may protect himself by his own power: for no man in the Institution of Soveraign Power can be supposed to give away the Right of preserving his own body; for the safety whereof all Soveraignty was ordained. But this is to be understood onely of those, that have not themselves contributed to the taking away of the Power that protected them: for that was a Crime from the beginning.[13]

Ignorance of the Law of Nature excuseth no man.

[14]The source of every Crime, is[14] some defect of the Understanding; or some errour in Reasoning; or some °sudden° force of the Passions. Defect in the Understanding, is Ignorance; in Reasoning, Erroneous Opinion. Again, Ignorance is of three sorts; of the Law, and of the [15]Soveraign,[15] and of the Penalty. Ignorance of the Law of Nature Excuseth no man; because every man that hath attained to the use of Reason, is supposed to know[16], he ought not to do to another, what he would not have done to himselfe. Therefore into what place soever a man shall come, if he do anything contrary to [17]that Law,[17]

potest. Neque ergo Crimen vocari solet. Peccatum ergo & Crimen distinguuntur, eo quod Peccatum est Legis transgressio quaelibet; Crimen autem transgressio ea sola, quae coram Iudice homine judicari potest, sive, cujus Homo hominem insimulare potest. Quanquam ergo Intentio male agendi Peccatum sit, si tamen signo nullo innotescat, Crimen non est.

Ubi Lex non est, Peccatum non est. Sed quia Lex Naturae aeterna est, transgressio ejus Peccatum semper erit. Cessantibus Legibus Civilibus cessant Crimina. Nulla enim praeter Naturales existente Lege, unusquisque sui ipsius Iudex est, & sola sui ipsius conscientia judicatur. Cessante Potestate Civili, cessant Crimina; Iustum & Injustum, propter Ius omnium in omnia, nihil est. Verum si Civitas per seditionem dissoluta fuerit, Crimen in dissolventibus permanet; quia ab initio quod fecerunt Crimen erat; & à Civitate restituta Iudicari & puniri potest.

Crimina à tribus maximè causis oriuntur; vitio intellectus, quae est Ignorantia; Imperitia ratiocinandi, id est errore; & vi Passionum. Ignorantia autem est vel Legis, vel Legislatoris, vel Poenae. Ignorantia Legum Naturalium excusat neminem; illi enim, qui Rationis Naturalis usum assequutus est, Leges Naturales quaenam sint, cognitum esse praesumitur; nimirum alteri faciendum non esse, quod sibi factum esse nollet. Ubicunque ergo aliquis fuerit, [10] . Therefore sin and crime are distinguished, insofar as sin is the transgression of any law whatsoever, whereas crime is only that transgression which can be judged by a human judge, or with which one man can charge another. So, although the intention to do evil is a sin, if it nevertheless is not revealed by any sign, it is not a crime.

[11] it will always be a sin.

[12] every man is his own judge, and is judged only by his own conscience. When the civil

But if the commonwealth has been dissolved by means of sedition, the crime rests on those who dissolved it; because what they did was a crime from the beginning, and when the commonwealth is restored that crime can be judged and punished. [14] Crimes arise mostly from three causes:

[d] = swerving, deviating (OED, 'swerve', v., 2, 3).

[e] The etymology is correct ('crimen', in its primary sense of 'verdict', is a contraction of 'cernamen', from 'cerno', meaning to 'perceive', 'distinguish'), but it was not offered by early writers on etymology (Isidore of Seville derived 'crimen' from 'careo', to 'lack'). Hobbes apparently had in mind the derivation by several classical writers of 'discrimen' from 'discerno' or 'cerno': see Maltby, Lexicon, s.vv. 'crimen', 'discrimen'. [f] See above, Ch. 15, note t.

it is a Crime. If a man come from the Indies hither, and [18]perswade men here to receive a new Religion, or teach them any thing that tendeth to disobedience of the Lawes of this Country, though he be never so well perswaded of the truth of what he teacheth, he commits a Crime, and may be justly punished for the same, not onely because his doctrine is false, but also because he does that which he would not approve in another, namely, that comming from hence, he should endeavour to alter the Religion there. But ignorance of the Civill Law, shall Excuse a man in a strange Country, till it be declared to him; because, till then no Civill Law is binding.[18]

Ignorance of the Civill Law excuseth sometimes.

[19]In the like manner, if the Civill Law of a mans own Country, be not so sufficiently declared, as he may know it if he will; nor the Action against the Law of Nature; the Ignorance is a good Excuse: In other cases Ignorance of the Civill Law, Excuseth not.[19]

Ignorance of the Soveraign excuseth not.

Ignorance of the Soveraign Power, in the place of a mans ordinary residence, [20] Excuseth him not; because he ought to take notice of the Power, by which he hath been protected there.

Ignorance of the Penalty excuseth not.

Ignorance of the Penalty, °where the Law is declared,° Excuseth no man: For [21]in breaking the Law, which without a fear of penalty to follow, were not a Law, but vain words, he undergoeth the penalty, though he know not what it is; because, whosoever voluntarily doth any action, accepteth all the known consequences of it; but Punishment is a known consequence of the violation of the Lawes, in every [153] Common-wealth; which punishment, if it be determined already by the Law, he is subject to that; if not, then is he subject to Arbitrary punishment.[21] For it is reason, that he which does Injury, without other limitation than that of his own Will, should suffer punishment without other limitation, than that of [22]his Will whose Law is thereby violated.[22]

Punishments declared before the Fact, excuse from greater punishments after it.

But when a penalty, is either annexed to the Crime in the Law it selfe, or [23]hath been usually inflicted in the like cases; there the Delinquent is Excused from[23] a greater penalty. For the punishment °foreknown,° if not great enough to deterre men from the action, is an invitement to it: because when men compare the benefit of their Injustice, with the harm of their punishment, by necessity °of Nature° they choose that which appeareth best for themselves: and therefore when they are punished more than the Law had formerly determined, °or more than others were punished for the same Crime;° it is the Law that tempted, and deceiveth them.

Nothing can be made a Crime by a Law made after the Fact.

No Law, made after a Fact done, can make it a Crime: [24]because if the Fact be against the Law of Nature, the Law was before the Fact; and a Positive Law cannot be taken notice of, before it be made; and therefore cannot be Obligatory. But when the Law that forbiddeth a Fact, is made before the Fact be done; yet he that doth the Fact, is lyable to the Penalty ordained after, in case no lesser Penalty were made known before, neither by Writing, nor by Example,[24] for the reason immediatly before alledged.[g]

False Principles of Right and Wrong causes of Crime.

[25]From defect in Reasoning, (that is to say, from Errour,) men are prone to violate the Lawes, three wayes. First, by Presumption of false Principles: as when men from having observed how in all places, and in all ages, unjust Actions have been authorised, by the force, and victories of those who have committed them; and that potent men, breaking through the Cob-web Lawes of their Country,[h] the weaker sort, and those that have failed in their Enterprises, have been esteemed the onely Criminals; have thereupon taken for Principles, and grounds of their Reasoning,[25] That Justice is but a vain word: That whatsoever a man can get [26] by his own Industry, and hazard, is his own: That the Practice of all Nations cannot be [27]unjust: That Examples of former times are good Arguments of doing the like again;[27] and many more of that kind: Which [28]being granted, no Act in it selfe can be a Crime, but must be made so (not by the Law, but) by the successe of them that commit it; and the same Fact be vertuous, or vicious, as Fortune pleaseth; so that what Marius makes a Crime, Sylla shall make meritorious, and Caesar (the same Lawes standing) turn again into a Crime,[i] to the perpetuall disturbance of the Peace of the Common-wealth.[28]

12 have] had MS 20 Law, but)] law) but MS

[24] . No fact is done before the laws of nature, which are eternal. However, a law made after a fact is not obligatory, because it could not have been known. But a fact done against a law already made, but lacking a defined penalty, is liable to the penalty that is defined subsequently (unless it is greater than the usual penalty),

[25] Men's crimes arise from error, when they are deluded either by false principles, or by false interpretation of the law, or by false reasoning from true principles. To account the law of little value is not difficult for those who observe the ways of men – men who measure virtues and crimes by their good or ill outcomes, and who see laws binding the common people but broken through by the powerful. For that reason, more people think this happens because of a defect in the laws than because of a defect in men. Some of them declare almost as axioms [26] ^ and hold

[27] iniquitous: that examples which have held for a long time should have the force of law;

[h] The comparison of laws to cobwebs was proverbial; it derived from a saying attributed to Anacharsis in Valerius Maximus, Factorum et dictorum memorabilium libri IX, VII.ii.ext14 (and repeated in Plutarch, Life of Solon, 5).

[i] Marius (Gaius Marius, d. 86 BC) and Sulla (Lucius Cornelius Sulla, d. 76 BC) led opposing sides in a civil war in 88 BC; when Sulla ruled as dictator (81 BC) he took action against Julius Caesar, who was Marius' nephew. Hobbes's spelling, 'Sylla', reflects the Greek form used by Plutarch, Σύλλα.

False Teachers mis-interpreting the Law of Nature,

Secondly, [29]by false Teachers, that either mis-interpret the Law of Nature, making it thereby repugnant to the Law Civill; or by teaching for Lawes, such Doctrines of their own, or Traditions of former times, as are inconsistent with the duty of a Subject.[29]

And false Inferences from true Principles, by Teachers.

Thirdly, by Erroneous Inferences [30]from True Principles; which happens commonly to men that are hasty, and praecipitate in concluding, [154] and resolving what to do; such as are they, that have both a great opinion of their own understanding, and believe that things of this nature require not time and study, but onely common experience, and a good naturall wit; whereof no man thinks himselfe unprovided: whereas the knowledge, of Right and Wrong, is no lesse difficult than those to which there is no man will pretend, without great and long study. And of those defects in Reasoning, there is none that can Excuse (though some of them may Extenuate) a Crime, in any man, that pretendeth to the administration of his own private businesse; much lesse in them that undertake a publique charge;[j] because they pretend to the Reason, upon the want whereof they would ground their Excuse.[30]

By their Passions;

[31]Of the Passions that most frequently are the causes of Crime, one, is Vain-glory, or a foolish over-rating of their own worth; as if difference of worth, were an effect of their wit, or riches, or bloud, or some other naturall quality, not depending on the Will of those that have the Soveraign Authority. From whence proceedeth a Presumption that the punishments ordained by the Lawes, and extended generally to all Subjects, ought not to be inflicted on them, with the same rigour they are inflicted on poore, obscure, and simple men, comprehended under the name of the Vulgar.[31]

Presumption of Riches,

[32]Therefore it happeneth commonly, that such as value themselves by the greatnesse of their wealth, adventure on Crimes, upon hope of escaping punishment, by corrupting publique Justice, or obtaining Pardon by Mony, or other rewards.[32]

And Friends;

[33]And that such as have multitude of Potent Kindred; and popular men, that have gained reputation amongst the Multitude, take courage to violate the Lawes, from a hope of oppressing[k] the Power, to whom it belongeth to put them in execution.[33]

[29] those who, twisting the divine laws, both natural and positive, to their own advantage, interpret them in a way that is inconsistent with the civil laws and the tranquillity of the people, are constantly giving the citizens a specious justification and pretext for resisting their princes, grounded on either religion, or natural law, or civil law.

Secundò, qui Leges Divinas tum Naturales tum Positivas, ad commoda sua torquentes, ita interpretantur, ut cum Legibus Civilibus, & populi tranquillitate non consistant, Civibus ad Principibus suis resistendum colorem praetextumque perpetuò praebent, vel à Religione, vel à Iure Naturali, vel Civili. [140]

Tertiò, à mala ratiocinatione quanquam à veris Principiis, nascuntur Crimina, quando qui in doctrinis Fidei rectè sentiunt, in diversa sentientes, eo nomine saeviunt, quod errant, saevitiam suam zelum Dei nominantes. Quorum hominum aliquem libenter sic compellarem. Errant, esto; sed quid ad te? Populum corrumpunt; Quid hoc ad te cui salus Populi non committitur, sed Regi? Sed ad me sub Rege. Doce ergo. [30] , albeit from true principles, crimes arise, when those who hold correct opinions in doctrines of faith use violence against those who have different opinions, on the grounds that they are in error, and call their violence zeal for God. I would willingly rebuke one of these men as follows: 'They are in error; so be it; but what is that to you?' 'They corrupt the people.' 'What is that to you, when the safety of the people is committed not to you, but to the King?' 'It does concern me, under the King.' 'Teach, then.' 'I do teach, but in vain.' 'In that case, having done your duty, stop teaching and bring charges; for any more violent acts that you may perform are crimes.'

[31] Among the passions that are the most powerful causes of crime are anger, avarice, and the other more vehement desires, but not without hope. For no one would commit a crime for the sake of a good which he had no hope of obtaining.

[32] Hope is created by wealth, the power of friends, popularity, and any means of escaping punishment. Judges and witnesses are corrupted by wealth.

[33] Punishment is avoided by the pleas of friends, who sometimes even seize the accused by force. Public favour suggests a hope of impunity by strength of numbers, as it is difficult to punish a multitude without much bloodshed, and it is not always in the interests of the commonwealth that they should be punished.

Wisedome.

[34]And that such as have a great, and false opinion of their own Wisedome, take upon them to reprehend the actions, and call in question the Authority of them that govern, and so to unsettle the Lawes with their publique discourse, as that nothing shall be a Crime, but what their own designes require should be so. It happeneth also to the same men, to be prone to all such Crimes, as consist in Craft, and in deceiving of their Neighbours; because they think their designes are too subtile to be perceived. These I say are effects of a false presumption of their own Wisdome. For of them that are the first movers in the disturbance of Common-wealth, (which can never happen without a Civill Warre,) very few are left alive long enough, to see their new Designes established: so that the benefit of their Crimes, redoundeth to Posterity, and such as would least have wished it: which argues they were not so wise, as they thought they were. And those that deceive upon hope of not being observed, do commonly deceive themselves, (the darknesse in which they believe they lye hidden, being nothing else but their own blindnesse;) and are no wiser than Children, that think all hid, by hiding their own eyes.[34]

°And generally all vain-glorious men, (unlesse they be withall [155] timorous,) are subject to Anger; as being more prone than others to interpret for contempt, the ordinary liberty of conversation: And there are few Crimes that may not be produced by Anger.°

Hatred, Lust, Ambition, Covetousnesse, causes of Crime.

°As for the Passions, of Hate, Lust, Ambition, and Covetousnesse, what Crimes they are apt to produce, is so obvious to every mans experience and understanding, as there needeth nothing to be said of them, saving that they are infirmities, so annexed to the nature, both of man, and all other living creatures, as that their effects cannot be hindred, but by extraordinary use of Reason, or a constant severity in punishing them. For in those things men hate, they find a continuall, and unavoydable molestation; whereby either a mans patience[l] must be everlasting, or he must be eased by removing the power of that which molesteth him: The former is difficult; the later is many times impossible, without some violation of the Law. Ambition, and Covetousnesse are Passions also that are perpetually incumbent,[m] and pressing; whereas Reason is not perpetually present, to resist them: and therefore whensoever the hope of impunity appears, their effects proceed. And for Lust, what it wants in the lasting, it hath in the vehemence, which sufficeth to weigh down the apprehension of all easie, or uncertain punishments.°

[34] And because men are usually looking for this kind of applause from the multitude, their love of and admiration for their own wisdom make them speak rashly about the condition and government of the commonwealth, and about the condition and government of the public religion – which is in itself a great crime, and a very frequent cause of great seditions. But those who are without wealth, or authority, or public favour, have no hope of impunity, except in concealment, or in opportunities of flight. It is evident, indeed, that all crimes have their starting-points in desires; but unless the hope of impunity leads the way, they are almost never carried out.

Fear sometimes cause of Crime, as when the danger is neither present, nor corporeall.

Of all Passions, [35]that which enclineth men least to break the Lawes,[35] is Fear. Nay, (excepting [36]some generous[n] natures,) it is the onely thing, (when there is apparence of profit, or pleasure by breaking the Lawes,) that makes men keep them. And yet in many[36] cases a Crime may be committed through Feare.

For not every Fear justifies the Action it produceth, but the fear onely [37]of corporeall hurt, which we call Bodily Fear, and from which a man cannot see how to be delivered, but by the action. A man is assaulted, and fears present death, from which he sees not how to escape, but by wounding him that assaulteth him; If he wound him to death, this is no Crime; because no man is supposed at the making of a Common-wealth, to have abandoned the defence of his life, or limbes, where the Law cannot arrive time enough[p] to his assistance. But to kill a man, because from his actions, or his threatnings, I may argue he will kill me when he can, (seeing I have time, and means to demand protection, from the Soveraign Power,) is a Crime.[37] Again, a man receives words of disgrace, [38]or some little injuries (for which they that made the Lawes, had assigned no punishment, nor thought it worthy of a man that hath the use of Reason, to take notice of,)[38] and is afraid, unlesse he revenge it, [39]he shall fall into contempt, and consequently be obnoxious[q] to the like injuries from others; and to avoyd this, breaks the Law, and protects himselfe for the future, by the terrour of his private revenge.[39] This is a Crime: [40]For the hurt is not Corporeall, but Phantasticall, and (though in this corner of the world, made sensible by a custome not many years since begun, amongst young and vain men,)[r] so light, as a gallant man, and one that is assured of his own courage, cannot take notice of. Also a man may stand in fear of Spirits, either through his own superstition, or through too much credit given to other men, that tell him of strange [156] Dreams and Visions; and thereby be made believe they will hurt him, for doing, or omitting divers things, which neverthelesse, to do, or omit, is contrary to the Lawes; And that which is so done, or omitted, is not to be Excused by this fear; but is a Crime. For (as I have shewn before in the second Chapter) Dreams be naturally but the fancies remaining in sleep, after the impressions our Senses had formerly received waking;[s] and when men are by any accident unassured they have slept, seem to be reall Visions; and therefore he that presumes to break the Law upon his own, or anothers Dream, or pretended Vision, or upon other Fancy of the power of Invisible Spirits, than is permitted by the Common-wealth, leaveth the Law of Nature, which is a certain offence, and followeth the imagery of his own, or another private mans brain, which he can never know whether it signifieth any thing, or nothing, nor whether he that tells his Dream, say true, or lye; which if every private man should have leave to do, (as they must by the Law of Nature, if any one have it) there could no Law be made to hold, and so all Common-wealth would be dissolved.[40]

From these different sources of Crimes, it appeares already, that all Crimes are not (as the Stoicks of old time maintained) [41] of the same allay.[41] [t] There is place, not only for EXCUSE, by which that which seemed a Crime, is proved to be none at all; but also for EXTENUATION, by which the Crime, that seemed great, is made lesse. For though all Crimes doe equally deserve the name of Injustice, as all deviation from a strait line is equally crookednesse, °which the Stoicks rightly observed;° yet it does not follow that all Crimes are equally unjust, no more than that all crooked lines are equally crooked; °which the Stoicks not observing, held it as great a Crime, to kill a Hen, against the Law, as to kill ones Father.°[u]

[40] , and is not excused by fear of that kind. Why? Because the commonwealth wishes public words, that is, the laws, to matter more to the citizens than the words of a private man; it has neglected to lay down a punishment for such words, because the commonwealth regards those who cannot tolerate even words as the softest of all men. Nor does even the fear of God excuse crimes, much less the fear of those things that, under the name of 'spirits', become terrifying to many people – such as ghosts, the spirits of the dead, and other fancies appearing to superstitious men when they sleep or doze. For every crime is unjust; and therefore it is not he who commits a crime, but he who avoids one, that pleases God. Just men, therefore, have nothing to fear from God, however much they may be threatened with the power of spirits by certain people on the pretext of religion. [41] equal.

[r] The late medieval duel, a 'hybrid of joust and trial by combat', had been replaced by a new, informal, and private kind of duelling, which could arise from a quarrel of any kind; the new type spread from Italy to France in the 16th century, gaining popularity in England in the Elizabethan period, and reaching its peak there in the reign of James I (see Kiernan, The Duel in European History, pp. 46–7, 80–83).

Totall Excuses.

That which totally Excuseth a Fact, and takes away from it the nature of a Crime, can be none but that, which at the same time, taketh away the obligation of the Law. For the fact committed once against the Law, if he that committed it be obliged to the Law, can be no other than a Crime.

The want of means to know the Law, totally Excuseth: For [42]the Law whereof a man has no means to enforme himself, is not obligatory. But the want of diligence to enquire, shall not be considered as a want of means; Nor shall any man, that pretendeth to reason enough for the Government of his own affairs, be supposed to want means to know the Lawes of Nature; because they are known by the reason he pretends to: only Children, and Madmen are Excused from offences against the Law Naturall.[42]

Where a man is captive, or in the power of the enemy, (and he is then in the power of the enemy, when his person, or his means of living, is so,) if it be without his own fault, the Obligation of the Law [43] ceaseth; because he must obey the enemy, or dye; and [44]consequently such obedience is no Crime: for no man is obliged (when the protection of the Law faileth,) not to protect himself, by the best means he can.[44] [157]

If a man by the terrour of present death, be compelled to doe a fact against the Law, he is totally Excused; because no [45]Law can oblige a man to abandon his own preservation. And supposing such a Law were obligatory; yet a man[45] would reason thus, If I doe it not, I die presently;[v] if I doe it, I die afterwards; therefore by doing it, there is time of life gained; Nature therefore compells him to the fact.

When a man is destitute of food, or other thing necessary for his life, and cannot preserve himselfe any other way, but by some fact against the Law; as if in a great famine [46] he take the food by force, or stealth, which he cannot obtaine for mony, nor [47]charity;[47] or in defence of his life, snatch away another mans Sword, he is totally Excused, °for the reason next before alledged.°[w]

Excuses against the Author.

Again, Facts done against the Law, by the authority of another, are °by that authority° Excused against the Author; because no [48]man ought to accuse his own fact in another, that is but his instrument:[48] but it is not Excused against a third person thereby injured; [49]because in the violation of the Law, both the Author, and Actor are Criminalls.[49] From hence it followeth that when that Man, or Assembly, that hath the Soveraign Power, commandeth a man to do that which is contrary to a former Law, the doing of it is totally Excused: For he ought not to condemn it himselfe, because he is the Author; and [50]what cannot justly be condemned by the Soveraign, cannot justly be punished by any other. Besides, when the Soveraign commandeth any thing to be done against his own former Law,[50] the Command, as to that particular fact, is an abrogation of the Law.

If that Man, or Assembly, that hath the Soveraign Power, [51]disclaime any Right essentiall to the Soveraignty, whereby there accrueth to the Subject, any[51] liberty inconsistent with the Soveraign Power, that is to say, [52]with the very being of a Common-wealth, if the Subject shall refuse to obey the Command in any thing, contrary to the liberty granted, this is neverthelesse a Sinne, and contrary to the duty of the Subject: for he ought to take notice of what is inconsistent with the Soveraignty, because it was erected by his own consent, and for his own defence; and[52] that such liberty as is inconsistent with it, was granted through ignorance of the [53]evill consequence thereof. But if he not onely disobey, but[53] also resist a publique Minister in the execution of it, then it is a Crime; °because he might have been righted,[x] (without any breach of the Peace,) upon complaint.°

The Degrees of Crime are taken on divers Scales, and measured, First, by the malignity of the Source, or Cause: Secondly, by the contagion of the Example: Thirdly, by the mischiefe of the Effect; and Fourthly, by the concurrence of Times, Places, and Persons.

Presumption of Power, aggravateth.

The same Fact done against the Law, if it proceed from Presumption of strength, riches, or friends to resist [54]those that are to execute the Law,[54] is a greater Crime, than if it proceed from hope of not being discovered, or of escape by flight: For Presumption of impunity [158] by force, is a Root, from whence springeth, at all times, and upon all temptations, a contempt of all Lawes; whereas [55]in the later case, the apprehension of danger, that makes a man fly, renders[55] him more obedient for the future. A Crime which we know to be so, is greater than the same Crime proceeding from a false perswasion that it is lawfull: For he that committeth it against his own conscience, presumeth on his force, °or other power,° which encourages him to commit the same again: but he that doth it by errour, after the errour shewn him, is conformable to the Law.

Evill Teachers, Extenuate.

Hee, whose errour proceeds from the authority of a Teacher, or an Interpreter of the Law publiquely authorised, is not so faulty, as he whose errour proceedeth from a peremptory pursute of his own principles, and reasoning: For what is taught by one that teacheth by publique Authority, the Commonwealth teacheth, and hath a resemblance of [56] Law, till the same Authority controuleth[y] it; and in all Crimes that contain not in them a denyall of the Soveraign Power, nor are against an evident Law, Excuseth totally: whereas he that [57]groundeth his actions, on[57] his private Judgement, ought according to [58]the rectitude, or errour thereof,[58] to stand, or fall.

Examples of Impunity, Extenuate.

The same Fact, if it have been constantly punished in other men, is a greater Crime, than if there have been many precedent Examples of impunity. For those Examples, are so many hopes of Impunity, given by the Soveraign himselfe: And because he which furnishes a man with such a hope, and presumption of [59]mercy,[59] as encourageth him to offend, hath his part in the offence; he cannot reasonably charge the offender with the whole.

Contra Legem factum idem, si à praesumptione oriatur virium vel divitiarum, vel amicorum, quibus qui facit fretus Ministris publicis resistit, majus Crimen est, quam si à spe latendi, vel fugiendi ortum esset. Impunitatis enim praesumptio nata à fiducia potentiae Radix est, unde omni tempore & oportunitate omnium Legum nascitur contemptio. Quod autem fit, propter spem latendi vel fugiendi, periculi agnitionem arguit, quo Legibus in futurum redditur obsequentior.

Crimen qui esse scit & facit, Crimen auget, quod si profectum esset ab opinione quod licitum esset, minus fuisset. Nam qui male facit contra suam ipsius Conscientiam, viribus confidit quibus excitatur ad idem saepius faciendum; sed qui errore facit, cognito errore ad Leges conformatur. [143]

Is cujus error ab Authoritate Doctoris vel Legum interpretis publicè constituti oritur, minorem habet culpam, quam si natus esset à propriorum Principiorum, & rationum prosecutione obstinata. Praemeditation, Aggravateth.

A Crime arising from a sudden Passion, is not so great, as when the same ariseth from long meditation: For in the former case there is a place for Extenuation, in the common infirmity of humane nature: but he that doth it with praemeditation, has used circumspection, and cast his eye, on the Law, on the punishment, and on the [60] consequence thereof to humane society; all which [61]in committing the Crime,[61] hee hath contemned, and postposed to[z] his own appetite. But there is no suddennesse of Passion sufficient for a totall Excuse: For all the time between the first knowing of the Law, and the Commission of the Fact, shall be taken for a time of deliberation; because he ought by meditation of the Law, to rectifie the irregularity of his Passions.

Where the Law is publiquely, and with assiduity, before all the people read, and interpreted; a fact done against it, is a greater Crime, than where men are left without such instruction, to enquire of it with difficulty, uncertainty, and interruption of their Callings, and be informed by priuate men: for in this case, part of the fault is discharged upon common infirmity; but in the former, there is apparent negligence, which [62]is not[62] without some contempt of the Soveraign Power.

Tacite approbation of the Soveraign, Extenuates.

Those facts which the Law expresly condemneth, but the Law-maker by other manifest signes °of his will° tacitly approveth, are lesse Crimes, than the same facts, [63]condemned both by the Law, and Law-maker. For seeing the will of the Law-maker is a Law,[63] there appear [159] in this case two contradictory Lawes; which would totally Excuse, [64]if men were bound to take notice of the Soveraigns approbation, by other arguments, than are expressed by his command.[64] But because there are punishments consequent, not onely to the transgression of his Law, but also to [65]the observing of it, he is in part a cause of the transgression, and therefore cannot reasonably[65] impute the whole Crime to the Delinquent. For example, the [66] Law condemneth

Quod à subita passione oritur, quam quod à longa meditatione, minus Crimen est; illic enim locus est Extenuationi per humanae naturae omnibus communem infirmitatem; sed qui meditatò facit, circumspexit, oculos conjecit in Legem, in Poenam, & in damnum Societati humanae sequuturum; quae omnia simul contempsit & cupiditati propriae postposuit. Verumtamen Passio nulla ita subita esse potest, ut totaliter excuset. Nam tempus quod intercedit inter Legis cognitionem, & criminis commissionem, omne censebitur pro tempore Deliberandi; quia unusquisque per meditationem Legum, corrigere debuit passionum suarum irregularitatem.

Ubi Lex publicè, & assiduè coram populo legitur & explicatur, Crimen quod fit contra Legem majus est, quam ubi absque tali instructione relinquuntur Cives cum difficultate, incertitudine, & occupationum propriarum cessatione, quae sint Leges ab hominibus privatis quaesituri. Pars enim Criminis infirmitati communi tribuenda est. Sed in casu priore negligentia manifesta est, quae sine Summae Potestatis contemptu aliquo esse non potest.

Facta contra Legem disertis verbis vetita, si tamen à Legislatore manifestis signis tacitè approbentur, minora sunt Crimina, quam si Legislatori viderentur displicere. The examples of Princes, to [73]those that see them,[73] are, and ever have been, more potent to govern their actions, than the Lawes themselves. °And though it be our duty to do, not what they do, but what they say; yet will that duty never be performed, till it please God to give men an extraordinary, and supernaturall grace to follow that Precept.°

Comparison of Crimes from their Effects.

Again, if we compare Crimes by the mischiefe of their Effects, First, the same fact, when it redounds to the dammage of many, is greater, than when it redounds to the hurt of few. And therefore, when a fact hurteth, not onely in the present, but also, (by example) in the future, it is a greater Crime, than if it hurt onely in the present: [74]for the former, is a fertile Crime, and multiplyes to the hurt of many; the later is barren.[74] To maintain doctrines contrary to the Religion established in the Common-wealth, is a greater fault, in an authorised Preacher, than in a private person: So also is it, to live prophanely, incontinently, or do any irreligious act whatsoever. Likewise in a Professor of the Law,[ab] to maintain any [75]point,[75] or do any act, that tendeth to the weakning of the Soveraign Power, is a greater Crime, than in another man: Also in a man that hath such reputation for wisedome, as that his counsells are followed, or his actions imitated by many, his fact against the Law, is a greater Crime, than the same fact in another: For such men not onely commit Crime, but [76]teach it for Law to all[76] other men. And generally all Crimes are the greater, by the scandall they give; [77]that is to say, by becomming stumbling-blocks to the weak, that[77] look not so much upon the way they go in, as upon the light that [78]other men[78] carry before them.

ium Civium digladationes Lex scripta prohibet, & capite punit; contra, qui hujusmodi certamen vel recusat vel declinat provocatus, contemptui habetur, neque existimationis laesionem Lex ulla scripta reparat; etiam aliquando ab ipso qui Summam habet Potestatem munere omni militari indignus existimatur. Quamobrem si existimationis causa provocationi respondeat, quandoquidem Principibus suis placuisse non modo licitum, sed etiam laudabile plurimis videatur, Crimen (etsi non excusetur) extenuatur tamen, quia exoneratur culpa partim in Summum Imperantem, id est in ipsum punientem. Quod tamen non ita accipi vellem, ut vindictae privatae excusationem parem, sed Rectores moneam ne facto obliquè faveant, cui directè & apertis verbis interdixerunt. Exempla enim Principum sunt & semper fuere ad actiones Civium regendas, potentiora quam sunt ipsae Leges. Rursus, si Crimina damno comparemus, idem factum, si multos, gravius est quam si paucos laedat. Itaque si factum non modo in praesenti, sed etiam per exemplum in futuro tempore damnum faciat, majus Crimen est, quam si in praesenti tantum laedat, id est gravius est Crimen foecundum quam sterile.

Doctrinas Religioni Civitatis contrarias docere, Crimen majus est in Doctore publicè constituto, quam in Cive privato; sicut etiam inhonestè vivere, aut actionem agere impiam quamcunque. Similiter in Professore Legum, doctrinae Civilis articulum aliquem sustinere, aut actionem agere quae ad Summae Potestatis diminutionem tendit, majus Crimen est, quam si idem factum esset à quovis alio. Hujusmodi enim homines non solum Crimina ipsi faciunt, sed aliis ut faciant Authores sunt; & in universum augentur Crimina à scandalo. Laesa Majestas.

Also Facts of hostility against the °present° state of the Common-wealth, are greater Crimes, than the same acts done to private men: For the dammage [79] extends it selfe to all: Such are the betraying of the [80]strengths,[80] or revealing of the secrets of the Common-wealth to an Enemy; also all attempts upon the Representative of the Common-wealth, be it a Monarch, or an Assembly; and all endeavours by [160] [81]word, or deed to diminish the Authority of the same, either in the present time, or in succession:[81] which Crimes the Latines understand by Crimina laesae Majestatis,[ac] °and consist in designe, or act, contrary to a Fundamental Law.°

Bribery and False testimony.

Likewise those Crimes, which render Judgements of no effect, are greater Crimes, than [82]Injuries done to one, or a few persons; as to receive mony to give[82] False judgement, or testimony, is a greater Crime, than otherwise to deceive a man of the like, °or a greater° summe; because not onely [83]he has wrong, that falls by such[83] judgements; but all Judgements are rendered uselesse, and [84]occasion ministred to force, and private revenges.[84]

Depeculation.

Also °Robbery, and° Depeculation[ad] of the Publique treasure, °or Revenues,° is a greater Crime, than the robbing, or defrauding of a Private man; because to robbe the [85]publique,[85] is to robbe many at once.

Counterfeiting Authority.

Also the Counterfeit usurpation of publique Ministery, the Counterfeiting of publique Seales, or publique Coine, than counterfeiting of a private mans person, or his seale; because the fraud thereof, extendeth to the dammage of many.

Crimes against private men compared.

Of facts against the Law, done to private men, the greater Crime, is that, where the dammage °in the common opinion of men,° is most sensible. And therefore

To kill against the Law, is a greater Crime, than any other injury, life preserved.

Hobbes's account seems close to Cicero's discussion in De inventione, II.53: 'to diminish the majesty is to derogate from the dignity, high estate, or power of the people, or of those to whom the people has given its power' ('maiestatem minuere est de dignitate aut amplitudine aut potestate populi aut eorum quibus potestatem dedit aliquid derogare'). And by clandestine Surreption, than by consent fraudulently obtained.

And the violation of chastity by Force, greater, than by flattery.

And of a woman Married, than of a woman not married.

For all these things are commonly so valued; though some men are more, and some lesse sensible of the same offence. But the Law regardeth not the particular, but the generall [86]inclination[86] of mankind.

And therefore [87]the offence men take, from contumely, in words, or gesture, when they produce no other harme, than the present griefe of him that is reproached,[87] hath been neglected in the Lawes of the Greeks, Romans, and other both antient, and moderne Common-wealths; supposing the true cause of such griefe [88] to consist, not in the contumely, (which takes no hold upon men conscious of their own vertue,) but in the Pusillanimity of him that is offended by it.

Also a Crime against a private [89]man,[89] is much aggravated by the person, time, and place. For to kill ones Parent, is a greater Crime, than to kill [90]another:[90] for the Parent ought to have the [91]honour of a Soveraign, (though he have surrendred his Power to the Civill Law,) because he had it originally by Nature.[91] And to Robbe a poore [161] man, is a greater Crime, than to robbe a rich man; because 'tis to the poore a more sensible dammage.

And a Crime committed in the Time, or Place appointed for [92]Devotion,[92] is greater, than if committed at another time or place: for it proceeds from a greater contempt of the Law[93].

Many other cases of Aggravation, and Extenuation might be added: but by these I have set down, it is obvious to every man, to take the altitude[af] of any other Crime proposed.

Publique Crimes what.

Lastly, because in almost all Crimes there is an Injury done, not onely to some Private men, but also to the Common-wealth; the same Crime, when the accusation is [94]in the name[94] of the Common-wealth, is called a Publique Crime; °and when in the name of a Private man, a Private Crime;° And the Pleas according thereunto called Publique, Judicia Publica,[ag] [95] Pleas of the Crown;[ah] °or Private Pleas. As in an Accusation of Murder, if the accuser be a Private man, the plea is a Private plea; if the accuser be the Soveraign, the plea is a Publique plea.°

Atque haec ita aestimantur vulgo; quanquam eadem damna aliis magis, aliis minus sensibilia sint. Sed Leges non ad Civium singularium, sed ad humani generis sensum generalem componuntur.

Quanquam autem sunt qui contumeliam in verbis tantùm, vel gestu, pro damno & laesione habere solent, laesiones tamen hujusmodi Graeci, Romani, aliaeque tam veteres quam hodiernae Civitates in legibus condendis neglexerunt, ut qui doloris à verbis tantum, causam veram non verba contumeliosa (quae à propriae virtutis consciis statim ut dicta sunt excutiuntur) esse putaverunt, sed Pusillanimitatem hominis verba non ferentis.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of PUNISHMENTS, and REWARDS.

The definition of Punishment.

A PUNISHMENT, is an Evill inflicted by publique Authority, on him that hath done, °or omitted that which is Judged by the same Authority to be° a Transgression of the Law; to the end that [1]the will of men may thereby the better[1] be disposed to obedience.

Right to Punish whence derived.

Before I inferre any thing from this definition, there is a question to be answered, of [2]much[2] importance; which is, by what door the Right, °or Authority° of Punishing in any case, came in. For [3]by that which has been said before, no man is supposed[3] bound by Covenant, not to resist violence; and consequently it cannot be intended,[a] that he gave any right to another to lay violent hands upon his person. In the making of a Common-wealth, every man giveth away the right of defending another; but not of defending himselfe. Also he obligeth himselfe, to assist him that hath the Soveraignty, in the Punishing of another[4]; but of himselfe not. But to °covenant to° assist the Soveraign, °in doing hurt to another, unlesse he that so covenanteth have a right to doe it himselfe,° is not to give him a Right to Punish. It is manifest therefore that the Right which the Common-wealth (that is, he, [5]or they that represent[5] it) hath to Punish, is not grounded on any concession, or gift of the [6]Subjects.[6] But I have also shewed formerly, that before the Institution of Common-wealth, every man had a [7]right to every thing, and[7] to do whatsoever he thought necessary to his own preservation; °subduing, hurting, or killing any man in order thereunto.° And this is the foundation of that right of Punishing[8], [162] which is exercised in every Common-wealth. For [9]the Subjects did not give the Soveraign that right; but onely in laying down theirs, strengthned him to use his own,[9] as he should think fit, for the preservation of them all: so that it was not given, but left to him, and to him onely; and °(excepting the limits set him by naturall Law)° as entire, as [10]in the condition of meer Nature, and of warre of every one against his neighbour.[10]

[1] , by the fear of it, the wills of the citizens may [2] some [3] it is evident that no man can be [4] ^ citizen [5] that represents [6] citizens. [7] natural right [8] ^ citizens

[9] it would have achieved nothing for the citizens to give the commonwealth such a right, because each one of them had already been given that right by nature. However, from the fact that each one laid down his right, the sovereign gained so much strength that he was able to use his own natural right, [10] it was before the institution of the commonwealth.

CAPVT XXVIII.

De Poenis & Praemiis.

Poena, Malum est, transgressori Legis Authoritate publica inflictum, eo fine, ut terrore ejus voluntates Civium ad Obedientiam conformentur.

Antequam ab hac definitione quicquam deducam, quaestioni nonnullius momenti respondendum est, nempe, unde Civem puniendi jus, in casu quocunque, ortum sit. Manifestum enim est, Pacto obligari posse neminem, vi illatae non resistere; itaque ut quis cuiquam jus dederit, vim sibi inferendi, intelligi non potest. In Civitate instituenda, unusquisque alium quidem defendendi jus deponit, sed non seipsum defendendi jus relinquit. Seipsum etiam, in puniendo Cive alio quocunque, illi qui Summam habet Potestatem auxiliari obligat; sed non in seipso puniendo. Sed auxilium ferre Summo Imperanti non est jus illi dare quemquam puniendi. Manifestum ergo est jus Puniendi quod habet Civitas (id est is qui personam gerit Civitatis) fundatum non esse in Concessione sive gratia Civium. Sed ostensum etiam supra est, quod ante Civitatis constitutionem unicuique quidlibet agendi quod ad conservationem sui videretur ipsi necessarium, jus erat naturale. Atque hoc juris, quod habet Civitas Civem puniendi, fundamentum verum est. Nam ut Cives Civitati tale jus concederent, frustra esset, quia jus illud unicuique ante à natura datum erat. Eo tamen, quod jus suum unusquisque deposuerat, is qui Summam habebat Potestatem tantum virium nactus est, ut jure suo naturali ad praeservationem Civium omnium arbitrio suo uti potuit. Itaque jus illud illi non datum, sed relictum est; & illi soli, nec minus integrum, quam fuit ante Civitatis institutionem. [147]

Private injuries, and revenges no Punishments:

From the definition of Punishment, I inferre, First, that neither private revenges, nor injuries of private men, can properly be stiled Punishment; because they proceed not from publique Authority.

Nor denyall of preferment:

Secondly, that [11] to be neglected, and unpreferred by the [12]publique favour,[12] is not a Punishment; because no °new° evill is thereby on any man Inflicted; he is onely left [13] in the estate he was in before.

Nor pain inflicted without publique hearing:

Thirdly, that the evill inflicted by publique Authority, without precedent publique condemnation, is not to be stiled by the name of Punishment; but of an hostile act; because the fact[b] for which a man is Punished, ought first to be [14] Judged by publique Authority, to be a transgression of the Law.

Nor pain inflicted by Usurped power:

Fourthly, that the evill inflicted by [15]usurped power, and Judges without Authority from the Soveraign,[15] is not Punishment; but an act of hostility; because the acts of [16]power usurped,[16] have not for Author, the person condemned; and therefore are not acts of publique Authority.

Nor pain inflicted without respect to the future good.

Fifthly, that all evill which is inflicted without intention, [17]or possibility of disposing the Delinquent, or (by his example) other men, to obey the Lawes,[17] is not Punishment; but an act of hostility; because [18]without such an end, no hurt done is contained under that name.[18]

Naturall evill consequences, no Punishments.

Sixthly, whereas to certain actions, there be annexed by Nature, [19]divers[19] hurtfull consequences; as when a man in assaulting another, is himselfe slain, or wounded; or when he falleth into sicknesse by the doing of some unlawfull act; such hurt, though in respect of °God, who is° the author of Nature, it may be said to be °inflicted, and therefore° a Punishment divine; yet it is not contained in the name of Punishment in respect of men, because it is not inflicted by [20]the Authority of man.[20]

Hurt inflicted, if lesse than the benefit of transgressing, is not Punishment.

Seventhly, If the harm inflicted be lesse than the benefit, °or contentment° that naturally followeth the crime committed, that harm is not within the definition[21]; and is rather the Price, or Redemption, than the Punishment of a Crime: Because it is of the nature of Punishment, to have for end, the [22]disposing of men to obey the Law; which end (if it be lesse than the benefit of the transgression) it attaineth not, but[22] worketh a contrary effect.

A Definitione Poenae deduco, Primò, neque injurias, neque ultiones privatorum hominum propriè vocari posse Poenas, quia non procedunt ab Authoritate Civitatis.

Secundò, à Summo Imperante negligi, aut non promoveri, Civi Poenam non esse; quia malum nullum illi inflictum est, sed in statu quem prius obtinuit relinquitur illaesus.

Tertiò, malum inflictum Authoritate publica, nisi Publica antecedat Condemnatio, nomen Poenae non habere, sed factum esse hostile. Quia factum quod punitur probari & judicari prius debuit Authoritate publica.

Quartò, malum inflictum ab eo, qui Summam Potestatem injuriâ usurpat, vel à quocunque, sine Authoritate concessa à Civitate, Poenam non esse, sed factum hostile; quia actiones ejus, qui injuriâ imperat Authorem non habent personam condemnatam; neque ergo habent Authoritatem publicam.

Quintò, malum inflictum absque consilio Cives reformandi, Poena non est sed factum hostile; quia de essentia Poenae est, ut terrore ejus Cives ad obedientiam conformentur.

Sextò, cùm actionibus quibusdam consequentia mala saepissimè adhaereant naturaliter; ut cum quis vim alii inferens occiditur vel vulneratur; vel quando quis ab actione aliqua illicita in morbum incidit; malum illud, quamquam respectu Authoris Naturae dici rectè possit Poena Divina, non continetur tamen nomine Poenae respectu hominum; quia non inflictum est Authoritate Civili.

Septimò, si Malum inflictum minus sit, quam bonum, quod Crimen commissum naturaliter sequitur, Malum illud sub definitione Poenae non comprehenditur; nam Pretium potius est sive redemptio Criminis, quam Poena. Nam natura Poenae finem ejus continet nempe reformationem Civium. Sed Poena quae minus molestiae habet, quam habet Crimen jucundi, effectum contrarium operatur.

26 Nam] Cùm 70 26 continet] contineat 70

[b] Throughout this chapter, the basic sense of 'fact' is 'deed, thing done'; in many cases it may also have the connotation 'evil deed, crime' (OED, 'fact', n., 1.a, 1.c).

Where the Punishment is annexed to the Law, a greater hurt is not Punishment, but Hostility.

Eighthly, If a Punishment be determined and prescribed in the Law it selfe, and after the crime committed, there be a greater Punishment inflicted, the excesse is not Punishment, but an act of hostility. For seeing the aym of Punishment is not a revenge, but terrour; and the terrour of a great Punishment unknown, is taken away by the declaration of a lesse, the °unexpected° addition is no °part of [163] the° Punishment. But where there is no Punishment at all determined by the Law, there whatsoever is inflicted[23], hath the nature of Punishment. For he that goes about the violation of a Law, wherein no penalty is determined, [24] expecteth an indeterminate, that is to say, an arbitrary Punishment.

Hurt inflicted for a fact done before the Law, no Punishment.

Ninthly, Harme inflicted for a Fact done before there was a Law that forbad it, is not Punishment, but an act of Hostility: For before the Law, there [25]is[25] no transgression of the Law: But Punishment supposeth a fact [26] judged, to have been a transgression of the Law; °Therefore Harme inflicted before the Law made, is not Punishment, but an act of Hostility.°

The Representative of the Common-wealth Unpunishable.

Tenthly, Hurt inflicted on the [27]Representative[27] of the Common-wealth, is not Punishment, but an act of Hostility: Because it is [28]of the nature of Punishment, to be[28] inflicted by publique Authority, which is the Authority [29]only of the Representative[29] it self.

Hurt to Revolted Subjects is done by right of War, not by way of Punishment.

Lastly, Harme inflicted upon one that is a declared enemy, fals not under the name of Punishment: Because [30]seeing they were either never subject to the Law, and therefore cannot transgresse it; or having been subject to it, and professing to be no longer so, by consequence deny they can transgresse it, all the Harmes that can be done them, must be taken as acts of Hostility. But in declared Hostility, all infliction of evill is lawfull.[30] From whence it followeth, that if a [31]subject[31] shall by fact, or word, wittingly, and deliberatly deny the authority of the [32]Representative[32] of the Common-wealth, (whatsoever penalty hath been formerly ordained for Treason,) he may lawfully be made to suffer [33]whatsoever the Representative will: For in denying subjection, he denyes such Punishment as by the Law hath been ordained; and therefore suffers as[33] an enemy of the Common-wealth; °that is, according to the will of the Representative. For the Punishments set down in the Law, are to Subjects, not to Enemies; such as are they, that having been by their own act Subjects, deliberately revolting, deny the Soveraign Power.°

Octavò, si Poena Lege ipsa praescripta & terminata sit, post Crimen autem commissum infligatur Poena major, excessus Poenae posterioris supra priorem Poena non est, sed factum hostile. Cum enim Punitionum finis, ultio non sit, sed terror; terror autem Poenae majoris nondum cognitae, minoris Poenae determinatione tollitur, additio illa, Poena non est. Ubi vero Poenam nullam Lex praescripsit, ibi quicquid à Civitate infligitur naturam Poenae habet. Qui enim Legem, cujus violatio Poenam meretur, quae tamen scripto nondum definitur, violat indefinitam expectat Poenam, id est arbitrariam.

Nonò, Malum inflictum ob factum nondum Lege vetitum, Poena [148] non est, sed factum hostile. Nam ante Legem, transgressio Legis esse non potuit; Poena autem factum supponit probatum & judicatum, violationem Legis esse.

Decimò, Malum inflictum in Personam Civitatis, Poena non est, sed factum hostile, ut quod Authoritate publica, id est Authoritate ipsius Personae Civitatis non infligitur.

Postremò, Malum inflictum hosti manifesto, nomine Poenae non comprehenditur; quia hostes Cives non sunt. Quanquam autem Cives ante fuerint, si se hostes tamen post declaraverint, non ut Cives, sed ut hostes patiuntur. Sequitur hinc si Civis facto aut verbo, sciens & deliberatò Personae Civitatis Authoritatem negaverit (quaecunque Poena Crimini laesae Majestatis Lege praescripta fuerit) puniri tamen, cum se jam hostem Civitatis esse declaraverit Poenâ arbitrariâ jure potest tanquam hostis.

The °first, and most generall° distribution of Punishments, is into Divine, and Humane. Of the former I shall have occasion, to speak, in a more convenient[c] place hereafter.[d]

Humane, are those Punishments that be inflicted by the [34]Commandement[34] of Man; and are either Corporall, or Pecuniary, or Ignominy, or Imprisonment, or Exile, or mixt of these.

Punishments Corporall.

Corporall Punishment is that, which is inflicted on the body °directly, and° according to the intention of him that inflicteth it: such as are stripes,[e] or wounds, or deprivation of such pleasures of the body, as were before °lawfully° enjoyed.

Capitall.

And of these, some be Capitall, some Lesse than Capitall. Capitall, is the Infliction of Death; and that either simply, or with torment. Lesse than Capitall, are Stripes,[f] Wounds, Chains, and any other corporall Paine, not in its own nature mortall. For if °upon the Infliction of a Punishment° death follow °not in the intention of the Inflicter,° the Punishment is not to bee esteemed Capitall, though the harme prove mortall by an accident not to be foreseen; [164] °in which case death is not inflicted, but hastened.°

Pecuniary Punishment, is that which consisteth not only in the deprivation of a Summe of Mony, but also of °Lands, or° any other goods which are usually bought and sold for mony. And in case the Law, that ordaineth such a punishment, be made with design to gather mony, from such as shall transgresse the same, it is not properly a Punishment, but the Price of priviledge, and exemption from the Law, which doth not absolutely forbid the fact[35], but only to those that are not able to pay the mony: except where the Law is Naturall, or part of Religion; °for in that case it is not an exemption from the Law, but a transgression of it.° As where a Law exacteth a Pecuniary mulct,[g] of them that take the name of God in vaine, the payment of the mulct, [36]is not the price of a dispensation to sweare, but the Punishment of the transgression of a Law undispensable. In like manner if the Law impose a Summe of Mony to be payd, to him that has been Injured; this is but a satisfaction for the hurt done him; and extinguisheth the accusation of the party injured, not the crime of the offender.[36]

[34] authority [35] ^ to all citizens,

[36] cannot be regarded as a dispensation of the law, since the divine laws and the laws of nature cannot be dispensed.

Poenae Divinae sunt vel Humanae. De illis dicemus alio loco magis proprio inferiùs.[d]

Humanae sunt illae Poenae, quae Authoritate humana infliguntur; suntque vel Corporales, vel Pecuniariae, vel Ignominia, vel Incarceratio vel Exilium, vel ex his mixta.

Poena Corporalis est quae infligitur in corpus per voluntatem infligentis; qualia sunt verbera, vulnera, & earum rerum ablatio, quae corpori jucundae existentes, prius possidebantur.

Quarum Poenarum aliae capitales, aliae minores sunt. Capitalis, est mortis inflictio, sive simplicis, sive cum cruciatu. Minores Poenae sunt verbera, vulnera, vincula omnisque alia corporis afflictio, quae sua natura non sunt lethales; etsi enim per accidens aliquod non praevisum mors sequatur, non dicetur Poena Capitalis.

Poena pecuniaria est ablatio non solum Summae alicujus Pecuniae, sed etiam cujuscunque rei Pecunia commutabilis. Quod si Lex Poenam definiat Pecuniariam, eo fine ut à transgressoribus Legis Pecuniam auferat, Poena propriè loquendo non est, sed Privilegii, sive exemptionis à Lege Pretium; quia factum ipsum non absolutè vetat Lex talis Civibus omnibus, sed illis tantum qui pecuniam definitam non possunt solvere. Sed in Legibus Naturae, & Legibus de cultu Divino aliter se res habet. Nam si in eos qui sine causa juraverint, mulcta statueretur pecuniaria, pecunia illa pro Legis dispensatione haberi non posset, cum Leges Divinae & Leges Naturae sint indispensabiles.

Ignominy. Ignominy, is the infliction of such Evill, as is made Dishonorable; or the deprivation of such Good, as is made Honourable by the Common-wealth. For there be some things Honorable by Nature; as the effects of Courage, Magnanimity, [37]Strength, Wisdome, and[37] other abilities of body and mind: Others made Honorable by the Common-wealth; as Badges, Titles, Offices, or any Other singular marke of the Soveraigns favour. The former, °(though they may faile by nature, or accident,)° cannot be taken away by a Law; °and therefore the losse of them is not Punishment.° But the later, may be taken away by the [38]publique authority that made them Honorable,[38] and are properly Punishments: °Such are degrading men condemned, of their Badges, Titles, and Offices; or declaring them uncapable of the like in time to come.°

Imprisonment. Imprisonment, is [39]when a man is by publique Authority deprived of liberty; and may happen[39] from two divers ends; whereof one is the safe custody of a man accused; the other is the [40]inflicting of paine on[40] a man condemned. The former is not Punishment; because no man [41]is supposed to be Punisht, before he be Judicially heard, and declared guilty.[41] And therefore whatsoever hurt a man is made to suffer by [42]bonds, or restraint, before his cause be heard,[42] over and above that which is necessary to assure his custody, is against the Law of Nature. But the later is Punishment, because [43]Evill, and inflicted by publique Authority, for somewhat that has by the same Authority been Judged a Transgression of the Law. Under this word Imprisonment, I comprehend all restraint of motion, caused by an externall obstacle, be it a House, which is called by the general name of a Prison; or an Iland, as when men are said to be confined to it; or a place where men are set to worke, as in old time men have been condemned to Quarries, and in these times to Gallies; or be it a Chaine, or any other such impediment.[43]

[37] prudence, and some [38] commonwealth on account of crimes,
[39] any taking away of bodily liberty; and it may be taken away on account of crimes, by the commonwealth, [40] punishment of [41] can be justly punished before he is judged.
[42] being kept in custody, before he is heard and condemned,
[43] it is inflicted by the commonwealth on account of a crime that has undergone hearing and judgement.

Ignominia inflictio est mali, cui à Civitate nota apponitur turpitudinis, vel deprivatio Boni quod à Civitate pro Honore concessum [149] est. Sunt autem quaedam naturaliter honorifica, ut Fortitudo, Magnanimitas, Prudentia, aliaeque aliquae Corporis & animi facultates. Alia honorifica facta sunt à Civitate, vt Insignia, Tituli, Officia, & quaecunque gratiae apud illum qui Summam habet Potestatem, signa singularia. Priora illa tolli Lege non possunt. Posteriora à Civitate, propter Crimina, tolli possunt; & Poenae propriè sunt.

Per Incarcerationem intelligo quamcunque Libertatis Corporalis ablationem, quam duabus de causis Civitas propter Crimen tollit. Quarum altera est, ut custodiatur reus ne aufugiat, altera ut sit pro Poena condemnati. Prior harum Poena non est; quia antequam Iudicetur nemo justè puniri potest. Malum itaque quod quis reus antequam audiatur & condemnetur, per custodiam patitur, plus quam custodiae necessarium est, contra Leges Naturae infligitur; Posterior, Poena est; quia à Civitate, & propter Crimen auditum & judicatum infligitur.

Exile.

Exile, (Banishment) is when a [44]man[44] is for a crime, condemned [165] to depart out of the dominion of the Common-wealth, °or out of a certaine part thereof;° and during a prefixed time, or for ever, °not to return into it:° and seemeth not in its own nature, without other circumstances, to be a Punishment; but rather an escape, or a publique commandement to avoid Punishment by flight. And Cicero [45] sayes, there was never any such Punishment ordained in the City of Rome; but cals it a refuge of [46]men[46] in danger.[h] For if a man banished, be neverthelesse permitted to enjoy his Goods, and the Revenue of his Lands, the meer change of ayr is no Punishment; nor does it tend to that benefit of the Common-wealth, for which all Punishments are ordained, °(that is to say, to the forming of mens wils to the observation of the Law;)° but [47]many times[47] to the dammage of the Common-wealth. For a Banished man, is a lawfull enemy of the Common-wealth °that banished him; as being no more a Member of the same.° But if he be [48] withall deprived of his Lands, or Goods, then the Punishment °lyeth not in the Exile, but° is to be reckoned amongst Punishments Pecuniary.

The Punishment of Innocent Subjects is contrary to the Law of Nature.

All Punishments of Innocent [49]subjects,[49] be they great or little, are against the Law of Nature[50]: For Punishment is only for Transgression of the Law, °and therefore there can be no Punishment of the Innocent. It is therefore a violation, First, of that Law of Nature, which forbiddeth all men, in their Revenges, to look at any thing but some future good: For there can arrive no good to the Common-wealth, by Punishing the Innocent. Secondly, of that, which forbiddeth Ingratitude: For seeing all Soveraign Power, is originally given by the consent of every one of the Subjects, to the end they should as long as they are obedient, be protected thereby; the Punishment of the Innocent, is a rendring of Evill for Good. And thirdly, of the Law that commandeth Equity; that is to say, an equall distribution of Justice; which in Punishing the Innocent is not observed.°

Exilium est, quando propter Crimen condemnatur Civis ad exeundum è dominio Civitatis, sive pro tempore, sive in perpetuum; videturque sua natura sine aliis circumstantiis, Poena non esse, sed potius Aufugium, vel mandatum publicum fugiendi Poenam. Hujusmodi Poenam in Civitate Romana negat esse Romanarum Legum scientissimus Cicero; Exiliumque periclitantium Civium Refugium vocat.[h] Nam qui exulet, si tamen bonis suis reditibusque frui permittatur, solam coeli mutationem patitur, quae Poena non est; neque ad Civitatis tendit utilitatem, quae Poenarum finis est, sed potius damnum. Qui enim à Civitate expellitur hostis fit Legitimus. Verum si quis non modo in Exilium missus sit fortunis autem suis simul mulctatus fuerit, Poena ejus inter Pecuniarias numeranda est.

Punitiones Civium innocentium, sive graves, sive leves, sunt omnes contra Leges Naturae, & actiones hostiles. Punitio enim illorum tantum est, qui Crimen commiserunt.

But the Harme done to Innocents in War, not so:

But the Infliction of what evill soever, on an Innocent man, that is not a [51]Subject,[51] if it be for the benefit of the Common-wealth, and without violation of any former Covenant, is no breach of the Law of Nature. For all men that are not [52]Subjects,[52] are either Enemies, or else they [53]have ceased from being so, by some precedent covenants.[53] But against [54]Enemies, whom the Common-wealth judgeth capable to do them hurt,[54] it is lawfull by the °originall° Right of Nature to make warre; wherein the Sword Judgeth not, nor doth the Victor make distinction of Nocent,[i] and Innocent, as to the time past; nor has other respect of mercy, than as it conduceth to the [55]good of his own People.[55] And upon this ground it [56]is, that also in Subjects,[56] who deliberatly deny the Authority of the Common-wealth established, the vengeance is lawfully extended, not onely to [57]the Fathers,[57] but also to the third and fourth generation[j] not yet in being, and consequently innocent of the fact, [58]for which they are afflicted:[58] because the nature of this offence, consisteth in the renouncing of [59]subjection; which is a relapse into the condition of warre, commonly called Rebellion; and they that so offend, suffer not as Subjects, [166] but as Enemies. For Rebellion, is but warre renewed.[59]

Nor that which is done to declared Rebels.

Reward, is either Salary, or Grace.

REWARD, is either of Gift, or by Contract. When by Contract, it is called Salary, and Wages; which is benefit due for service performed, or promised. When of Gift, it is benefit proceeding from the grace of them that bestow it, to encourage, [60]or enable men to do them service. And therefore when the Soveraign of a Common-wealth appointeth a Salary to any publique Office, he that receiveth it, is bound in Justice to performe his office; otherwise, he is bound onely in honour, to acknowledgement, and an endeavour of requitall. For though men have no lawfull remedy, when they be commanded[60] to quit their private businesse, to serve the publique, without °Reward, or° Salary; yet they are not bound thereto, by the Law of Nature, nor by the Institution of the Common-wealth, unlesse the [61]service cannot otherwise be done;[61] because it is supposed the Soveraign may make use of [62]all their means,[62] insomuch as the most common Souldier, may demand the wages of his warrefare, as a [63] debt.

Caeterum in hominem Innocentem Mali cujuscunque inflictio, si Civis non sit, si sine praecedentis alicujus pacti violatione fiat, si denique eo fine fiat ut juvetur Civitas, Legis Naturalis transgressio non est. Omnes enim homines aut Cives sunt aut hostes, aut pacto inter Civitates amici sunt. Sed contra hostes à Civitate Iudicatos, à quibus damnum Civitati expectatur, Iure Naturae bellum facere licitum est; in quo bello neque gladius judicat, neque Victor distinguit quatenus ad tempus praeteritum inter Nocentes & Innocentes, neque cuiquam parcit, nisi quatenus conducit ad salutem Civium. Hinc etiam manifestum est in Cives eos qui Authoritatem Civitatis pernegaverint vindictam [150] extendi licitè posse, non solum ad ipsos, sed etiam ad posteros eorum usque ad tertiam & quartam generationem[j] nondum existentes, & per consequens facti à patribus suis commissi insontes; quia Criminis hujus natura consistit in eo, quod Civitatis regimini renuntiant, id est se Civitatis hostes esse profitentur. Qui autem sic faciunt, non ut Cives, sed ut Hostes puniri jure possunt.

Praemium dici solet, tum quod gratis, tum quod ex Pacto datur. Quando autem ex Pacto, pro mercede sumitur, & beneficium est pro bono praestito vel promisso debitum. Quando autem gratis datur, beneficium est à dantis gratia profectum, eo fine ut caeteri Cives ad Civitati bene serviendum excitentur; & propriè Praemium appellatur, differtque à mercede, quae debita est. Etsi enim Cives omnes, desertis rebus domesticis, servire Civitati etiam sine Mercede, si opus sit, obligentur: id tamen non à Lege Naturae neque Civitatis institutione est, nisi Civitas defendi aliâs non potest. Supponitur enim, illum qui Supremam habet Potestatem fortunis Civium omnium aequè uti posse, quibus, qui Civitatem defendunt, suis ipsorum rebus relictis remunerari debent: adeo ut militum infimus Militiae Mercedem ut Iure debitam postulare potest.

[56] is evident that among those citizens [57] them, [58] committed by their fathers:

[60] the other citizens to do good service to the commonwealth. Properly speaking, it is called a reward, and it differs from a salary, which is owed. For even though all citizens are obliged, when needed,
[61] commonwealth cannot otherwise be defended;

Benefits bestowed for fear, are not Rewards.

The benefits which a Soveraign bestoweth on a [64]Subject, for fear of some power, and ability he hath to[64] do hurt to the Common-wealth, are not °properly° Rewards; [65]for they are not Salaryes; because there is in this case no contract supposed, every man being obliged already not to do the Common-wealth disservice: nor are they Graces; because they be extorted by fear, which ought not to be incident to the Soveraign Power:[65] but are rather Sacrifices, which the Soveraign [66](considered in his naturall person, and not in the person of the Common-wealth) makes, for the appeasing the discontent of him he thinks more potent than himselfe;[66] and encourage not to obedience, but on the contrary, to [67]the continuance, and increasing of further extortion.[67]

Salaries Certain and Casuall.

And whereas some Salaries are certain, and proceed from the publique Treasure; and others uncertain, °and casuall,° proceeding from the execution of the Office °for which the Salary is ordained;° the later is [68]in some cases[68] hurtfull to the Common-wealth; as in the case of Judicature. [69]For where the benefit of the Judges, and Ministers of a Court of Justice, ariseth from the multitude of Causes that are brought to their cognisance, there must needs[69] follow two Inconveniences: One, is the nourishing of sutes; for [70]the more sutes, the greater benefit: and another that depends on that, which is contention about Jurisdiction; each Court drawing to it selfe, as many Causes as it can.[70] But in offices of Execution there are not those Inconveniences; °because their employment cannot be encreased by any endeavour of their own.° And thus much shall suffice for the nature of Punishment, and Reward; which are, as it were, the Nerves and Tendons, that move the limbes and joynts of a Common-wealth.

Hitherto I have set forth the nature of Man, (whose Pride and other Passions have compelled him to submit himselfe to Government;) together with the great power of his Governour, whom I compared to [71] Leviathan, °taking that comparison out of the two last verses° of the one and fortieth of Job; where God [72]having set forth the great power of Leviathan, calleth him King of the Proud.[72] There [167] is [73]nothing, saith he,[73] on earth, to be compared with him. He is made so as not to be afraid. Hee seeth every high thing below him; and is King of all the children of pride. But because he is mortall, and subject to decay, as all other Earthly creatures are; and because there is that in heaven, (though not on earth) that he should stand in fear of, and whose Lawes he ought to obey; I shall in the [74] next following Chapters speak of his Diseases, and the causes of his Mortality; and of what Lawes of Nature he is bound to obey.

CHAP. XXIX.

Of those things that Weaken, or tend to the DISSOLUTION of a Common-wealth.

Dissolution of Common-wealths proceedeth from their Imperfect Institution.

Though nothing [1]can be[1] immortall, which mortals make; yet, if men had the use of reason they pretend to, their Common-wealths might be secured, at least, from perishing by internall diseases. For [2]by the nature of their Institution, they are[2] designed to live, as long as Man-kind, or as the Lawes of Nature, or as Justice it selfe, which gives them life. Therefore when they come to be dissolved, not by externall violence, but intestine[a] disorder, the fault is [3]not in men, as they are the Matter; but as they are the Makers, and[3] orderers of them. For men, as they become [4]at last weary of irregular justling,[b] and hewing[c] one another, and desire with all their hearts, to conforme themselves[4] into one °firme and lasting° edifice; so for want, both of the art of making fit Lawes, to [5]square their actions by,[5] and also of humility, and patience,[d] to suffer the rude[e] and combersome points of their present greatnesse to be taken off, they cannot without the help of a very able Architect, be compiled,[f] into [6]any other than a crasie[g] building, such as hardly lasting out their own time, must assuredly fall[6] upon the heads of their posterity.

Amongst the Infirmities °therefore° of a Common-wealth, I will reckon in the first place, those that arise from an Imperfect Institution, and resemble the diseases of a naturall body, which proceed from a Defectuous Procreation.

Want of Absolute power.

Of which, this is one, That a man to obtain[h] a Kingdome, is sometimes content with lesse Power, than to the [7]Peace, and defence[7] of the Common-wealth is necessarily required. From whence it commeth to passe, that when the exercise of the Power layd by, is for the publique safety to be resumed, [8] it hath the resemblance of an unjust act; which disposeth great numbers of [9]men[9] (when occasion is presented) to rebell; In the same manner as the bodies of children, gotten by diseased parents, are subject either to untimely death, or to [10]purge the ill quality,[10] derived from their vicious conception, °by° breaking out into

[1] is [2] if we consider the purpose of their institution, they appear to be [3] in the

CAPVT XXIX.

De iis rebus quae Civitatem labefactant, tenduntque ad dissolutionem ejus.

Quanquam immortale nihil sit, quod mortales faciunt, si tamen rationis usum, quem sibi arrogant homines haberent, fieri posset Civitas adeo firma, ut ab internis saltem morbis interire non posset. Nam si Institutionis ejus spectemus finem, videbitur facta ad vitam generis humani, vel Legum Naturalium, vel Iustitiae ipsius (à quibus vitam accipit) durationi aequalem. Quoties ergo non vi externa sed seditionibus internis Civitas destruitur, culpa est Instituentium. Homines enim, quamquam confligendo, seque mutuò vulnerando defessi, in unum aedificium libenter coalescunt: condendarum tamen Legum ad eum finem conducentium & quibus actiones suas regerent necessariarum imperiti, patientiaque & humilitate carentes quoties amplitudinis suae rudes & molestas eminentias resecandas esse videant, in Civitatem nisi ab architecto peritissimo compingi non possunt, quae firma futura sit, nec vel ipsos, vel eorum posteros ruina opprimat.

Inter Infirmitates Civitatis primo loco ponendae sunt illae, quae ab imperfecta nascuntur Institutione, similesque sunt corporis naturalis morbis illis, qui procedunt à Generatione vitiosa.

Quarum una est, quod qui Regnum obtinere conatur, contentus quandoque sit Potestate minore, quam quae ad salutem Civitatis necessariò requiritur. Contingit inde ut Potestas illa quae neglecta erat, quando ad publicam salutem resumenda est, resumptio ejus injusta visa, multos simul Cives ad seditionem (data occasione) provocet; eodem planè modo quo corpora puerorum à Parentibus morbosis, aut morti immaturae subjecta sunt, aut humores noxii à [f] Hobbes apparently conflates two senses of 'compile' recorded by OED: to gather materials together into a heap or mass, and to construct something (e.g., a building) by putting materials together ('compile', v., 5, 6).

[g] = cracked, flawed, liable to fall to pieces (OED, 'crazy', a., 1).

biles[i] and scabbs. And when [11]Kings[11] deny themselves some such necessary Power, it is not alwayes [12](though sometimes) out of ignorance of what is necessary to the office they undertake; but many [168] times[12] out of a hope to recover the same again at their pleasure: Wherein they reason not well; because [13]such as will hold them to their promises,[13] shall be maintained against them by forraign Common-wealths; who in order to the [14]good of their own Subjects[14] let slip few occasions to weaken the estate of their Neighbours. So was Thomas Becket Archbishop of Canterbury, supported against Henry the Second, by the Pope; [15]the subjection of Ecclesiastiques to the Common-wealth, having been dispensed with by William the Conquerour at his reception, when he took[15] an Oath, not to infringe the liberty of the [16] Church.[j] And so [17]were the Barons, whose power was by William Rufus (to have their help in transferring the Succession[17] from his Elder brother, to himselfe,) encreased to a degree, inconsistent with the [18]Soveraign Power, maintained in their Rebellion against King John, by the French.[18] [k]

Nor does this happen in Monarchy onely. For whereas the stile of the antient Roman Common-wealth, was, The Senate, and People of Rome;[l] neither Senate, nor People [19]pretended to the whole Power; which first caused the seditions, of Tiberius Gracchus, Caius Gracchus, Lucius Saturninus, and others; and afterwards the warres between the Senate and the People, under Marius and Sylla; and again under[19] Pompey and Caesar,[m] to the Extinction of their Democraty, °and the setting up of Monarchy.°

°The people of Athens bound themselves but from one onely Action; which was, that no man on pain of death should propound the renewing of the warre for the Island of Salamis; And yet thereby, if Solon had not caused to be given out he was mad, and afterwards in gesture and habit of a madman, and in verse, propounded it to the People that flocked about him,[n] they had had an enemy perpetually in readinesse, even at the gates of their Citie; such dammage, or shifts, are all Common-wealths forced to, that have their Power never so little limited.°

prava generatione orti erumpunt in scabiem & ulcera. Quod autem hujusmodi jura necessaria Summi Imperantes sibi negent, non semper ab ignorantia id faciunt, sed aliquando ab eo, quod eadem jura arbitrio suo recipere se posse sperant. Sed rem non rectè supputant. Cives enim, qui [152] illum impediant, à Civitatibus aliis, quae ad Civium suorum salutem vicinos debilitandi opportunitates rarò praetermittunt, sustinebuntur. Sic Thomas Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis contra Henricum Secundum à Papa sustentatus est, eo nomine quod Gulielmus Rex Libertates Ecclesiae Romanae non violaturum se esse juramento promiserat.[j] Eodem modo Baronibus Angliae (quorum ope Gulielmus Secundus ad Regnum in se à fratre suo majore transferendum usurus erat) potestas ab ipso Gulielmo aucta est in tantum, ut non consisteret amplius cum Potestate Regia; unde rebellio contra Regem Iohannem orta est, & adjuta viribus Regis Galliarum.[k]

Neque in solis Monarchiis contingit hoc, nam in Civitate Romana, sub Senatu populóque Romano,[l] (ubi neque Senatus neque Populus Summam habuit Potestatem) seditiones innumerae indies nascebantur, & bella Civilia à Gracchis, Saturnino, Mario, Sylla, Pompejo, Caesare,[m] quibus extincta tandem est Democratia Romana.

[j] The support given by Pope Alexander III for Thomas Becket in his dispute with Henry II was a well-attested historical fact (chronicled in, e.g., Foxe, Actes and Monuments, i, pp. 186–202); but Hobbes's reasons for his claim about the oath by William I are less clear. He may have been thinking partly of the ordinance issued by William some time in the 1070s, separating ecclesiastical from lay jurisdiction (given in translation by Foxe, i, pp. 154–5; an abbreviated text was printed in Selden, Historie of Tithes, pp. 413–14; for the full text see Bates, ed., Regesta anglo-normannorum, pp. 441–2); possibly he conflated this with the information that William swore at his coronation 'to defend the holie church, and rulers of the same' (Holinshed, Third Volume, p. 1).

[k] Holinshed notes that William Rufus (William II) promised 'more fauourable ordinances' to the nobility in order to secure his succession (Third Volume, p. 16). The complicity or collaboration between the French crown and the noblemen who rebelled against King John is a major theme of the account of John's reign in Speed, History of Great Britaine, bk. 9, ch. 8, esp. pp. 508–10, 513–16.

[l] 'Senatus populusque romanus', abbreviated 'SPQR', was the official formulaic phrase for the government of the Roman Republic.

[m] All were leaders of factions in civil conflicts: Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus (d. 133 BC) and his brother Gaius Sempronius Gracchus (d. 121 BC), reformist tribunes for the plebeians, both killed by their opponents; Lucius Appuleius Saturninus (d. 100 BC), also a tribune and demagogue (and ally of Marius), killed by his opponents; Marius and Sulla (see above, Ch. 27, note i); and Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus (106–48 BC) and Gaius Julius Caesar (100–44 BC), who fought each other in 49–48 BC.

[n] Plutarch, Life of Solon, VIII.

Private Judgement of Good and Evill.

In the second place, I observe the Diseases of a Common-wealth, that proceed from the poyson of seditious doctrines; whereof [20]one[20] is, That every private [21]man[21] is Judge of Good and Evill actions. This is true in the condition of meer Nature, where there are no Civill Lawes; and also [22]under Civill Government, in such cases as are not determined by the[22] Law. But otherwise, it is manifest, that the measure of Good and Evill actions, is the Civill Law; and the Judge the [23]Legislator, who is always Representative of the Common-wealth.[23] From this false doctrine, men are disposed to [24]debate with themselves,[24] and dispute the commands of the Common-wealth; and afterwards to obey, or disobey them, as in their private judgements they shall think fit. Whereby the Common-wealth is distracted[p] [25] and Weakened.

Erroneous conscience.

Another doctrine repugnant to Civill [26]Society,[26] is, that whatsoever a [27]man[27] does against his Conscience, is Sinne; and it dependeth on the °presumption of° making himself judge of Good and Evill. For a mans Conscience, and his Judgement is the same thing; and °as the Judgement, so also the Conscience° may be erroneous. Therefore, though [169] he that is subject to no Civill Law, sinneth in all he does against his Conscience, because he has no other rule to follow but his own reason; yet it is not so with him that [28]lives in a Common-wealth; because the Law is the publique Conscience, by which he hath already undertaken to be guided.[28] Otherwise in such diversity, as there is of private Consciences, which are but private opinions, the Common-wealth must needs be distracted,[q] and no man [29]dare to[29] obey the Soveraign Power, farther than it shall seem good in his own eyes.

Pretence of Inspiration.

It hath been also commonly taught, [30] That Faith and Sanctity, are not to be attained by Study and Reason, but by supernaturall Inspiration, or Infusion. Which granted, I see not why any man should [31] render a reason of his Faith; or why every Christian should not be also a Prophet; or why any man should [32]take the Law of his Country, rather than his own Inspiration, for the rule of his action.[32] And thus wee fall again into the fault of taking upon us to Judge of Good and Evill; [33]or to make[33] Judges of it, such private men as [34] pretend to be supernaturally Inspired, °to the Dissolution of all Civill Government.°

Secundo loco Civitatis morbos illos noto, qui oriuntur à veneno doctrinarum seditiosarum; quarum prima est, bonarum & malarum actionum Iudicem esse Civem privatum quemlibet. Quae quidem in conditione naturali, nondum existentibus Legibus Civilibus, atque etiam in Civitatibus quod attinet ad actiones quae nulla Lege prohibentur vera est. Manifestum alioqui est, mensuram Boni & Mali in actionibus, esse Legem Civilem; Iudicemque esse, qui Summam habet Potestatem. Ab hac doctrina est, quòd Cives mandata Civitatis judicare & disputare discunt; deinde obedire vel repugnare arbitrio proprio; unde Civitas in factiones discinditur & debilitatur.

Doctrina alia quae obedientiae Civili repugnat, est, quicquid faciat Civis quicunque contra Conscientiam suam, Peccatum esse; quae doctrina ab eo nascitur, quod Iudices se faciunt homines Boni & Mali. Conscientia enim & Iudicium hominis eadem res est, & erroribus obnoxia. Etsi ergo is, qui nulla Lege Civili obligatur, contra Conscientiam agens peccet, propterea quod actionum suarum regulam aliam non habet, praeter suam ipsius Rationem, aliter tamen se res habet in iis, qui Legibus Civilibus sese submiserunt: ubi non privata sed publica Lex unicuique Civi pro Conscientia habenda est. Faith comes by hearing,[r] and hearing by those accidents, which guide us into the presence of them that [35]speak to us; which accidents are all[35] contrived by God °Almighty;° and yet are not supernaturall, but onely, for the great number of them [36]that concurre to[s] every effect, unobservable.[36] Faith, and Sanctity, are indeed not very frequent; but yet they are not Miracles, but brought to passe by education, discipline, correction, and other naturall [37]wayes,[37] by which God worketh them in [38]his elect, at such time as he thinketh fit. °And these three opinions, pernicious to Peace and Government, have in this part of the world, proceeded chiefly from the tongues, and pens of unlearned Divines; who joyning the words of Holy Scripture together, otherwise than is agreeable to reason, do what they can, to make men think, that Sanctity and Naturall Reason, cannot stand together.°

Subjecting the Soveraign Power to Civill Lawes.

A fourth opinion, repugnant to [39]the nature of a Common-wealth,[39] is this, That he that hath the Soveraign Power, is subject to the Civill Lawes. It is true, that Soveraigns are all subject to the Lawes of Nature; because such lawes be Divine, and cannot by any man, or Common-wealth be abrogated. But to those Lawes which the Soveraign himselfe, that is, which the Common-wealth maketh, he is not subject. For [40]to be subject to Lawes, is to be subject to the Common-wealth, that is to the Soveraign Representative, that is to himselfe; which is not subjection, but freedome from the Lawes. Which errour, because it setteth the Lawes above the Soveraign, setteth also a Judge above him, and a Power to punish him; which is to make a new Soveraign; and again for the same reason a third, to punish the second; and so continually without end, to the Confusion, and Dissolution of the Common-wealth.[40]

Attributing of absolute Propriety to Subjects.

A Fifth doctrine, that tendeth [41]to the Dissolution of a Common-wealth,[41] is, That every private [42]man[42] has an absolute Propriety in his Goods; such, as excludeth the Right of the [43]Soveraign.[43] Every [44]man[44] has indeed a Propriety that excludes the Right of every other [45]Subject: And he has it onely[45] from the Soveraign Power; without the protection [170] whereof, every other man should have equall Right to the same[46]. But if the Right of the Soveraign also be excluded, he cannot [47]performe the office they have put him into; which is, to defend them[47] both from forraign enemies, and from the injuries of one another; and consequently there is no longer a Common-wealth.

°And if the Propriety of Subjects, exclude not the Right of the Soveraign Representative to their Goods; much lesse to their offices of Judicature, or Execution, in which they Represent the Soveraign himselfe.°

hominum, qui se supernaturaliter Inspiratos esse mentirentur. Fides ab auditu nascitur;[r] auditus autem uniuscujusque à rebus contingentibus est, quibus in praesentiam eorum, quos audire utile est, conducimur. Quae res contingentes respectu nostri, à consilio Dei proficiscuntur, non sunt tamen supernaturales, sed tantum propter multitudinem non facile observabiles. Fides & Sanctitas etsi rarae, non ideo sunt Miracula, sed procedunt ab educatione, disciplina, correctione, aliisque causis naturalibus, quibus Deus utitur in illis quos elegit, quo tempore ipsi visum est, instruendis.

Repugnans obedientiae Civili doctrina quarta est, Legibus Civilibus subditum esse illum, qui Summam habet Potestatem. Subditum esse illum Legibus Naturae verum est; Leges enim illae Divinae sunt, neque possunt ab Homine vel Civitate quacunque abrogari. Sed Legibus quas Civitas, id est quas ipse tulerit subditus non est. Non est enim cui subjiceretur praeterquam sibi. Qui autem suis ipsius tantum Legibus obligatur liberrimus est. Non viderunt autem qui Summum Imperantem obligare voluerunt, erigendam sibi esse Potestatem quae ipsum puniret, & ad hanc puniendam Potestatem aliam, ita ut nulla omnino constaret Civitas.

Eodem tendit doctrina quinta, Civem unumquemque Bonorum suorum ita absolutum esse Dominum, ut Dominium Civitatis in Bona eadem excludatur. Civem quidem unumquemque in bona sua Dominium proprium, quod Ius Civium caeterorum omnium excludit, habere non negamus. Sed Dominium illud à Summa Potestate habet, sine cujus protectione quicquid habet non alio jure haberet quam quicunque alius; quia omnia essent omnium. Verum si Ius etiam ejus qui Summam habet Potestatem excluderetur, protegere Cives non posset, neque ab hostibus externis neque ab injuriis mutuis, & proinde non amplius esset Civitas.

Dividing of the Soveraign Power.

There is a Sixth doctrine, plainly, °and directly° against the essence of a Common-wealth; and 'tis this, That the Soveraign Power may be divided. For what is it to divide the Power of a Common-wealth, but to Dissolve it; for Powers divided mutually destroy each other. °And for these three doctrines, men are chiefly beholding to some of those, that making profession of the Lawes, endeavour to make them depend upon their own learning, and not upon the Legislative Power.°

Imitation of Neighbour Nations.

And as False Doctrine, so also [48]often-times the Example of different Government in a neighbouring Nation, disposeth[48] men to alteration of the forme already setled. So the people of [49]the Jewes were stirred up to reject God, and to call upon the Prophet Samuel, for a[49] King after the manner of the Nations:[t] So also the lesser Cities of [50] Greece, were continually disturbed, with seditions of the [51]Aristocraticall, and Democraticall factions; one part of almost every Common-wealth, desiring to imitate the Lacedaemonians; the other,[51] the Athenians.[u] And I doubt not, but many [52]men,[52] have been contented to see the [53]late troubles in England, out of an imitation of the Low Countries;[53] supposing there needed no more to grow rich, than to [54]change, as they had done,[54] the forme of their Government.[v] For the constitution of mans nature, is of it selfe subject to desire novelty: [55]When therefore they are provoked to the same, by the neighbourhood also of those that have been enriched by it, it is almost impossible for them, not to be content with those that solicite them to change; and[55] love the first beginnings, though they be grieved with the continuance of disorder; like hot blouds, that having gotten the itch, tear themselves with their own nayles, till they can endure the smart no longer[56].

Imitation of the Greeks, and Romans.

And as to Rebellion in particular against Monarchy; one of the [57]most frequent[57] causes of it, is the Reading of the books of Policy,[w] and Histories of the antient Greeks, and Romans; from which, young men, and all others that are unprovided of the Antidote of solid Reason, receiving a strong, and delightfull impression, of the great exploits of warre, °atchieved by the Conductors[x] of their Armies,° receive withall a pleasing Idea, of all they have done besides; and imagine [58]their great prosperity, not to have proceeded from the aemulation of particular men, but from the vertue of[58] their popular forme of government: °Not considering the frequent Seditions, and Civ-

Doctrina sexta est quae contra Essentiam Civitatis apertè, pugnat, nempe, Summam Potestatem posse dividi. Quid enim aliud est Potestatem Civitatis dividere, nisi dissolvere; Potestates enim divisae mutuò se destruunt.

Quemadmodum autem doctrinae erroneae, ita etiam aliquando [154] exempla Civitatum vicinarum ad mutationes Politiae praesentis hortari solent. Ita populus Israeliticus ab imitatione Gentium vicinarum à Deo rege suo deficientes, Prophetam Samuelem eligere sibi Regem novum compulerunt.[t] Sic etiam in Graecia antiqua, Civitates minores perpetuò turbabantur à Seditionibus Civium, quorum alii Lacedaemonios imitati Aristocratiam; alii Athenienses admirantes, Democratiam postulaverunt.[u] Neque dubito quin nostrorum multi bellum, quod nunc geritur in Anglia libenter videant; nihil ad divitias comparandas amplius opus esse arbitrati, quam ut exemplo Batavorum Regem suum exuerent, mutationi regiminis divitias imputantes, quas homines illi, sua industria acquisierant.[v] Homines enim Natura sua novitatis avidi, turbarum initia amare solent, etsi earundem duratione offendantur; quemadmodum qui à calore sanguinis laborant prurigine, propriis unguibus sese lacerant, ita ut dolorem tolerare ampliùs non valentes morbum agnoscant.

Seorsum in Monarchiis, inter Rebellionis causas maximas numerari potest Librorum Politicorum & Historicorum quos scripserunt veteres Graeci & Romani, lectio; Iuvenes enim, aliique quicunque Rationis solidae Antidoto muniti antè non fuerint, rerum ab illis bello magnificè gestarum, vividam jucundamque impressionem concipientes, caeteras eorum actiones simul admirantur, Civitatumque illarum magnitudinem imputant, non (ut oportuit) ill warres, produced by the imperfection of their Policy.°[y] From the reading, I say, of such books, men have undertaken to kill their Kings, because the Greek and Latine writers, [59]in their books, and [171] discourses of Policy, make it lawfull, and[59] laudable, for any man so to do; provided before he do it, he call him Tyrant.[z] °For they say not Regicide, that is, killing of a King, but Tyrannicide, that is, killing of a Tyrant is lawfull.° From the same books, they that live under a Monarch [60]conceive an opinion, that[60] the Subjects in a Popular Common-wealth enjoy Liberty; but that in a Monarchy they are all Slaves. °I say, they that live under a Monarchy conceive such an opinion; not they that live under a Popular Government: for they find no such matter.° In summe, I cannot imagine, how any thing can be more prejudiciall to a Monarchy, than the allowing of such books to be publikely [61]read,[61] without present applying such correctives of discreet[aa] Masters, as are fit to take away their Venime: Which [62]Venime I will not doubt[ab] to compare to[62] the biting of a mad Dogge, which is °a disease the Physicians call° Hydrophobia, or fear of Water. For as he that is so bitten, has a continuall torment of thirst, and yet abhorreth water; [63]and is in such an estate, as if the poyson endeavoured to convert him into a Dogge:[ac] So when a Monarchy is once bitten to the quick, by those Democraticall writers, that continually snarle at that estate; it wanteth nothing more than a strong Monarch, which neverthelesse out of a certain Tyrannophobia, or feare of being strongly governed, when they have him, they abhorre.[63]

Mihi ergo Monarchiis nihil videtur damnosius esse posse, quam permittere, ut hujusmodi libri publicè doceantur, nisi simul à Magistris sapientibus quibus venenum corrigi possit remedia applicentur. As there have been Doctors, that hold there be three Soules in a man;[ae] so there be also that think there may be more Soules, (that is, more Soveraigns,) than one, in a Common-wealth; and set up a Supremacy against the Soveraignty; Canons against Lawes; and a Ghostly[af] Authority against the Civill; [64]working on mens minds, with words and distinctions, that of themselves signifie nothing, but[64] bewray[ag] (by their obscurity) that there [65]walketh (as some think invisibly) another Kingdome, as it were a Kingdome of Fayries, in the dark. Now seeing it is manifest, that the Civill Power, and the Power of the Common-wealth is the same thing; and that Supremacy, and the Power of making Canons, and granting Faculties,[ah] implyeth a Common-wealth; it followeth, that where one is Soveraign, another Supreme; where one can make Lawes, and another make Canons; there must needs be two Common-wealths, of one & the same Subjects; which is a Kingdome divided in it selfe, and cannot stand.[65] [ai] For notwithstanding the insignificant distinction of Temporall, and Ghostly, they are still two [66]Kingdomes, and every Subject[66] is subject to two Masters.[aj] For seeing the Ghostly Power challengeth[ak] the Right to declare what is Sinne it challengeth by consequence to declare what is Law, (Sinne being nothing but the transgression of the Law;) and again, the Civill Power challenging to declare what is Law, every [67]Subject[67] must obey two Masters, °who both will have their Commands be observed as Law;° which is impossible. °Or, if it be but one Kingdome, either the Civill, which is the Power of the Common-wealth, must be subordinate to the Ghostly, and then there is no Soveraignty but the Ghostly; or the Ghostly must be subordinate to the Temporall, and then there is no Supremacy but the Temporall.° When therefore these two Powers oppose one another, [68]the Common-wealth cannot but be in great[68] [172] danger of Civill warre, and [69] Dissolution. For the Civill Authority being more visible, and standing in the cleerer light [70]of naturall reason, cannot choose but draw to it in all times a very considerable[70] part of the people: And the Spirituall[71], though it stand [72] in the darknesse of Schoole distinctions, and [73]hard[73] words; yet because the fear of °Darknesse, and° Ghosts, is greater than [74]other fears,[74] cannot want a party sufficient to Trouble, [75]and sometimes[75] to Destroy a Common-wealth. And this is a Disease [76] which not unfitly may be compared to the Epilepsie, or Falling-sickness (which the Jewes took to be one kind of possession by Spirits)[al] °in the Body Naturall.° For as in this Disease, there is an unnaturall spirit, or wind in the head that obstructeth the roots of the Nerves, and moving them violently, taketh away the motion which naturally they should have °from the power of the Soule in the Brain, and thereby causeth violent, and irregular motions (which men call Convulsions) in the parts;° insomuch as he that is seized therewith, falleth down sometimes into the water, and sometimes into the fire,[am] °as a man deprived of his senses;° so also in the Body Politique, when the spirituall power, moveth the Members of a Common-wealth, by the terrour of [77] punishments, and hope of rewards °(which are the Nerves of it,)° otherwise than by the Civill Power (which is the Soule of the Common-wealth) they ought to be moved; and by strange, and [78]hard[78] words suffocates their understanding, it must needs thereby [79]Distract[an] the people, and either Overwhelm the Common-wealth with Oppression, or cast it[79] into the Fire of a Civill warre.

Mixt Government.

°Sometimes also in the meerly Civill government, there be more than one Soule: As when the Power of levying mony, (which is the Nutritive faculty,) has depended on a generall Assembly; the Power of conduct[ao] and command, (which is the Motive faculty,) on one man; and the Power of making Lawes, (which is the Rationall faculty,) on the accidentall consent, not onely of those two, but also of a third; This endangereth the Common-wealth, sometimes for want of consent to good Lawes; but most often for want of such Nourishment, as is necessary to Life, and Motion. For although few perceive, that such government, is not government, but division of the Common-wealth into three Factions, and call it mixt Monarchy; yet the truth is, that it is not one independent Common-wealth, but three independent Factions; nor one Representative Person, but three. In the Kingdome of God, there may be three Persons independent, without breach of unity in God that Reigneth; but where men Reigne, that be subject to diversity of opinions, it cannot be so. And therefore if the King bear the person of the People, and the generall Assembly bear also the person of the People, and another Assembly bear the person of a Part of the people, they are not one Person, nor one Soveraign, but three Persons, and three Soveraigns.°

°To what Disease in the Naturall Body of man, I may exactly compare this irregularity of a Common-wealth, I know not. But I have seen a man, that had another man growing out of his side, with an head, armes, breast, and

Want of Mony.

[80]Hitherto I have named such Diseases of a Common-wealth, as are of the greatest, and most present danger. There be other, not so great; which nevertheless are not unfit to be observed. At first, the difficulty of raising Mony, for the necessary uses of the Common-wealth; especially in the approach of warre. This difficulty ariseth from the opinion, that every Subject hath of a Propriety in his lands and goods, exclusive of the Soveraigns Right to the use of the same.[80] From whence it commeth to passe, that the Soveraign °Power, which foreseeth the necessities and dangers of the Common-wealth,° (finding the passage of mony to the publique Treasure obstructed, [81]by the tenacity of the people,) whereas it ought to extend it selfe, to encounter,[aq] and prevent such dangers in their beginnings, contracteth it selfe as long as it can, and when it cannot longer, struggles with the people by stratagems of Law, to obtain little summes, which not sufficing, he is fain at last violently to open the way for present supply, or Perish; and being put often to these extremities, at last reduceth the people to their due temper;[81] or else the Common-wealth must perish. [82]Insomuch as we may compare this Distemper very aptly to an Ague; wherein, the fleshy parts being congealed, or by venomous matter obstructed;[82] the Veins which by their naturall course empty themselves into the Heart, are not (as they ought to be) supplyed from the Arteries, whereby there succeedeth at first a cold contraction, and trembling of the limbes; and afterwards a hot, and strong endeavour of the Heart, to force a passage for the Bloud[83]; and before it can do that, contenteth it selfe with the small refreshments of such things as coole °for a time,° till (if Nature be strong enough) [84]it break at last the contumacy[ar] of the parts obstructed, and dissipateth the venome into sweat;[84] or (if Nature be too weak) the Patient dyeth.

[80] There is also sometimes in commonwealths a disease which is to be compared to a tertian fever,[ap] when bad citizens, through hatred of their government or of their ruler, or because civil war is profitable to them, obstruct the gathering of those sums of money that are due from the citizens for the safety of the commonwealth, by slandering their rulers.

[81]) at first contracts himself; then, when public affairs require force and movement, he is compelled to resort to political stratagems to exact little sums, with great difficulty, rather often; nor do they suffice for what needs to be done; so in the end that obstruction must be removed, and a way must be opened for moneys to flow to the public treasury,

[82] Likewise, in a fever, when the muscles are obstructed by a poisoned humour,

[83] ^ through the muscles [84] the blood breaks through, and the poisoned humour is sweated out;

Est etiam in Civitatibus aliquando morbus Febri tertianae[ap] comparandus, nempe quando mali Cives odio Regiminis vel Regentis, vel eò quod utile sit ipsis bellum Civile, Pecuniarum necessariarum ad salutem Civitatis à Civibus conferendarum collationem calumniis [156] regentium impediunt. Itaque qui Summam habet Potestatem, Pecuniae ad Thesaurum publicum affluxum impeditum videns, primo se contrahit; deinde quando vim & motum postulent negotia publica, cogitur ad stratagemata politica, quibus supplementa parvi momenti cum multa difficultate, & saepius exigat, nec ea gerendis rebus sufficientia. Itaque vi tandem obstructio illa tollenda est, & Pecuniis ad publicum Thesaurum via aperienda, aut Civitati pereundum est. Eodem modo in Febri, quando musculi humore venenato obstruuntur, Venae quae sanguinem naturaliter in cor infundunt, non, ut solet fieri, supplentur ab Arteriis, inde algor sequitur primo, artuumque tremor & contractio; deinde ardor vehemens, & cordis labor, sanguinis per musculos transitum vi aperientis, & exiguis interim contenti refrigeriis; donec aut (vincente Natura) perrumpat sanguis, humorque venenatus exsudet; aut (victa Natura) sequatur mors.

[ap] A tertian fever was one characterized by the occurrence of a paroxysm every third (i.e., alternate) day (OED, 'tertian', a. and n., A.1). [aq] = confront, oppose (OED, 'encounter', v., 1–2).
[ar] = obstinate resistance (OED, 'contumacy', 1.b).

Monopolies and abuses of Publicans.

Again, there is [85]sometimes in a[85] Common-wealth, a Disease, which resembleth the Pleurisie; and that is, when the Treasure of the Common-wealth, flowing out of its due course, is gathered °together in too much abundance,° in one, or a few private men, °by Monopolies, or by Farmes of the Publique Revenues;° in the same manner as the Blood in a Pleurisie, [86]getting[86] into the Membrane of the breast, °breedeth there an Inflammation, accompanied with a Fever, and painfull stitches.°

Popular men.

Also, the [87] Popularity[as] of a potent Subject, °(unlesse the Commonwealth have very good caution[at] of his fidelity,)° is a dangerous Disease[88]; because the people (which should [89]receive their motion from the Authority of the Soveraign,) by the flattery, and by the reputation of an ambitious man, are drawn away from their obedience to the Lawes, to follow a man, of whose vertues, and designes they have no knowledge.[89] And this is commonly [90]of more danger[90] in a Popular Government, than in a Monarchy; [91]because an Army is of so great force, and multitude, as it may easily be made believe, they are the People. By this means it was, that Julius Caesar, who was [174] set up by the People against the Senate, having won to himselfe the affections of his Army, made himselfe Master, both of Senate and People.[au] And this proceeding of popular, and ambitious men, is plain Rebellion; and may be resembled to the effects of Witchcraft.[91]

Excessive greatnesse of a Town, multitude of Corporations.

Another infirmity [92]of a Common-wealth,[92] is the immoderate greatnesse of a Town, when it is [93]able to[93] furnish out of its own Circuit, the number, and expence of [94]a great[94] Army: As also the great number of [95]Corporations;[95] which are as it were many lesser Common-wealths in °the bowels of° a greater, like wormes in the entrayles of a naturall man. [90] a disease more likely [91] we have examples of it in the Roman commonwealth, such as Manlius, Marius, Caesar, and others; and in the Athenian commonwealth, Alcibiades, Pisistratus,[av] etc.

Est & alius morbus, praesertim in Civitate populari, qui Pleuritidem refert; nimirum, quando divitiae publicae, extra alveum proprium in unum vel paucos Cives confluunt; quemadmodum in Pleuritide extravasatur sanguis in Membranas pectoris.

Etiam Civis unius nimia popularitas morbus Civitati periculosus est. Populus enim qui Civitatis Legibus regendus est, ad obedientiam uni Civi praestandam, blanditiis, ab obedientia Legibus Civitati debita abducuntur. Sed hic Civitatis popularis potiùs quam Monarchiae morbus est, cujus exempla habemus in Civitate Romana, Manlium, Marium, Caesarem aliosque; & in Civitate Atheniensi Alcibiadem, Pisistratum,[av] &c.

Morbus alius, praesertim in Monarchiis, est magnitudo immoderata unius alicujus Vrbis; nempe quando tanta est, ut possit ex se ipsa exercitum subito & conscribere & alere; item oppidorum incorporatorum multitudo. Sunt enim totidem Civitates minores in majore; quasi in hominis Naturalis intestinis totidem lumbrici. Etiam disputandi libertas de summae Potestatis Iure, morbus satis molestus est, qui genitus ab iis qui sibi videntur docti Politici, in faece populi, facit ut perpetuò de Legibus fundamentalibus garrientes, Civitatem inquietam faciant; referunturque ad vermiculos quos Ascaridas vocant Medici.[ax]

Dissolution of the Common-wealth.

Lastly, when in a warre (forraign, or intestine,)[ba] the [100]enemies get a finall Victory; so as (the forces of the Common-wealth keeping the field no longer) there is no farther protection of Subjects in their loyalty;[100] then is the Common-wealth DISSOLVED, and every [101]man at liberty to protect[101] himselfe by such courses as his own discretion shall suggest unto him. For the Soveraign[102], is the publique Soule, giving Life and Motion to the Common-wealth; which expiring, the [103]Members[103] are governed by it no more, than the Carcasse of a man, by his departed °(though Immortall)° Soule. For though the Right of a Soveraign [104]Monarch[104] cannot be extinguished [105]by the act of another;[105] yet the Obligation of the [106]members may. For he that wants protection, may seek it any where; and when he hath it, is obliged (without fraudulent pretence of having submitted himselfe out of feare,) to protect his Protection as long as he is able. But when the Power of an Assembly is once supressed, the Right of the same perisheth utterly; because the Assembly it selfe is extinct; and consequently, there is no possibility for the Soveraignty to re-enter.[106]

CHAP. XXX.

Of the OFFICE of the Soveraign [1]Representative.[1]

The Procuration of the Good of the People.

The OFFICE of the Soveraign[2], (be it a Monarch, or an Assembly,) [3]consisteth in the end, for which he was trusted with the Soveraign Power, namely the procuration of[3] the safety of the people; [4]to which he is obliged[4] by the Law of Nature, and to render an account thereof to God, the Author of that Law, and to none but him. But by Safety here, is not meant [5]a bare Preservation,[5] but also all other Contentments of life, which every [6]man by lawfull Industry,[6] without danger, or hurt to the Common-wealth, shall acquire to himselfe.

By Instruction & Lawes.

And this is intended[a] should be done, not by care applyed to Individualls, °further than their protection from injuries, when they shall complain;° but by a generall Providence, contained in publique Instruction, both of Doctrine, and Example; and [7]in the making, and executing of good[7] Lawes, to which individuall [8]persons[8] may apply their own cases.

Against the duty of a Soveraign to relinquish any Essentiall Right of Soveraignty:

And because, if the essentiall Rights of Soveraignty (specified before in the eighteenth Chapter) be taken away, the Common-wealth is thereby dissolved, and every man returneth into the °condition, and° calamity of a warre with every other man, (which is the greatest evill that can happen [9]in this life;)[9] it is the Office of the Soveraign, to maintain those Rights entire; and consequently against his duty, First, to transferre to another, or to lay from himselfe [10] any of them. For he that deserteth the Means, deserteth the Ends; and [11]he deserteth the Means, that being the Soveraign,[11] acknowledgeth himselfe subject to the Civill Lawes; and renounceth the Power of °Supreme° Judicature; or of making Warre, or Peace [12]by his own Authority; or of Judging of the Necessities of the Common-wealth; or of levying Mony, and[12] Souldiers, when, and as much as °in his own conscience° he shall judge necessary; or of making °Officers, and° Ministers both of Warre, and Peace; or of [13]appointing Teachers, and examining[13] what Doctrines are conformable, °or contrary° to the °Defence,° Peace, and Good of the people. Secondly,

Or not to see the people taught the grounds of them.

it is against his Duty, to let the people be ignorant, °or mis-informed° of the grounds, and reasons of those his essentiall Rights; because thereby [14]men are easie to be seduced, and drawn to resist him, when the Common-wealth shall require their use and exercise.[14]

CAPVT XXX.

De Officio Summi Imperantis.

Summi Imperantis Officia (sive is Monarcha sit sive Coetus) manifestè indicat Institutionis Finis nimirum Salus Populi: quam Lege Naturae obligatur quantum potest procurare: & cujus rationem Deo, & illi soli tenetur reddere. In Salute autem Populi comprehendo non solum Civium vitam, sed etiam Commoda vitae, quae Cives singuli, sine Civitatis damno vel periculo sibi justè acquisita tenuerint.

Sed faciendum ita esse intelligitur, studium suum non Individuis applicando: sed Providentia universali, per instructiones publicas tum à Doctrinis, tum ab Exemplis, tum etiam per Leges salubres quibus Cives singuli actiones suas applicare possunt.

Quoniam autem Iuribus Summae Potestatis Essentialibus de quibus dictum est Cap. 18. sublatis, Civitas dissolvitur, reditque omnium in omnes belli calamitas (id quod Civitati malum maximum est) Summi Imperantis Officium est Iura illa retinere integra. Itaque contra Officium facit, primò, si ea vel aliqua eorum deponit, vel ad alium transfert. Qui enim Media, idem Finem deserit. Et per consequens, Legibus Civilibus se subjicere; Potestati Iudicandi; Bellum indicendi, vel Pacem faciendi; Milites alendi, quando & quomodo ipsi visum fuerit; Ministros tum Pacis, tum Belli eligendi; & quae Doctrinae Paci, & Bono publico conformes sunt, statuendi Potestati renuntiare contra Officium est. Secundò, contra Officium ejus est permittere, ut Iurium horum Essentialium causas & fundamenta populus ignoret; quia per ignorantiam harum rerum Cives seduci ad seditionem facile possunt & solent.

14 Civitas 70] Civitatis 68

[1] ruler. [2] ^ ruler [Note: hereafter 'Sovereign' is regularly translated as 'Summus Imperans' ('sovereign ruler'); these cases will not be separately noted.]
[3] is clearly indicated by the end for which he was instituted, namely,
[4] which he is obliged to procure, so far as he can, [5] only the life of the citizens,
[6] citizen justly, [7] through sound [8] citizens [9] to the commonwealth), [10] ^ those rights or [11] consequently he acts against his duty if he [12] ; or of maintaining [13] decreeing [14] the citizens can be, and commonly are, easily seduced into sedition.

[a] = understood (OED 'intend', v., 15, 16; cf. the Latin: 'intelligitur').

And the grounds of these Rights, have the rather[b] need to be diligently, and truly taught; because they [15]cannot be maintained by any Civill Law, or terrour of legall punishment. For a Civill Law, that shall forbid Rebellion, (and such is all resistance to the essentiall Rights of Soveraignty,) is not (as a Civill Law) any obligation, [176] but by vertue onely of the Law of Nature, that forbiddeth the violation of Faith; which naturall obligation if men know not, they cannot know the Right of any Law the Soveraign maketh. And for the Punishment, they take it but for an act of Hostility; which when they think they have strength enough, they will endeavour by acts of Hostility, to avoyd.[15]

Objection of those that say there are no Principles of Reason for absolute Soveraignty.

[16]As I have heard some say, that Justice is but a word, without substance; and that whatsoever a man can by force, or art, acquire to himselfe, (not onely in the condition of warre, but also in a Common-wealth,) is his own, which I have already shewed to be false:[c] So there be also[16] that maintain, that there are no grounds, °nor Principles° of Reason, to sustain those essentiall Rights, which make [17]Soveraignty[17] absolute. For if there were, they would have been found out in some [18]place, or other; whereas we see, there has not hitherto been any Common-wealth, where those Rights have been acknowledged, or challenged.[d] Wherein they argue as ill, as if the Savage people of America, should deny there were any grounds, or Principles of Reason, so to build a house, as to last as long as the materials, because they never yet saw any so well built.[18] Time, and Industry, produce every day new knowledge. [19]And as the art of well building, is derived from Principles of Reason, observed by industrious men, that had long studied the nature of materials, and the divers effects of figure, and proportion, long after mankind began (though poorly) to build: So, long time after men have begun to constitute Common-wealths, imperfect, and apt to relapse into disorder, there may, Principles of Reason be found out, by industrious meditation, to make their constitution (excepting by externall violence) everlasting. And such are those which I have in this discourse set forth: Which whether they come not into the sight of those that have Power to make use of them, or be neglected by them, or not, concerneth my particular interest, at this day, very little. But supposing that these of mine are not such Principles of Reason; yet I am sure they are Principles from Authority of [19]Scripture; as I shall make it appear, when I shall come to speak of the Kingdome of God, (administred by Moses,) over the Jewes, his peculiar people by [20]Covenant.

Horum autem Iurium fundamenta eo magis doceri debent quod [158] Iuris naturalis sunt, non Civilis; & punienda eorum transgressio, non ut transgressio Legum Civilium, sed vindicanda ut facta hostilia. Continent enim rebellionem, id est Legum Civilium simul omnium transgressionem vel potiùs repudiationem; & propterea Lege Civili frustra prohibentur.

Sunt qui Iura haec Essentialia, quibus rectores Civitatum Potestatem absolutam habent, nullis rationibus probari posse dictitant. Nam si possent, in aliqua saltem Civitate, aliquo tempore, agnita tandem ab aliquibus essent. Sed non rectè arguunt, tempus enim erat, in quo ne aedificare quidem mediocriter potuere homines; atqui qui inde fundamenta & principia artis aedificandi nulla esse concluderet, absurdè faceret. Tempus, & Industria novas indies scientias in lucem proferunt. Etsi ergo homines Civitates suas sine perfectione ultima instituerunt, ita ut aliae citiùs, aliae tardius vitio ab institutione corruant, impossibile tamen non est, ita Civitatem instituere, ut (nisi per vim externam) nunquam peritura esset. An Principia quae supra posui, haec praestare possint, nescio; talia tamen sunt, qualia inveniuntur in Scripturis Sacris; ut manifestum erit, cum de Regno Dei (ministrante Mose) in Iudaeos populum suum, per pactum vetus, peculiarem disseruero.

[15] belong to the natural, not the civil, law; and the transgression of them should not be punished as a transgression of the civil laws, but avenged as hostile acts. For such acts comprise rebellion, that is, the transgression – or rather, repudiation – of all the civil laws together; hence it would be pointless for the civil law to prohibit them. [16] There are those

[17] the power of rulers of commonwealths

[18] commonwealth, at some time, by some people. But they do not argue correctly. For there was a time when men could not build even moderately well; but it would have been absurd to conclude from this that there were no grounds or principles of the art of building.

[19] Therefore, even if men have constituted their commonwealths in a way that has not been completely perfect, so that because of a defect in their constitution they collapse, some sooner, some later, nevertheless it is not impossible to constitute commonwealths in such a way that they will never perish (unless by external violence). Whether the principles which I have set forth above can produce this result, I do not know; yet they are principles of the sort found in Holy [20] ^ the old

[b] 'rather' here is an adjective, meaning 'prior' or 'of greater importance' (OED, 'rather', adj., 2.b).

Objection from the Incapacity of the vulgar.

But they say again, that though [21]the Principles be right,[21] yet Common people are not [22]of capacity enough to be made to understand them.[22] I should be glad, that the Rich, and Potent [23]Subjects of a Kingdome,[23] or those that are accounted °the most° Learned, were no lesse incapable than they. But all men know, that the obstructions to [24]this kind of[24] doctrine, proceed not so much from [25]the difficulty of the matter,[25] as from the interest of them that are to learn. Potent men, [26]digest hardly any thing that setteth up a[26] Power to bridle their affections; and Learned men, any [27]thing[27] that discovereth their errours, and thereby lesseneth their Authority[28]: whereas the Common-peoples minds, unlesse they be [29]tainted with dependance on the[29] Potent, or scribbled over with the opinions of their Doctors, are like clean paper, fit to receive whatsoever by Publique Authority shall be imprinted in them. Shall whole Nations be brought to acquiesce [177] in the [30]great Mysteries of Christian[30] Religion, which are above Reason; and [31]millions of men be made believe, that the same Body may be in innumerable places, at one and the same time, which is against Reason; and shall not men be able, by their teaching, and preaching, protected by the Law, to make that received, which is so consonant to Reason, that any unprejudicated[e] man, needs no more to learn it, than to hear it? I conclude therefore, that in the instruction of the people in the Essentiall[31] Rights (which are the Naturall, °and Fundamentall° Lawes) of Soveraignty, there is no difficulty, (whilest a Soveraign has his Power entire,) but what proceeds from his own fault, or the fault of those whom he [32]trusteth[32] in the administration of the Common-wealth; and consequently, it is his Duty, to [33]cause them so to be[33] instructed; and not onely his Duty, but his Benefit also, [34]and Security, against the danger that may arrive to himselfe in his naturall Person, from Rebellion.[34]

Subjects are to be taught, not to affect[f] change of Government:

And (to descend to particulars) the People are to be taught, First, that they ought not to be in love with any forme of Government they see in their neighbour Nations, more than with their own, nor [35](whatsoever present prosperity they behold in Nations that are otherwise governed than they,) to desire change.[35] For the prosperity of a People [36]ruled by an Aristocraticall, or Democraticall assembly,[36] commeth not from Aristocracy, nor from Democracy, [37] but from the Obedience, and Concord of the [38]Subjects: nor do the people flourish in a Monarchy, because one man has the right to rule them, but because they obey him.[38] Take away in any kind of State, the Obedience, (and

Rursus dicunt, etsi Principia aliqua essent, quae id praestare possent; quoniam tamen hujusmodi Principiorum capax non est vulgus hominum, frustra essent. Utinam non minus doctrinae Civilis incapaces essent Cives divites & potentes, iique qui habentur Docti quam sunt Plebeji. Constat enim, Doctrinae Civilis difficultatem non tam oriri ab obscuritate, quam ab eorum, qui docendi sunt Cupiditatibus: Potentes enim Potentiam aliam, quae cupiditates suas refraenare possit: & Docti Doctrinas quibus Errores sui possunt detegi, non facile patiuntur, ne Authoritas eorum apud populum inde minuatur. Hominum autem ex plebe, animi, nisi à Potentioribus distorqueantur, aut Doctorum opinionibus scribillati sint, instar chartae purae impressionem ab Authoritate publica quamlibet accipiunt. Nationes integrae, ut in Religionis mysteriis maximis & difficillimis, & supra rationem positis, acquiescant, docebuntur? praedicando autem & docendo ea, quae cum ratione naturali exquisitè congruunt, Doctores non se facient intelligi? Constat ergo in Iuribus Summae Potestatis (quae sunt Leges naturales) intelligendis nullam esse difficultatem (dum illi, qui Summam habet Potestatem, manet Potentia integra) quam quae vel ab ipsius, vel ab ipsorum quorum opera in administratione Civitatis utitur, culpa oritur. For that Soveraign, cannot be imagined to love his People as he ought, that is not Jealous[k] of them, but suffers them[48] by the flattery of Popular[l] men, to be seduced [49]from their loyalty, as they have often been, not onely secretly, but openly, so as to proclaime Marriage with them in facie Ecclesiae[m] by Preachers; and by publishing the same in the open streets: which [178] may fitly be compared to the[49] violation of the second of the ten Commandements.[n]

And to have dayes set apart to learn their Duty:

Fourthly, seeing people cannot be taught [53]this, nor when 'tis taught, remember it, nor after one generation past, so much as know in whom the Soveraign Power is placed,[53] without setting a part from their ordinary labour, some certain times, in which they [54]may attend those that are appointed to instruct them; It is necessary that some such times be determined, wherein they may assemble together, and (after prayers and praises given to God, the Soveraign of Soveraigns) hear those their Duties told them, and the Positive Lawes, such as generally concern them all, read and expounded, and be put in mind of the Authority that maketh them Lawes. To this end had the Jewes every seventh day, a Sabbath, in which the Law was read and expounded; and in the solemnity whereof they were put in mind, that their King was God; that having created the world in six dayes, he rested the seventh day; and by their resting on it from their labour, that that God was their King, which redeemed them from their servile, and painfull labour in Egypt, and gave them a time, after they had rejoyced in God, to take joy also in themselves, by [54]lawfull recreation.[q] So that the first Table of the Commandements, [55]is spent all, in setting down the summe of [55] Gods absolute Power; not onely as God, but as King by pact, °(in peculiar)° of the Jewes; °and may therefore give light, to those that have Soveraign Power conferred on them by the consent of men, to see what doctrine they Ought to teach their Subjects.°

And to Honour their Parents.

And because the first instruction of Children, dependeth on the care of their [56]Parents; it is necessary that they should be obedient to them, whilest they are under their tuition;[r] and not onely so, but that also afterwards (as gratitude requireth,) they acknowledge the benefit of their education, by externall signes of honour. To which end they are to be taught, that [56] originally the Father of every man was also his Soveraign Lord, with power over him of life and death; and [57]that[57] the Fathers of families, when by instituting a Common-wealth, they [58]resigned that absolute Power, yet it was never intended,[58] they should lose the honour due unto them for their [59] education. [60]For to relinquish such right, was not necessary to the Institution of Soveraign Power; nor would there be any reason, why any man should desire to have children, or take the care to nourish, and instruct them, if they were afterwards to have no other benefit from them, than from other men. And this accordeth with the[60] fifth Commandement.[s] [179]

And to avoyd doing of Injury:

Again, every [61]Soveraign[61] Ought to cause Justice to be taught, [62]which (consisting in taking from no man what is his) is as much as to say, to cause men to be taught not to deprive their Neighbours, by violence, or fraud, of any thing which by the Soveraign Authority is theirs. Of things held in propriety, those that are dearest to a man are his own life, & limbs; and in the next degree, (in most men,) those that concern conjugall affection; and after them riches and means of living. Therefore the People are to be taught, to abstain from violence to one anothers person, by private revenges; from violation of conjugall honour; and from forcible rapine, and fraudulent surreption[t] of one anothers goods. For which purpose also it is necessary they be shewed the evill consequences of false Judgement, by corruption either of Judges or Witnesses, whereby the distinction of propriety is taken away, and Justice becomes of no effect: all which things are intimated in the sixth,[62] seventh, eighth, and ninth Commandements.[v]

And to do all this sincerely from the heart.

Lastly, they are to be taught, that not onely the unjust facts, but the designes and intentions to do them, (though by accident hindred,) are Injustice; °which consisteth in the pravity[w] of the will, as well as in the irregularity of the act.° And this is the intention of the tenth Commandement,[x] [63]and the summe of the second Table; which is reduced all to this one Commandement of mutuall Charity,[63] Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thy selfe:[y] °as the summe of the first Table is reduced to the love of God;[z] whom they had then newly received as their King.°

[62] to the citizens. That is, it should be taught, first, that no citizen should kill or do bodily harm to another citizen without public authority; which is the sixth commandment; and it is violated not only by those who kill by guile or (as people say) basely, but also by those who declare that they do this of necessity to preserve their honour; and that whole custom of vain men issuing challenges to sword-fights is homicide, a custom which almost all commonwealths have prohibited – but, so far, in vain – with the severest punishments. Nor do I see what laws, of any kind, can put an end to it, unless perhaps this law be added to the ones already made: that all those who are noblemen, and all who wish to be considered as such, be bound by an oath that they will neither challenge a fellow-citizen to a duel, nor respond to one who challenges them; so it will come to pass that that Hector-like desire for praise – even though we nowhere read that any citizen was killed by Hector[u] – will be moderated not only by the other punishments, but also by the disgrace of perjury, and the one who is challenged will have a highly virtuous excuse for refusing to fight.

The citizens must also be taught the following: what grave evils are committed when one takes away, by violence or fraud, first, the conjugal honour, and secondly, any sort of possessions, of a fellow-citizen; and what great harm is done to public justice and the common peace by the corruption of witnesses or judges in law-suits. And these things are contained in the

Porrò, Officium Imperantis est, ut Cives Iustitiam doceantur: id est, ut primò, ne quis Civis Civem alium occidat, aut corpori damnum inferat sine Authoritate publica: quod est Mandatum sextum: violatur autem non modo ab iis, qui dolo aut (ut ajunt) turpiter interficiunt, sed etiam ab iis, qui hoc facere se necessariò tuendi honoris causa dictitant: homicidiumque est tota illa vanorum hominum provocantium ad gladios consuetudo: quam Civitates ferè omnes sub gravissimis poenis hactenus frustra prohibuerunt. Nec quibus omnino Legibus extingui possit video, nisi forte Legibus jam factis addatur quoque haec: ut quicunque nobiles sunt aut haberi cupiunt, juramento obstringantur, ne aut concivem ad certamen singulare provocent, neque provocanti respondeant: quo fiet ut laudis illa Hectoreae (etsi Civem quemquam ab Hectore occisum esse nusquam legimus)[u] aviditas, non modo poenis aliis, sed etiam infamia perjurii temperetur, & provocatus pugnam declinandi praetextum habeat honestissimum.

Atque haec continentur in Decalogi Mandatis septimo, octavo & nono.

The use of Universities.

[64]As for the Means, and Conduits, by which the people may receive this Instruction, wee are to search, by what means so many Opinions, contrary to the peace of Man-kind, upon weak and false Principles, have neverthelesse been so deeply rooted in them. I mean those,[64] which I have in the precedent Chapter specified: as That [65]men shall Judge of what is lawfull and unlawfull, not by the Law it selfe, but by their own Consciences; that is to say, by their own private Judgements: That Subjects sinne in obeying the Commands of the Common-wealth, unlesse they themselves have first judged them to be lawfull: That their Propriety in their riches is such, as to exclude the Dominion, which the Common-wealth hath over the same: That it is lawfull for Subjects to kill such, as they call Tyrants: That the Soveraign Power may be divided, and the like; which come to be instilled into the People by this means.[65] They whom necessity, or covetousnesse keepeth attent on[aa] their trades, and labour; and they, on the other side, whom superfluity, or sloth [66] carrieth after their sensuall pleasures, (which two sorts of men take up the greatest part of Man-kind,) [67]being diverted from the deep meditation, which the learning of truth, not onely in the matter of Naturall Justice, but also of all other Sciences necessarily requireth, receive the Notions of their duty, chiefly from Divines in the Pulpit, and partly from such of their Neighbours, or familiar acquaintance, as having the Faculty of discoursing readily, and plausibly, seem wiser and better learned in cases of Law, and Conscience, than themselves.[67] And the Divines, and such others as make shew of Learning, derive their [180] [68]knowledge[68] from the Universities, and from the Schooles of [69] Law, or from the Books, [70]which by men eminent in those Schooles, and Universities have been published.[70] It is therefore manifest, that the Instruction of the people, dependeth wholly, on the right [71]teaching of Youth[71] in the Universities. [72]But are not (may some man say) the Universities of England learned enough already to do that? or[72] is it you will undertake to teach the Universities? Hard questions. Yet to the first, I [o]doubt[ab]

[64] We can discover from where the instruction of the citizens in these and other duties may be drawn, if we understand how it is that so many opinions contrary to the peace of mankind have been received and retained on the basis of false principles [70: We can discover . . . if we understand on the basis of which false principles so many opinions . . . retained] – I mean those false opinions not to° answer; [73]that till towards the later end of Henry the eighth, the Power of the Pope, was alwayes upheld against the Power of the Common-wealth, principally by the Universities; and that the doctrines maintained by so many Preachers, against the Soveraign Power of the King, and by so many Lawyers, and others, that had their education there, is a sufficient argument, that though the Universities were not authors of those false doctrines, yet they knew not how to plant the true. For in such a contradiction of Opinions, it is most certain, that they have not been sufficiently instructed; and 'tis no wonder, if they yet retain a relish of that subtile liquor,[ac] wherewith they were first seasoned, against the Civill Authority.[73] But to the later question, it is not fit, nor needfull for me to [74]say either I,[ad] or No: for any man that sees what I am doing,[74] may easily perceive what I think.

[75]The safety of the People, requireth further, from him, or them that have the Soveraign Power, that Justice be equally administred to all degrees of People; that is, that as well the rich, and mighty, as poor and obscure persons, may be righted of the injuries done them; so as the great may have no greater hope of impunity, when they doe violence, dishonour, or any Injury to the meaner sort, than when one of these, does the like to one of them: For in this consisteth Equity; to which, as being a Precept of the Law of Nature, a Soveraign is as much subject, as any of the meanest of his People. All breaches of the Law, are offences against the Common-wealth: but there be some, that are also against private Persons. Those that concern the Common-wealth onely, may without breach of Equity be pardoned; for every man may pardon what is done against himselfe, according to his own discretion. But an offence against a private man, cannot in Equity be pardoned, without the consent of him that is injured; or reasonable satisfaction.[75]

[73] : when, before the time of Henry VIII, all the universities taught, on the issue of the power of the Pope over Christian kings, that in spiritual matters the Pope had supreme power in England, did they teach rightly? You will say 'no'. Therefore they could have been taught. Those ministers (and there were many) who, in their sermons, stirred up the people against the best of kings – from where did they draw their seditious doctrines into their pulpits? From where did they obtain their titles of 'Doctor' and 'Master' (that is, their authority among the people), if not from the universities? Was this rightly done? You will say 'no'. Therefore they could have been taught.

[75] Further, it is the duty of the sovereign to see that the punishments ordained by the laws for all the citizens who have transgressed them should be inflicted equally on all. Certainly crimes against sovereign rulers can be pardoned by them without iniquity; for to pardon an injury belongs to him who has suffered it. But an injury done to a citizen cannot be condoned by anyone else without his consent, or fair compensation. Why? He who gives impunity to the murderer of my father or my son will surely be said, in some way, to have committed the murder himself.

[76]The Inequality of Subjects, proceedeth from the Acts of Soveraign Power; and therefore has no more place in the presence of the Soveraign; that is to say, in a Court of Justice, then the Inequality between Kings, and their Subjects, in the presence of the King of Kings.[ae] The honour of great Persons, is to be valued for their beneficence, and the aydes they give to men of inferiour rank, or not at all. And the violences, oppressions, and injuries they do, are not extenuated, but aggravated by the greatnesse of their persons; because they have least need to commit them. The consequences of this partiality towards the great, proceed in this manner. Impunity maketh Insolence; Insolence Hatred; and Hatred, an Endeavour to pull down all oppressing and contumelious greatnesse, though with the ruine of the Common-wealth.[76]

Equall Taxes.

To [77]Equall Justice,[77] appertaineth also the Equall imposition of Taxes; the Equality whereof dependeth not on the Equality of riches, but on the Equality of the debt, that every [78]man[78] oweth to the Common-wealth for his defence. [79]It is not enough, for a man to labour for the maintenance of his life; but also to fight, (if need be,) for the securing of his labour.[79] They must either do as the Jewes did after their return from captivity, °in re-edifying the Temple,° build with one hand, and [80]° hold the Sword in the other;[ai] °or else they must hire others to fight for them.° For the Impositions, that are layd

[76] It belongs to the sovereign to see that the common body of citizens are not oppressed by the great ones, and much more that he himself does not oppress them on the great ones' advice, bearing in mind the example of Rehoboam.[af] For the common people are the strength of the commonwealth. He must also take care that the great citizens do not provoke the ordinary people with insults. He who has authority in the commonwealth can indeed rightly reproach a disreputable citizen with his wickedness; but to revile him for his lowly status is both iniquitous and dangerous to the commonwealth. If the great citizens, because they are great, demand reverence on account of their power, why should not the common people be revered, because they are many, and much more powerful? The sedition of the so-called 'Beggars' in Holland should be a warning of how dangerous to the commonwealth it is to despise the ordinary people.[ag] The superior status of some citizens has arisen not from some real excellence in them, but from the will of the sovereign ruler, that is, from the will of the commonwealth; so much the less should they affect an uncivil disdain. The common people should not be provoked even by kings; much less by fellow-citizens (however powerful they may be), lest the common people, while desiring to take its revenge on them, attack the commonwealth at the same time, because it did not prohibit their behaviour.

[77] the equity of the ruler [78] citizen

[79] For citizens to obtain the things that are necessary for life, their own labours are not sufficient, unless they also fight, so that they may labour in security.

[ag] Although the Dutch Revolt of 1566 had a large popular element (motivated by poor economic conditions as well as Calvinism), the term 'Beggars' ('Gueux', 'Geuzen') was first used contemptuously for the noble signatories to a petition of protest, and members of the nobility played prominent roles in the Revolt.

[ah] The Latin, defective in 68 and 70, is emended here to reflect the meaning of the English, on the assumption that the word 'secure' ('in security'), or some synonym of it, was omitted by scribal error, and that the compositor added '&' to make sense of the phrase.

[ai] Neh. 4: 17 (describing the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, not of the Temple).

on the [81]People by the Soveraign Power,[81] are nothing else but the Wages, due to them that hold the publique Sword, to defend [82]private men in the exercise of their severall Trades, and Callings. Seeing then the benefit that every one receiveth thereby, is the enjoyment of life, which is equally dear to poor, and rich; the debt which a poor man oweth them that defend his life, is the same which a rich man oweth for the defence of his; saving that the rich, who have the service of the poor, may be debtors not onely for their own persons, but for many more. Which considered, the Equality of Imposition, consisteth rather in the Equality of that which is consumed, than of the riches of the persons that consume the same.[82] For what reason is there, that he which laboureth much, and sparing the fruits of his labour, [83]consumeth little,[83] should be more charged, then he that living idlely, [84]getteth little, and spendeth all he gets;[84] seeing the one hath no more protection from the Common-wealth, then the other? [85]But when the Impositions, are layd upon those things which men consume, every man payeth Equally for what he useth: Nor is the Common-wealth defrauded, by the luxurious waste of private men.[85]

Publique Charity.

And whereas [86]many men, by accident unevitable, become[86] unable to maintain themselves by their labour; [87]they ought not to be left to the Charity of private persons; but to be provided for, (as far-forth as the necessities of Nature require,) by the Lawes of the Common-wealth. For as it is Uncharitablenesse in any man, to neglect the impotent; so it is in the Soveraign of a Common-wealth, to expose them to the hazard of such uncertain Charity.[87]

Thus the poor and the rich owe the same for the preservation of their lives, except that someone who employs many citizens at the same time ought to pay for the preservation of many at the same time. Which being plain, what remains to be investigated is only how that equality in the payment of taxes can be implemented.

[85] Therefore there can be no equality of imposition on the public other than that whereby everyone pays in proportion to what he consumes; that is, whereby taxes are imposed not on persons but on the articles of consumption themselves.

[86] there are some who, not through their own fault, but by unforeseeable accidents, have undergone misfortunes which have made them

[87] it also belongs to the duty of the sovereign ruler that they should not lack the things that are necessary for life. For since it is permitted by the right of nature for people living in extreme need to take other people's things, even by force, they should be maintained by the commonwealth to prevent them from becoming troublesome to the commonwealth in other ways, and should not be left to the uncertain charity of individual citizens.

Prevention of Idlenesse.

But °for° such as have [88] strong bodies, °the case is otherwise: they° are to be forced to work; and to avoyd the excuse of not finding employment, there ought to be such Lawes, as may encourage °all manner of Arts; as° Navigation, Agriculture, Fishing, and all manner of [89]Manifacture that requires[89] labour. The multitude of poor, °and yet strong° people still encreasing, they are to be transplanted into Countries not sufficiently inhabited: where neverthelesse, they are not to exterminate those they find there; but constrain them to inhabit closer together, and not range a great deal of ground, [90]to snatch what they find;[90] but to court each little Plot with art and labour, to give them their sustenance °in due season.° And when all the world is [91]over-chargd with[91] Inhabitants, then the last remedy of all is Warre; which provideth for every man, by Victory, or Death.

Good Lawes what.

To the care of the Soveraign, belongeth the making of Good Lawes. But what is a good Law? By a Good Law, I mean not a [182] Just Law: for no Law can be Unjust. The Law is made [92]by the Soveraign Power, and all that is done by such Power, is warranted, and owned by every one of the people; and that which every man will have so, no man can say is unjust. It is in the Lawes of a Common-wealth, as in the Lawes of Gaming: whatsoever the Gamesters all agree on, is Injustice to none of them.[92] A good Law is that, which is [93]Needfull, for the Good of the People,[93] and withall Perspicuous.

Such as are Necessary.

For the use of Lawes, °(which are but Rules Authorised)° is not to bind the People from [94]all Voluntary actions; but to direct and keep them in such a motion, as not to hurt[94] themselves by their own impetuous desires, rashnesse, or indiscretion; as Hedges are set, not to stop Travellers, but to keep them [95]in the way.[95] And therefore a Law that is not Needfull, having not the true End of a Law, is not Good. A Law may be conceived to be Good, when it is for the benefit of the Soveraign; though it be not Necessary °for the People;° but it is not so. For the good of the Soveraign and People, cannot be separated. It is a [96]weak Soveraign,[96] that has [97]weak[97] Subjects; and a weak People, whose Soveraign wanteth Power to rule them at his will. Unnecessary Lawes are [98]not good Lawes;[98] but trapps for Mony: which where [99]the right of Soveraign Power is acknowledged,[99] are superfluous; and where it is not °acknowledged,° unsufficient to defend the People.

[97] wretched [98] generally nothing [99] obedience is given to the sovereign ruler,

Iidem autem si corpora idonea habeant, ad laborem compellendi sunt; & ne se excusent, dicendo, nemo conduxit, ferendae sunt Leges quibus Navigandi, Agriculturae, Piscaturae, aliaeque artes omnes quae laborem postulant, foveantur. Si tamen indigorum continuò crescat numerus, in terras nondum satis inhabitatas transferendi sunt; non tamen ut incolas veteres exterminarent, sed compellerent in habitationem arctiorem, ne magna agri spatia percurrentes, à fructibus sponte natis viverent, sed alimenta à singulis agellis cultu sedulo impetrarent. Si quando autem alimentis hominum terra non sufficeret, remedium ultimum à Bello erit, omnibus vel Victoria, vel Morte suffecturo.

Ad curam etiam Summi Imperantis pertinet, ut bonae fiant Leges. Sed Lex Bona quaenam est? Per Bonam Legem intelligo non Legem Iustam. Injusta enim non potest esse Lex; ut quae fit uniuscujusque Civis consensu, in seipsum. Lex Bona est illa, quae ad salutem populi necessaria est, & simul perspicua.

Finis enim Legum is non est, ut populum ab innoxia Libertate cohiberent, sed ne ab impetu passionum, temeritate, & stultitia in pericula & damna sibimet ipsis & Civitati incurrerent; quemadmodum Viae non ut Viatoribus impedimento sint, sepiuntur, sed ne cum Injuria concivium extravagarentur. Lex itaque quae necessaria non est, nec Legis finem spectat, non est Bona. Lex si Summo Imperanti utilis sit, etsi necessaria non sit, Bona tamen alicui videri potest. Sed non est ita. Bonum enim Populi, & ejus qui habet Summam Potestatem, separari à se invicem non possunt. Princeps enim, qui subditis miseris imperat, miser est; & Populus debilis est, ad quos regendos arbitrio suo, is, qui Summam habet Potestatem, non habet Potentiam. Leges non-necessariae aliae plerumque non sunt, quàm laquei ad capiendam pecuniam; quae ubi Imperanti Summo obeditur, superfluae sunt; ubi non obeditur, ad defensionem Populi non sufficiunt.

Such as are Perspicuous.

The Perspicuity, consisteth not so much in the words of the Law it selfe, as in a [100]Declaration[100] of the Causes, and Motives, for which it was made. That is it, that shewes us the [101]meaning[101] of the Legislator; and the [102]meaning[102] of the Legislator known, the Law is more easily understood by few, than many words. For all words, are subject to ambiguity; and therefore multiplication of words °in the body of the Law,° is multiplication of ambiguity: Besides [103]it seems to imply, (by too much diligence,) that whosoever can evade the words, is without the compasse of the Law.[103] And this is a cause of many unnecessary Processes. For when I consider how short were the [104] Lawes of antient times; and how they grew by degrees still longer; me thinks I see a contention between the Penners, and Pleaders of the Law; the former seeking to circumscribe the later; and the later to evade their circumscriptions; and that the Pleaders have got the Victory. It belongeth therefore to the Office of a Legislator, [105](such as is in all Common-wealths the Supreme Representative, be it one Man, or an Assembly,)[105] to make the reason Perspicuous, why the Law was made; and the Body of the Law it selfe, as short, but in as proper, °and significant° termes, as may be.

Punishments.

It belongeth also to the Office of the Soveraign, to make a right application of Punishments, and Rewards. And seeing the end of punishing is not revenge, and discharge of choler; but correction, either of the offender, or of others by his example; the severest Punishments are to be inflicted for those Crimes, that are of most [106]Danger to the Publique;[106] such as are those which proceed from malice to the Government established; those that spring from contempt of Justice; those that provoke Indignation in the Multitude; and those, [183] which unpunished, [107]seem Authorised, as when they are committed by Sonnes, Servants, or Favorites of men in Authority: For[107] Indignation carrieth men, not onely against the Actors, [108]and Authors of Injustice; but[108] against all Power that is likely to protect them; °as in the case of Tarquin; when for the Insolent act of one of his Sonnes, he was driven out of Legis Perspicuitas consistit non tam in ipsis verbis, quam in causarum propter quas Lex lata est narratione perspicua. Inde enim Legislatoris voluntatem cognoscimus, qua cognita facilius intelligitur Lex paucis quam multis verbis. Verba enim omnia ambigua sunt; multiplicando [164] ergo verba, multiplicatur ambiguitas. Praeterea verborum diligentia nimia, plerisque pro argumento accipitur, quod si verba observant, Legem non transgrediuntur; unde multae oriuntur lites minimè necessariae. Dum enim cogito, Leges antiquae quam brevi oratione scriptae fuerint; & ut gradatim creverint; videre mihi videor certamen quoddam inter Legum Scriptores, & Advocatos; ubi illi hos circumscribere, hi illos declinare student; & vincunt Advocati. Officium ergo est Legislatorum, id est Summè Imperantium, causas uniuscujusque Legis perspicuè edere, Legesque ipsas breves, sed verbis propriis facere, quantum possunt.

Rome, and the Monarchy it selfe dissolved.°[ak] But in Crimes [109]of[109] Infirmity; such as are those which proceed from great provocation, from great fear, great need, or from ignorance whether the Fact[al] be a °great° Crime, or not, there is place °many times° for Lenity,[am] [110]without prejudice to the Common-wealth; and Lenity when there is such place for it,[110] is required by the Law of Nature. The Punishment of the Leaders, and teachers in a Commotion; not the °poore° seduced People, °when they are punished,° can profit the Common-wealth by their example. [111]To be severe to the People, is to punish that ignorance, which may in great part be imputed to the Soveraign,[111] whose fault it was, they were no better instructed.

Rewards. In like manner it belongeth to the Office, and Duty of the Soveraign, to [112]apply his Rewards alwayes so, as there may arise from them[112] benefit to the Common-wealth: °wherein consisteth their Use, and End;° and is then done, when they that have [113]well served[113] the Common-wealth, are [114]with as little expence of the Common Treasure, as is possible, so well recompenced, as others thereby may be encouraged, both to serve the same as faithfully as they can, and to study the arts by which they may be enabled to do it better.[114] To buy with Mony, or Preferment, from [115]a Popular[an] ambitious Subject, to be quiet, and desist from making ill impressions in the mindes of the People,[115] has nothing of the nature of Reward; °(which is ordained not for disservice, but for service past;)° nor a signe of Gratitude, but of Fear: [116] nor does it tend to the Benefit, but to the Dammage of the [117]Publique.[117] It is a contention [118]with Ambition,[118] like that of Hercules with the Monster Hydra, which having many heads, for every one that was vanquished, there grew up three.[ap] For in like manner, when [119]the stubbornnesse of one Popular[119] man, is overcome with Reward, there arise many more (by the Example) that do the same Mischiefe, in hope of like Benefit: and as all sorts of [120]Manifacture, so also Malice encreaseth by being vendible.[120] And though sometimes a Civill warre, may be differred,[aq] by [121]such wayes as that,[121] yet the danger growes still the greater, and the Publique ruine more assured. It is therefore against the Duty of the Soveraign, °to whom the Publique Safety is committed,° to Reward those that aspire to greatnesse by disturbing the Peace of their Country, and not rather to oppose the beginnings of such men, with a little danger, than after a longer time with greater.

Counsellours. Another Businesse of the Soveraign, is to choose good Counsellours; [122]I mean such, whose advice he is to take in the Government of the Common-wealth. For this word Counsell, Consilium, corrupted from Considium,[ar] is of a large signification, and comprehendeth all Assemblies of men that sit together, not onely to deliberate what is to be done hereafter, but also to judge of Facts past, and of Law [184] for the present. I take it here in the first sense onely: And in this sense, there is no choyce of Counsell, neither in a Democracy, nor Aristocracy; because the persons Counselling are members of the person Counselled. The choyce of Counsellours therefore is proper to Monarchy; In which, the Soveraign that endeavoureth not to make choyce of those, that in every kind are the most able, dischargeth not his Office as he ought to do. The most able[122] Counsellours, are they that have least hope of [123]benefit[123] by giving evill Counsell, and most knowledge of [124]those things that conduce to the Peace, and Defence of the Common-wealth.[124] It is a hard matter to know who expecteth benefit from publique troubles; but [125]the signe that guides to a just suspicion, is the soothing[as] of the people in their unreasonable, or irremediable grievances, by men whose estates are not sufficient to discharge their accustomed expences, and may easily be observed by any one whom it concerns to know it.[125] But to know, who [126]has most knowledge of the Publique affaires, is yet harder; and they that know them, need them a great deale the lesse. For to know, who knowes the Rules almost of any Art, is a great degree of the knowledge of the same Art; because no man can be assured of the truth of anothers Rules, but he that is first taught to understand them. But the best signes of Knowledge of any Art, are, much conversing[at] in it, and constant good effects of it.[126] °Good Counsell comes not by Lot, nor by Inheritance; and therefore there is no more reason to expect good Advice from the rich, or noble, in matter of State, than in delineating the dimensions of a fortresse; unlesse we shall think there needs no method in the study of the Politiques, (as there does in the study of Geometry,) but onely to be lookers on; which is not so. For the Politiques is the harder study of the two. Whereas in these parts of Europe, it hath been taken for a Right of certain persons, to have place in the highest Councell of State by Inheritance; it is derived from the Conquests of the antient Germans; wherein many absolute Lords joyning together to conquer other Nations, would not enter in to the Confederacy, without such Priviledges, as might be marks of difference in time following, between their Posterity, and the Posterity of their Subjects;[au] which Priviledges being inconsistent with the Soveraign Power, by the favour of the Soveraign, they may seem to keep; but contending for them as their Right, they must needs by degrees let them go, and have at last no further honour, then adhaereth naturally to their abilities.°

Ad Officium Imperantis etiam pertinet bonos sibi eligere Consiliarios; id quod de Monarchis intelligendum est. Nam in Coetibus Summis, nulli sunt praeter ipsos Consiliarii. Boni autem Consiliarii sunt, qui in omni genere negotii publici, maximè versati sunt, quibusque à Consilio pravo minima sit lucri spes. Quis sit qui à malo publico sibi expectet Bonum, scitu difficile est; cavendum tamen est ab iis quibus turbae possunt esse utiles. Scire autem, qui Civitatis Consiliarii periti, & publicis negotiis pares, etiam difficilius est. In omni enim Arte, qui Artificem peritum ab imperito dijudicare potest, Artifex ipse est.

And how able soever be the Counsellours in any [127] affaire, the benefit of their Counsell [128] is greater, when they give every one his Advice, and the [129] reasons of it apart, than when they do it [130]in an Assembly, by way of [130] Orations; and when they have praemeditated, than when they speak on the sudden; both because they have more time, to survey the consequences of action; and are lesse subject to be carried away °to contradiction,° through Envy, Emulation, or other Passions arising from the difference of opinion.

The best Counsell, in those things that concern not other Nations, but onely the ease, and benefit the [131]Subjects[131] may enjoy, by Lawes [185] that look onely inward, is to be taken from the generall [132]informations,[132] [av] and complaints of the people of each Province, who are best acquainted with their own [133] wants, and ought therefore, when they demand nothing [134]in derogation of the essentiall[134] Rights of Soveraignty, to be diligently taken notice of. [au] This claim may perhaps be an inference by Hobbes from the account given by Philip Cluverius of the council of the ancient German chieftains (Germaniae antiquae, pp. 318–19, 331–2, based on Tacitus, Germania, 11–13), and from the claim that the 'comites' (lords who made up the retinue of a chieftain) who took part in that council formed the original hereditary nobility (Germaniae antiquae, pp. 373–5).

Commanders. A Commander of an Army in chiefe, if he be not Popular,[aw] shall not be beloved, nor feared as he ought to be by his Army; and consequently cannot performe that office [137]with good successe.[137] He must therefore be Industrious, Valiant, Affable, Liberall[ax] and Fortunate, that he may gain an opinion both of [138]sufficiency,[138] [ay] and of loving his Souldiers. This is Popularity, and [139]breeds in the Souldiers both desire, and courage, to[139] recommend themselves to his favour; and protects the severity of the Generall, in punishing (when need is) the °Mutinous, or negligent° Souldiers. But this love of Souldiers, (if caution[az] be not given of the Commanders fidelity,) is a dangerous thing to [140]Soveraign Power; especially when it is in the hands of an Assembly not popular. It belongeth therefore to the safety of the People, both that they be good Conductors,[ba] and faithfull Subjects, to whom the Soveraign Commits his Armies.[140]

But when the Soveraign himselfe is Popular; °that is, reverenced and beloved of his People,° there is no danger at all from the Popularity[bb] of [141]a Subject. For Souldiers are never so generally unjust, as to side with their Captain; though they love him, against their Soveraign, when they love not onely his Person, but also his Cause. And therefore those, who by violence have at any time suppressed the Power of their lawfull Soveraign, before they could settle themselves in his place, have been alwayes put to the trouble of contriving their Titles,[bc] to save the People from the shame of receiving them.[141] To have a known Right to Soveraign Power, is so popular a quality, as he that has it needs no more, [142]for his own part, to turn the hearts of his Subjects to him, but that they see him able absolutely to govern his own Family: Nor, on the part of his enemies, but a disbanding of their Armies. For the greatest and most active part of Mankind, has never hetherto been well contented with the present.[142]

[137] rightly. [138] being a good commander, [139] makes the soldiers

Concerning the Offices of one Soveraign to another, [143]which are comprehended in that Law, which is commonly called the Law of Nations, I need not say any thing in this place;[143] because the Law of Nations, and the Law of Nature, is the same thing. CHAP. XXXI.

Of the KINGDOME OF GOD BY NATURE.

The scope of the following Chapters.

That the condition of meer Nature, that is to say, of absolute Liberty, such as is theirs, that neither are [1]Soveraigns,[1] nor Subjects, is Anarchy, and the condition of Warre: That the Praecepts, by which men are guided to avoyd that condition, are the Lawes of Nature: That a Common-wealth, without Soveraign Power[2], is but a word, without substance, [o]and cannot stand:[o] That [3]Subjects[3] owe to Soveraigns, simple Obedience, in all things, wherein their obedience is not repugnant to the Lawes of God, I have sufficiently proved, in that which I have already written. There wants onely, for the entire knowledge of Civill duty, to know what are those Lawes of God. For without that, a man knows not, when he is commanded any thing by the [4]Civill Power,[4] whether it be contrary to the Law of God, or not: and so, either by too much civill obedience, offends [5]the Divine Majesty,[5] or through feare of offending God, transgresses the commandements of the Common-wealth. To avoyd both these Rocks, it is necessary to know what are the Lawes Divine. And seeing the knowledge of all Law, dependeth on the knowledge of the Soveraign Power; I shall say something in that which followeth, of the KINGDOME OF GOD.

Psal. 96.[a] 1. Psal. 98. 1.

God [6]is King,[6] let the Earth rejoyce, [7]saith the Psalmist.[7] And again, God [8]is King[8] though the Nations be angry; and he that sitteth on the Cherubins, though the earth be moved. Whether men will or not, they must be subject [o]alwayes[o] to the Divine Power. By denying the Existence, or Providence of God, men may shake off their Ease, but not their Yoke. But to call this Power of God, which extendeth it selfe not onely to Man, but also to [9]Beasts, and Plants,[9] and Bodies inanimate, by the name of Kingdome, is but a metaphoricall use of the word. For he onely is properly said to Raigne, that governs [10]his Subjects, by his Word, and by promise of Rewards to those that obey it, and by threatning them with Punishment that obey it not.[10] Subjects therefore in the Kingdome of God, are not Bodies Inanimate, nor creatures Irrationall; because they understand no [11]Precepts as his:[11] Nor Atheists; nor they that believe not that God has any care of the actions of mankind; because they acknowledge no [12]Word for his, nor have hope of his rewards, or fear of his

De Regno Dei Naturali.

Conditionem hominum purè Naturalem, id est Libertatem integram, qualis est eorum qui neque regnant, neque regnantur, Anarchiam esse & Bellum; Praecepta, quae quomodo conditio talis fugienda sit docent, Leges esse Naturales; Civitatem, sine Summa Potestate unius Hominis vel Coetus, vocabulum Inane esse; Cives habenti Potestatem Summam simplicem debere Obedientiam, praeterquam in iis rebus, quae pugnant cum Legibus Divinis satis ostensum est in Superioribus. Ad Officiorum Civilium doctrinam integram, restat, ut quaenam sint Divinae Leges inquiramus; quibus ignoratis, utrum is qui Summam habet Potestatem, congrua an incongrua Legi Divinae imperet ignoratur; & proinde Cives, aut nimia obedientia Civili in Deum peccaturi, aut metu peccandi contra Deum, mandata Civitatis transgressuri sunt. Ad scopulum utrumque fugiendum, necessarium est ut Leges Divinae quae sint cognoscamus. Quoniam autem cognitio Legis à cognitione [167] dependet Summae Potestatis, dicendum est in sequentibus de Regno Dei.

Dominus regnavit, exultet terra. Psal. 91.[a, b] Rursus, Dominus regnavit, irascantur populi. Qui sedet super Cherubim moveatur terra. Psal. 98. Homines Divinae Potentiae velint nolint subjiciuntur; & qui existentiam, vel Providentiam Divinam non agnoscent, non jugum excutient, sed propriam ipsorum tranquillitatem. Potentia haec Divina, non modo super genus humanum, sed etiam super animalia caetera, atque etiam super res inanimatas, metaphoricè tantum Regnum dicitur. Regnare enim propriè est verbo, imperando, minando, promittendo, regere. Subditi ergo in Regno Dei non sunt res inanimatae, neque creaturae irrationales; quia praecepta Divina nulla intelligunt; neque Athei, aut qui actionum humanarum curam Deo esse non existimant; threatnings.[12] They therefore that believe there is a God [13]that governeth the [187] world, and hath given Praecepts, and propounded Rewards, and Punishments to Mankind, are Gods Subjects;[13] all the rest, are to be understood as Enemies.

A Threefold Word of God, Reason, Revelation, Prophecy.

To [14]rule by Words, requires that such Words be manifestly made known;[14] for else they are no Lawes: For to the nature of Lawes belongeth a °sufficient, and° clear Promulgation, such as may take away [15] the excuse of Ignorance; °which in the Lawes of men is but of one onely kind, and that is, Proclamation, or Promulgation by the voyce of man.° But God declareth his Lawes three wayes; by the Dictates of Naturall Reason, by Revelation, and by the Voyce of some man, to whom by the operation of Miracles, he procureth credit with the rest. From hence there ariseth [16] a triple Word of God, Rational, Sensible, and Prophetique: to which Correspondeth a triple Hearing; Right Reason, Sense Supernaturall, and Faith. As for Sense Supernaturall, which [17]consisteth in Revelation, or Inspiration, there have not been any Universall Lawes so given, because God speaketh not in that manner, but to particular persons, and to divers men divers things.[17]

A twofold Kingdome of God, Naturall and Prophetique.

From the difference between the other two kinds of Gods Word, Rationall, and Prophetique, there may be attributed to God, a twofold Kingdome, Naturall, and Prophetique: Naturall, wherein he governeth as many of Mankind as acknowledge his Providence, by the °naturall° Dictates of Right Reason; And Prophetique, wherein having chosen out [18]one peculiar Nation (the Jewes) for his Subjects, he governed them, and none but them, not onely by [18] naturall Reason, but by Positive Lawes, which he gave them by the mouths of his °holy° Prophets. Of the Naturall Kingdome of God I intend to speak in this Chapter.

[13] and that he takes care of mankind, and who acknowledge the precepts of God, are the only citizens of God's kingdom;

Ut quis Verbis regatur, requiritur ut verba intelligat; quia illi, nisi hoc fiat, Leges non sunt; cùm ad Essentiam Legis pertineat perspicua Promulgatio, qualis Ignorantiae excusationem peccantibus tollere sufficiat. Promulgantur autem Leges Divinae tribus modis; nempe per dictamen Rationis Naturalis; per Revelationem; vel per vocem alicujus hominis cui fidem apud caeteros fecit Deus, per operationem Miraculorum. Sensus autem supernaturalis, cum sit nihil aliud, quam Revelatio homini singulari facta, illum solum obligat, cui facta est.

A differentia inter reliqua duo verbi Divini genera, Rationale & Propheticum, attribui Deo potest Regnum duplex, Naturale & Propheticum. Naturale, quatenus illos regit, qui Providentiam ejus agnoscunt, per dictamen Rectae Rationis. Propheticum quatenus populum suum Electum, nempe primò Israelitas, & deinde Christianos; quos non solum per dictamina rationis Naturalis regit, sed etiam per Leges Positivas, illis datas per Prophetas suos. De Regno Dei Naturali tractabimus in capite praesenti.

The Right of Gods Sovereaignty is derived from his Omnipotence.

The Right of [19]Nature,[19] whereby God °reigneth over men, and° punisheth those that break his Lawes, is to be derived, not from his Creating them, [20]as if he required obedience, as of Gratitude for his benefits;[20] but from his Irresistible Power. I have formerly shewn, how the Soveraign [21]Right[21] ariseth from Pact:[c] To shew how the same Right may arise from Nature, [22]requires no more, but to shew in what case it is never taken away.[22] Seeing all men by Nature had Right to All things, they had Right every one to reigne [23]over all the rest. But because this Right could not be obtained[d] by force, it concerned the safety of every one, laying by that Right, to set up men (with Soveraign Authority) by common consent, to rule and defend them: whereas if there had been any man of Power Irresistible; there had been no reason, why he should not by that Power have ruled, and defended both himselfe, and them, according to his own discretion. To those therefore whose Power is irresistible, the dominion of all men adhaereth naturally by their excellence of Power; and consequently it is from that Power, that the Kingdome over men, and the Right of afflicting men at his pleasure, belongeth Naturally to God Almighty; not as Creator, and Gracious; but as Omnipotent. And though Punishment be due for Sinne onely, because by that word is understood Affliction for Sinne; yet the Right of [188] Afflicting, is not alwayes derived from mens Sinne, but from Gods Power.[23]

Sinne not the cause of all Affliction.

This question, Why Evill men often Prosper, and Good men suffer Adversity, [24]has been much disputed by the Antient, and is the same with this of ours, by what Right God dispenseth the Prosperities and Adversities of this life;[24] and is of that difficulty, as it hath shaken the faith, not onely of the Vulgar, but of Philosophers, and which is more, of the Saints, °concerning the Divine Providence.° How Good (saith [25]David)[25] is the God of Israel to those that are Upright in Heart; and yet my feet were almost gone, my treadings had well-nigh slipt; for I was grieved at the Wicked, when I saw the [26]Ungodly in such Prosperity.[26] And Job, how earnestly does he expostulate with God, for the many Afflictions he suffered, notwithstanding his Righteousnesse? This question in the case of Job, is decided by God himselfe, not by arguments derived from Job's Sinne, but his own Power. For whereas the friends of Job drew their arguments from his Affliction to his Sinne, and he defended himselfe by °the conscience[e] of° his Innocence, God himselfe [27]taketh up the matter, and having justified the [22] we must consider in what case it could have been sempiternal.

[23] , although (because of mutual resistance) the right was useless. But if anyone had had so much power that he was able thereby to assure himself of victory in war over all men, what reason can be thought of why

Regni Divini Naturalis Ius, quo Deus illos qui Leges Naturales violant, affligit, non ab eo derivatur; quod illos creaverit cum non essent; sed ab eo, quod Divinae Potentiae resistere impossibile est. Ostensum supra est Potestatem Summam apud homines à Pacto esse;[c] [168] ad intelligendum autem quomodo Ius idem oriri à Natura potuit, considerandum est, in quo casu sempiternum esse potuit. Cum enim per Naturam Ius erat omnibus in omnia, & per consequens Ius Regni haberet per Naturam etsi (propter mutuam resistentiam) inutile unusquisque siquis eorum tantam habuisset potentiam, ut certam inde sibi in Bello victoriam contra omnes homines promittere potuisset, quae ratio excogitari potest, quare non potius & se, & omnes alios homines ipse suo arbitrio, regnando in omnes, defendere vellet, quam ad sui ipsius defensionem Iura Civilia constituens, Leges in seipsum accipere? Naturae ergo omnipotenti, cui resisti non potest Regnum & Dominium in genus humanum universum adhaereret naturaliter. Atque Iuris, quo quem velit affligit, & cui velit ignoscit Deus, Fundamentum hoc est; non autem, ut multi arbitrati sunt, Peccata hominum.

Quaestio enim, quare malis secundae, bonis adversae res contingunt, vetustissima est, & difficultatis tantae, ut non modo vulgi, sed etiam Philosophorum, & quod majus est, Sanctorum, fidem concusserit. Quam bonus Israel Deus (inquit Psalmista Psal. 72. vers. 1, 2, 3) *his qui recto sunt corde. Etiam Iob, Cum Deo quam acriter expostulat, quod justus existens, tam graviter afflictus fuerit. Quaestionem autem de quaerimonia Iob, decidit Deus, non argumentis à peccato ejus, sed ab omnipotentia sua derivatis. Cum enim amici Iob ab afflictionibus ad peccata argumenta sumerent, ille autem ab Innocentia sua se defenderet, Deus ipse sententiam laturus, af-he would not wish to defend himself and all other men as he pleased, reigning over them all, rather than submit to laws and set up civil rights for the sake of defending himself? Therefore it would belong [70: belongs] naturally to an all-powerful nature, which cannot be resisted, to have a kingdom and dominion over the whole human race. And this is the foundation of the right by which God chastises whom he will, and pardons whom he will; the foundation is not, as many have thought, the sins of men.

Job 38. v. 4. Affliction by arguments drawn from his Power, such as this,[27] Where wast thou when I layd the foundations of the earth, and [28]the like,[28] both approved Job's Innocence, and reproved the Erroneous doctrine of his friends. Conformable to this [29] doctrine is the sentence of our Saviour, concerning the man that was born Blind, in these words, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his fathers; but that the works of God might be made manifest in him.[f] And though it be said, That Death entred into the world by sinne,[g] (by which is meant that if Adam had never sinned, [30]he had never dyed, that is, never suffered any separation of his soule from his body,)[30] it follows not thence, that God could not justly have Afflicted him, though he had not Sinned, as well as he afflicteth other living creatures, that cannot sinne.

Divine Lawes. °Having spoken of the Right of Gods Soveraignty, as grounded onely on Nature;° we are to consider next, what are the Divine Lawes, [31]or Dictates of Naturall Reason; which Lawes concern either the naturall Duties of one man to another, or the Honour naturally due to our Divine Soveraign.[31] The first are the same Lawes of Nature, of which I have spoken already in the 14. and 15. Chapters °of this Treatise; namely, Equity, Justice, Mercy, Humility, and the rest of the Morall Vertues.° It remaineth therefore that we consider, what Praecepts are dictated to men, by their Naturall Reason onely, without other word of God, touching the Honour and Worship of the Divine Majesty.

Honour and Worship what. Honour consisteth in the inward thought, [32]and opinion of the Power, and Goodnesse of another:[32] and therefore to Honour God, is to think as Highly of his Power and Goodnesse, as is possible. And of that opinion, [33]the externall signes appearing in the Words, and Actions of [33] men, are called Worship; °which is one part of that which the Latines understand by the word Cultus:° For Cultus signifieth properly, [34]and constantly, that [34] labour which a man bestowes on any thing, with a purpose to make benefit by it. Now those things

Dicendo Vbi eras tu, quando ponebam fundamenta terrae, aliisque similibus à Potentia ductis utendo; tandemque defensionem quidem Iobi confutavit, innocentiam vero approbavit, doctrinamque Amicorum ejus erroneam condemnavit. Atque cum sententia hac Dei congruit Servatoris nostri sententia de homine nato coeco his verbis, neque peccavit hic, neque patres ejus; sed ut opera Dei manifestarentur.[f] Quanquam autem dictum sit, intrasse in mundum mortem per peccatum[g] (id est nisi peccasset Adam, mors non fuisset) non tamen inde sequitur, quod Deus illum justè affligere non potuisset, nisi peccasset, sicut caetera animalia affligit, quae peccare non possunt.

Proximo loco considerandum venit, quaenam sint Leges illae Divinae, quae ad officia hominum spectant mutua; & quae sint illae quae spectant ad cultum Dei naturalem. Priores illae sunt, de quibus dictum est capitibus 14, & 15. Considerandum ergo restat, quae sint [169] Naturalis Rationis (absque alio verbo divino) dictamina circa Majestatis Divinae Honorem & Cultum.

Consistit Honor in cogitatione honorantis interna, nempe in opinione quam de Potentia & Bonitate quisque habet illius quem honorare dicitur. Honorantis ergo Deum, est de Potentia & Bonitate Divina, quantum possibile est magnificentissimè sentire. Cultus autem signa illa sunt, quibus ita sentire aliis indicatur. [189] whereof we [35]make[35] benefit, are either subject to us, and the profit they yeeld, followeth the labour we bestow upon them, as a naturall effect; or they are not subject to us, but answer our labour, [36]according to their own Wills.[36] In the first sense the labour bestowed on the Earth, is called Culture; [o]and the education of Children a Culture of their mindes.[o] In the second sense, where mens [37]wills[37] are to be wrought to our purpose, not by Force, but by [38]Compleasance, it signifieth as much as Courting, that is, a winning of favour by good offices; as by praises, by acknowledging their Power, and by whatsoever is pleasing to them from whom we look for any benefit. And this is properly Worship: in which sense Publicola, is understood for a Worshipper of the People;[h] and Cultus Dei, for the Worship of God.[38]

Severall signes of Honour.

From internall Honour, consisting in [39]the opinion of Power and Goodnesse,[39] arise three Passions; Love, which hath reference to Goodnesse; and Hope, and Fear, that relate to Power: And three parts of externall worship; Praise, Magnifying, and Blessing: [40]The subject of Praise, being Goodnesse; the subject of Magnifying, and Blessing, being Power, and the effect thereof Felicity. Praise, and Magnifying are signified both by Words, and Actions: By Words, when we say a man is Good, or Great: By Actions, when we thank him for his Bounty, and obey his Power. The opinion of the Happinesse of another, can onely be expressed by words.[40]

Worship Naturall and Arbitrary.

There be some signes of Honour, (both in Attributes and Actions,) that be Naturally so; as amongst Attributes, Good, Just, Liberall,[i] and the like; and amongst Actions, Prayers, Thanks, and Obedience. Others are so by [41]Institution,[41] or Custome of men; and in some times and places are Honourable; in others [42]Dishonourable; in others Indifferent:[42] such as are the [43]Gestures in Salutation, Prayer, and Thanksgiving,[43] in different times and places, differently used. [44]The former is Naturall; the later[44] Arbitrary Worship.

Worship Commanded and Free.

And of Arbitrary Worship, [45]there bee two differences: For sometimes it is a Commanded, sometimes Voluntary Worship: Commanded, when it is such as hee requireth, who is Worshipped: Free, when it is such as the Worshipper thinks fit. When it is Commanded, not the words, or gesture, but the obedience is the Worship. But when Free, the Worship consists in the opinion of the beholders: for if to them the words, or actions by which we intend honour, seem ridiculous, and tending to contumely; they are no Worship; because no signes of Honour; and no signes of Honour; because a signe is not a signe to him that giveth it, but to him to whom it is made; that is, to the spectator.[45]

In sensu primo, quem terrae impendimus laborem, cultus, & cultura dicitur. In sensu secundo, ubi animi hominum ad voluntatem nostram ducendi sunt, non per vim, sed per officia, Cultus est omne officii genus, quo ipsis placendi studium indicatur; qualia sunt ipsos laudare, magnificare, admirari, &c.

Worship Publique and Private.

Again, there is a Publique, and a Private Worship. Publique, is the Worship that a Common-wealth performeth, °as one Person.° Private, is that which a Private [46]person[46] exhibiteth. Publique, in respect of the whole Common-wealth, is Free; °but in respect of Particular men it is not so.° Private, is in secret Free; but in the sight of the multitude, it is never without some [47]Restraint, either from the Lawes, or from the Opinion of men; which is contrary to the nature of Liberty.[47]

The End of Worship.

The End [48]of Worship amongst men,[48] is Power. For where a man [190] seeth another worshipped, he supposeth him powerfull, [49]and is the readier to obey him; which makes his Power greater. But God has no Ends: the worship we do him, proceeds from our duty, and is directed according to our capacity, by[49] those rules of Honour, that [50] Reason dictateth to be done by the weak to the more potent men, in hope of benefit, [51]for fear of dammage, or in thankfulnesse for good already received from them.[51]

Attributes of Divine Honour.

[52]That we may know what worship of God is taught us by the light of Nature, I will begin with his Attributes. Where, First, it is manifest, we ought to attribute to him Existence:[52] For no man can °have the will to° honour that, which he thinks not to have any Beeing.

°Secondly, that those Philosophers, who sayd the World, or the Soule of the World was God,[k] spake unworthily of him; and denyed his Existence: For by God, is understood the cause of the World; and to say the World is God, is to say there is no cause of it, that is, no God.°

[53]Thirdly, to say the World was not Created, but Eternall, (seeing that which is Eternall has no cause,) is to deny there is a God.[53]

[54]Fourthly, that they who attributing (as they think) Ease to God, take from him the care of Man-kind; take from him his Honour: for it takes away mens love, and fear of him; which is the root of Honour.[54]

[55]Fifthly, in those things that signifie Greatnesse, and Power; to say he is Finite, is not to Honour him: For it is not a signe of the Will to Honour God, to attribute to him lesse than we can; and Finite, is lesse than we[55] can; because to Finite, it is easie to adde more.

Therefore to attribute Figure to him, is not Honour; for all Figure is Finite:

Rursus alius est Publicus, alius Privatus; Publicus est Cultus Civitatis; Privatus, Hominis Privati, sive Civis. Publicus respectu Civitatis liber est. Item Cultus privatus secretus quidem liber, in praesentia autem multitudinis nunquam est sine metu aliquo, vel à Legibus vel à reverentia astantium, quorum utrumque Libertatem aliquatenus diminuit.

Finis propter quem coli se velint homines, est Potentia. Quem [170] enim coli vident Potentem esse intelligunt. Finem autem propter quem coli se velit Deus Omnipotens, nullum video, praeterquam ut benefaciat nobis; Cultusque noster debitus est; & illi juxta honorandi regulas, quas ratio Naturalis dictat Potentioribus à minus Potentibus observandas esse, boni adipiscendi, vel damni vitandi causa exhibendus. Inter Attributa, quae Deo debita esse lumine naturali intelligimus, primum est Existentia, id est ut confiteamur Deum esse. Honorare enim, quod non putamus esse, impossibile est.

Secundum est Omnipotentia, & quod omnium rerum Conditor est, & Rector. Qui dicunt ergo Mundum aeternum esse, Deum non honorant, quantum possunt. Neque illi, qui Deum rerum humanarum curam habere negant.

Tertium, Deum non honorant quantum possunt, qui Finitum esse dicunt. Finito enim addi potest. Figuram ergo Deo attribuere, est contra honorem Dei; propterea quod Figura omnis Finita est; & propter eandem rationem

[52] Among the attributes which by the light of nature we understand to belong to God, the first is existence, that is, we should profess that God exists.

[53] The second is omnipotence, and being the maker and ruler of all things. Those who say that the world is eternal do not honour God as much as they can.

[54] Nor do those who say that he does not care for human affairs.

[55] Thirdly, those who say that God is finite do not honour him as much as they

[k] Stoic philosophers such as Zeno and Chrysippus were said to have identified the universe with God (see Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers, VII.137; Cicero, De natura deorum, I.39), and Marcus Aurelius described the universe as a living being with a soul (Meditations, IV.40). Hobbes may also allude here to the doctrine of the 'anima mundi' (soul of the world) developed by Neoplatonists such as Plotinus and Proclus, though they regarded it only as an emanation of the divine being.

[56]Nor[56] to say we conceive, and imagine, or have an Idea of him, in our mind: for whatsoever we conceive is Finite:

Nor to attribute to him °Parts, or° Totality; which [57]are the Attributes[57] onely of things Finite:

Nor to say he is in this, or that Place: for whatsoever is in Place, is bounded, and Finite:

°Nor that he is Moved, or Resteth: for both these Attributes ascribe to him Place:°

[58]Nor[58] that there be more Gods than one; °because it implies them all Finite:° for there cannot be more than one Infinite:

[59]Nor[59] to ascribe to him (unlesse Metaphorically, °meaning not the Passion, but the Effect°) Passions that partake of Griefe; as Repentance, Anger, Mercy: or of Want; as Appetite, Hope, Desire; or of any Passive faculty: For [60]Passion,[60] is Power limited by [61]somewhat else.[61]

And therefore when we ascribe to God a Will, it is not to be understood, as that of Man, for a Rationall Appetite; but as the [62] Power, by which he effecteth every thing[63].

Likewise when we attribute to him Sight, and other acts of Sense; as also Knowledge, and Understanding; which in us is nothing else, but a tumult of the mind, raised by externall [64]things that presse[64] the organicall[l] parts of mans body: [65]For there is no such thing in God; and being things that depend on naturall causes, cannot be attributed to him.[65] [191]

Hee that will attribute to God, [66]nothing[66] but what is warranted by naturall Reason, must either use such Negative [67]Attributes,[67] as Infinite, Eternall, Incomprehensible; or Superlatives, as Most High, most Great, °and the like;° or Indefinite, as Good, Just, Holy, Creator; and in such sense, as if he meant not to declare what he is, °(for that were to circumscribe him within the limits of our Fancy,)° but how much wee admire him, and [68]how ready we would be to obey him; which is a signe of Humility, and of a Will to honour him as much as we can:[68] For there is but one Name to signifie °our Conception of° his Nature, and that is, [69]I AM:[m] and but one Name of his Relation to us, and that is God; in which is contained Father, King, and Lord.[69]

Actions that are signes of Divine Honour.

Concerning the actions of Divine Worship, it is a °most generall° Precept of Reason, that they be signes of [70]the Intention to Honour God;[70] such as are, First, Prayers: °For not the Carvers, when they made Images, were thought to make them Gods; but the People that Prayed to them.°[n]

Secondly, Thanksgiving; which differeth from Prayer in Divine Worship, no otherwise, than that Prayers precede, and Thanks succeed the benefit; the end both of the one, and the other, being to acknowledge God, for Author of all benefits, as well past, as future.

Thirdly, Gifts; that is to say, Sacrifices, and Oblations, (if they be of the best,) are signes of Honour: [71]for they are Thanksgivings.[71]

Fourthly, Not to swear by any but God, is naturally a signe of Honour: for it is a confession [72] that God onely knoweth the heart; °and that no mans wit, or strength can protect a man against Gods vengeance on the perjured.°

Fifthly, it is a part of Rationall Worship, to speak [73] Considerately of God; for it argues a Fear of him, and Fear, is a confession of his Power. Hence followeth, That the name of God is not to be used rashly, [74]and to no purpose; for that is as much, as in Vain:[p] And it is to no purpose, unlesse it be by way of Oath, and by order of the Common-wealth,[74] to make Judgements certain; or between [75]Common-wealths,[75] to avoyd Warre. And that disputing of Gods nature is contrary to his Honour: For it is supposed, that in [76]this naturall[76] Kingdome of God, there is no other way to know any thing, but by naturall Reason; that is, from the Principles of naturall Science; which are so farre from [77]teaching us any thing of[77] Gods nature, as they cannot teach us our own nature, nor the nature of the smallest [78]creature living.[78] And therefore, °when men out of the Principles of naturall Reason, dispute of the Attributes of God, they but dishonour him: For° in the Attributes which we give to God, we are not to consider the [79]signification of Philosophicall Truth; but the signification of Pious Intention, to do him the greatest Honour we are able. From the want of which consideration, have proceeded the volumes of disputation about the Nature of God, that tend not to his Honour, but to the honour of our own wits, and learning; and are nothing else but inconsiderate, and vain abuses of his Sacred Name.[79]

Tertio loco, Dona, id est Sacrificia & Oblationes (si in suo genere sunt optima) signa honoris sunt, & Cultus Divini pars Rationalis. Quartò, signum Honoris Deo exhibendi est, non Iurare nisi per Deum; illum enim solum esse scrutatorem cordium, jurando confitemur. [p] Cf. Exod. 20: 7; Deut. 5: 11.

Sixthly, in Prayers, Thanksgiving, Offerings and Sacrifices, it is a Dictate of naturall Reason, that they be every one in his kind the [192] best, [80]and most significant of Honour. As for example, that[80] Prayers, and Thanksgiving, be made in Words and Phrases, [81]not sudden, nor light, nor Plebeian; but[81] beautifull, and well composed; For else we do not God as much honour as we can. °And therefore° the Heathens did absurdly, to worship Images for Gods: But their doing it in Verse, and with Musick, both of Voyce, and Instruments, was [82]reasonable. Also that the Beasts they offered in sacrifice, and the Gifts they offered, and their actions in Worshipping, were full of submission, and commemorative of benefits received, was according to reason, as proceeding from an intention to honour him.[82]

Seventhly, [83] Reason directeth not onely to worship God in Secret; but also, and especially, in Publique, and in the sight of men: For without that, (that which in [84]honour[84] is most acceptable) the procuring others to [85]honour[85] him, is lost.

Lastly, Obedience to his Lawes (that is, in this case to the Lawes of Nature,[86]) is the greatest worship of all. For as Obedience is more acceptable to God than [87] Sacrifice; so also to set light by[q] his Commandements, is the greatest of all contumelies. And these are the [88]Lawes of that Divine Worship, which naturall Reason dictateth to private men.[88]

Publique Worship consisteth in Uniformity.

But seeing a Common-wealth is but one Person, it [89]ought also to[89] exhibite to God but one Worship; [90]which then it doth, when it commandeth it to be exhibited by Private men, Publiquely. And this is Publique Worship; the property whereof, is to be Uniforme: For those actions that are done differently, by different men, cannot be said to be a Publique Worship. And therefore, where many sorts of Worship be allowed, proceeding from the different Religions of Private men, it cannot be said there is any Publique Worship, nor that the Common-wealth is of any Religion at all.[90]

All Attributes depend on the Lawes Civill.

And because [91] words (and consequently the Attributes of God) have their signification by agreement, and constitution[r] of men; those Attributes are to be held significative of Honour, that men intend shall so be; and whatsoever may be done by the wills of °particular° men, where there is no Law but Reason, may be done by the will of the Common-wealth, by Lawes Civill. [92]And because a Common-wealth hath no Will, nor makes no Lawes, but those that are made by the Will of him, or them that have the Soveraign Power;[92] it followeth, that [93]those Attributes which[93] the Soveraign ordaineth, in the Worship of God, for signes of Honour, ought to be taken and used for such, by private men in their publique Worship.

Postremò, Legibus obedire (nempe Legibus Naturae; nam loquimur hic de Cultu Naturali) optimus omnium Cultus est; sicut enim apud Deum acceptior est Sacrificiis omnibus Obedientia; ita etiam mandata Dei parvi facere, maxima est contumeliarum. Atque hae sunt Divini Cultus Leges Naturales. Not all Actions.

But because not all Actions [94]are signes by[94] Constitution;[s] but some are Naturally signes of Honour, others of Contumely, [95]these later (which are those that men are ashamed to do in the sight of them they reverence) cannot be made by humane power a part of Divine worship; nor the former (such as are decent, modest, humble Behaviour) ever be separated from it. But whereas there be an infinite number of Actions, and Gestures, of an indifferent nature; such of them as the Common-wealth shall ordain to be Publiquely and Universally in use, as signes of Honour, and part of God's Worship, are to be taken [193] and used for such by the Subjects. And that which is said in the Scripture, It is better to obey God than men,[t] hath place in the kingdome of God by Pact, and not by Nature.[95]

Naturall Punishments.

Having thus [96]briefly spoken of the Naturall Kingdome of God, and his Naturall Lawes, I will adde onely to this Chapter a short declaration of his Naturall Punishments. There is[96] no action of man °in this life,° that is not the beginning of so long a chayn of Consequences, as no humane Providence, is high enough, to give a man a prospect to the end. And in this Chayn, there are linked together both pleasing and unpleasing events; [97]in such manner, as[97] he that will do any thing for his pleasure, must engage himselfe to suffer all the pains [98] annexed to it; °and these pains, are the Naturall Punishments of those actions, which are the beginning of more Harme than Good.° And hereby it comes to passe, that Intemperance, is °naturally° punished with Diseases; [99]Rashnesse, with Mischances; Injustice, with the Violence of Enemies; Pride, with Ruine; Cowardise, with Oppression; Negligent government of Princes, with Rebellion; and Rebellion, with Slaughter. For seeing Punishments are consequent to the breach of Lawes; Naturall Punishments must be naturally consequent to the breach of the Lawes of Nature; and therfore follow them as their naturall, not arbitrary effects.[99]

[95] the commonwealth, in ordaining which actions are to be allowed in divine worship, can draw only on those actions which by their nature signify neither honour nor contumely; and what the commonwealth ordains must be observed.

[96] far spoken about the natural kingdom and worship of God, I shall add, concerning natural punishments, only this: that they are the consequences of sin by nature, not by decision. There is almost

[97] so indissolubly that [98] ^, however unforeseen,

[99] those who use violence are punished by the violence of others, etc.; and such are what I call natural punishments.

Sed quia non omnes actiones possunt Honorificae fieri per constitutionem hominum, (cum aliae Honoris, aliae Contumeliae naturaliter signa sint) de iis actionibus solis, an in Cultum Divinum admittendae sint, constituere potest Civitas, quae suâ Naturâ nec Honorem nec Contumeliam significant; & quod statuerit Civitas observari debet.

Hactenus de Regno & Cultu Dei Naturali dictum est. Addam de poenis Naturalibus hoc tantum, quod peccata non constitutione consequantur, sed natura. Nulla ferè est humana Actio quae initium non sit catenae cujusdam consequentiarum, adeo longae, ut ad finem ejus prospicere Providentia humana nulla possit. Concatenantur autem accidentia jucunda & molesta adeo insolubiliter, ut qui jucundum sumit, molestum quod adhaeret, quanquam improvisum, necessariò etiam accipiat. Quemadmodum vim inferentes punit vis aliena; intemperantiam puniunt morbi, &c. & tales sunt quas voco Poenas Naturales.

The Conclusion of the Second Part.

[100]And thus farre concerning the Constitution, Nature, and Right of Soveraigns; and concerning the Duty of Subjects, derived from the Principles of Naturall Reason. And now, considering how different this Doctrine is, from the Practise of the greatest part of the world, especially of these Western parts, that have received their Morall learning from Rome, and Athens; and how much depth of Morall Philosophy is required, in them that have the Administration of the Soveraign Power; I am at the point of believing this my labour, as uselesse, as the Common-wealth of Plato; For he also is of opinion that it is impossible for the disorders of State, and change of Governments by Civill Warre, ever to be taken away, till Soveraigns be Philosophers.[u] But when I consider again, that the Science of Naturall Justice, is the onely Science necessary for Soveraigns, and their principall Ministers; and that they need not be charged with the Sciences Mathematicall, (as by Plato they are,)[v] further, than by good Lawes to encourage men to the study of them; and that neither Plato, nor any other Philosopher hitherto, hath put into order, and sufficiently, or probably proved all the Theoremes of Morall doctrine, that men may learn thereby, both how to govern, and how to obey; I recover some hope, that one time or other, this writing of mine, may fall into the hands of a Soveraign, who will consider it himselfe, (for it is short, and I think clear,) without the help of any interessed,[w] or envious Interpreter; and by the exercise of entire Soveraignty, in protecting the Publique teaching of it, convert this Truth of Speculation, into the Utility of Practice.[100]

15 neither] om. MS

[100] I have said everything that I had to say – solidly, clearly, and (I think) agreeably to those who think freely – about what was to be deduced from the principles of natural reason concerning the institution of the commonwealth, the right of the sovereign, and the duties of the citizens.

But when I consider the large number of people whose purposes it would suit for what I have said to be false; when I see that those who maintain the contrary doctrines are not corrected, even when they have been punished by a civil war; when I realize that the best minds are brought up on the seditious doctrines of the ancient Greeks and Romans; I fear that this writing of mine will be counted with Plato's Republic, Utopia, Atlantis,[x] and similar jeux d'esprit. I do not abandon the hope, however, that when upright kings look more closely into their rights, and teachers into their duties, and citizens into theirs, this very doctrine, rendered less harsh by familiarity, will one day be generally accepted, at last, to the benefit of the public.

For the books of the Bible, standard abbreviations are used.

A full account of the conventions used in this edition is given in the Textual Introduction; the key points are summarized here. Generally, Hobbes's English and Latin versions are placed on facing pages. (The exceptions to this are the table accompanying Chapter 9 and the 'Review, and Conclusion', neither of which was translated by Hobbes into Latin; the Appendix, which appeared for the first time in the Latin; and the Index to the Latin edition. In the last two cases, translations into modern English are supplied.)

Significant textual variants (i.e., substantive variants, plus all changes called for in the printed Errata-lists of H and 68) are presented in the textual apparatus at the foot of each page, and keyed to line numbers. (Only in the table accompanying Chapter 9, where line-numbering would be problematic, is the textual apparatus keyed to superscript numbers in the text.) Non-substantive variants arising from the collation of exempla of the copy-texts are presented in lists at the end of the edition, keyed to page numbers and line numbers. Similar lists at the end of the edition record literal faults present in all exempla of the copy-texts.

The first set of footnotes, keyed to the English text, is the translation apparatus, which records, and translates, significant changes made in the Latin version of the text. These notes use a numerical series of superscripts (beginning again with each chapter). Where Hobbes makes an addition in the Latin, the superscript number stands at the relevant place in the English, and the footnote, which gives a translation of that added passage, begins with the symbol '^'. In these cases, if the superscript number stands between two words, it has a space on either side of it; if it stands between a word and a punctuation mark, it has no space on either side of it. Where Hobbes omits a passage in the Latin, the superscript symbol 'º' is placed at the start and finish of that passage. Where Hobbes substitutes a new passage in the Latin for a passage in the English, a superscript number is similarly placed twice, at the start and finish of the English passage, and the footnote gives a translation of the new passage.

In three cases (Chapters 9, 46, and 47) the Latin diverges so extensively from the English that it has been necessary to provide a complete translation of the Latin into modern English. In these cases Hobbes's original English is placed on the left-hand page, and the right-hand page contains both Hobbes's Latin and, below it, the modern English translation of it. And in the case of the Latin Appendix, where no Hobbesian English equivalent exists (and the Index to the Latin edition, which was not by Hobbes), a complete translation into modern English has been placed on the pages facing the Latin text.

The second set of footnotes, keyed to the English and the Latin, consists of explanatory and editorial notes. These use an alphabetic series of superscripts, running from 'a' to 'z', then 'aa' to 'az', then 'ba' to 'bz', and so on. (Note that in all chapters except those that have no translation apparatus, the series omits 'o' in the first alphabet, to avoid confusion with the 'omission' sign in that apparatus.) The series begins again with each chapter. It runs continuously through both the English and the Latin; some notes apply to both, but some to only one of them; some notes to the Latin apply both to the original Latin and to the translation appearing in the translation apparatus, but some may apply only to the Latin text itself. Works referred to in these notes are cited by short title; full details will be found in the Bibliography (printed at the end of the introductory volume). For all biblical references and citations the Authorized Version is used, unless otherwise stated.

OF A CHRISTIAN COMMON-WEALTH

CHAP. XXXII.

Of the Principles of CHRISTIAN POLITIQUES.

The Word of God delivered by Prophets is the main principle of Christian Politiques.

I have derived the Rights of Soveraigne Power, and the duty of [1]Subjects[1] hitherto, from the Principles of Nature onely; [2]such as Experience has found true, or Consent (concerning the use of words) has made so; that is to say, from the nature of Men, known to us by Experience, and from Definitions (of such words as are Essentiall to all Politicall reasoning) universally agreed on.[2] But in that I am next to handle, which is the Nature and Rights of a CHRISTIAN COMMON-WEALTH, [3]whereof there[3] dependeth much upon Supernaturall Revelations of the Will of God; the ground of my Discourse must be, [4]not only the Naturall Word of God, but also the Propheticall.[4]

Yet is not naturall Reason to be renounced.

Neverthelesse, we are not to renounce our Senses, and Experience; nor (that which is the undoubted Word of God) [5]our naturall[5] Reason. For they are the talents which [6]he[6] hath put into our hands to negotiate,[a] [o]till the coming again of our blessed Saviour;[o] and therefore not to be folded up in the Napkin of an Implicite Faith,[b] but employed in the purchase of Justice, Peace, and true Religion. For though there be many things in Gods Word above [7] Reason; that is to say, which cannot by naturall reason be either demonstrated, or confuted; yet there is nothing contrary to [8]it; but when it seemeth so, the fault is either in our unskilfull Interpretation, or erroneous Ratiocination.[8]

7 Consent] consent of men MS 13 only] om. MS 13 also] om. MS 20 is MS] it is H, B

[1] citizens [2] namely, from the definitions of words, approved by the consent of men.
[3] knowledge of which [4] other principles, that is, the prophetical word. [5] right
[6] our Saviour [7] ^ human [8] right reason.

[a] 'To negotiate', as an intransitive verb, meant 'to do business or trade, to engage in commerce' (OED, 'negotiate', v., 1.b); the construction here is thus 'which he hath put into our hands, so that we might negotiate'.

[b] Cf. Matt. 25: 14–30; Luke 19: 12–27. Hobbes uses the Roman Catholic term for faith grounded on the authority of the Church ('fides implicita'), while also playing on the etymological meaning of 'implicit', 'in-folded'.

DE CIVITATE CHRISTIANA.

CAPVT XXXII.

De Politicae Christianae Principiis.

Hactenus Summarum Potestatum Iura, Civiumque officia à Principiis purè Naturalibus deducta sunt; nimirum à Definitionibus vocabulorum consensu hominum approbatis. Sed ad ea, quae dicenda sunt de Natura & Juribus Civitatis Christianae, cujus cognitio dependet magna ex parte à Voluntatis Divinae revelationibus supernaturalibus, adhibenda sunt Principia alia, nempè verbum Propheticum.

Veruntamen Sensibus, Experientiae, & (quòd Verbum Dei indubitatum est) rectae Rationi, renuntiandum non est. Sunt enim illa instar Minae, quae à Servatore nostro hominibus ad negotiandum data est, nec in Fide implicitâ,[b] quasi in sudario involuta, reponenda; sed ad Iustitiam, Pacem, veramque Religionem expendenda. Quanquam enim in Verbo Dei Rationem humanam superantia multa sint, id est, quae Ratione Naturali neque demonstrari, neque confutari possunt, contra tamen rectam Rationem nihil reperitur.

Therefore, when any thing therein written is too hard for our examination, wee are bidden to [9] captivate our understanding to the Words; [10]and not to labour in sifting out a Philosophicall truth by Logick, of such mysteries as [10] are not comprehensible, °nor fall under any rule of naturall science.° For it is with the mysteries °of our Religion,° as with [11]wholsome pills[11] for the sick, which swallowed whole, °have the vertue to° cure; but chewed, are for the most part cast up again °without effect.° [196]

What it is to captivate the Understanding.

But by the Captivity of our Understanding, is not meant a Submission °of the Intellectuall faculty,° to the Opinion of any other man; °but of[c] the Will to Obedience, where obedience is due.° For Sense, Memory, Understanding, Reason, °and Opinion° are not in our power [12]to change; but alwaies, and necessarily such, as the things we see, hear, and consider suggest unto us; and therefore are not effects of our Will, but our Will of them. We then Captivate our Understanding and Reason, when we forbear contradiction; when we so speak, as (by lawfull Authority) we are commanded; and when we live accordingly; which in sum, is Trust, and Faith reposed in him that speaketh, though the mind be incapable of any Notion at all from the Words spoken.[12]

How God speaketh to men.

When God speaketh to man, it [13]must be[13] either immediately; or by mediation of another man, to whom he had formerly spoken °by himself° immediately. How God speaketh to a man immediately, may be understood by those [14]well enough,[14] to whom he hath so spoken; but how the same should be understood by another, is hard, if not impossible to know. For if a man pretend to me, that God hath spoken to him supernaturally, and immediately, and I make doubt of it, I cannot easily perceive what argument he can produce, to oblige me to beleeve it. It is true, that if he be [15]my Soveraign,[15] he may oblige me to obedience, so, as not by act or word to declare I beleeve him not; but [16]not to think any otherwise then my reason perswades me.[16] But if one that hath not such authority over me, shall pretend the same, there is nothing that exacteth either beleefe, or obedience.

15 as (by] (as by MS

[9] ^ subject and [10] without philosophical examination, because divine mysteries
[11] pills prescribed by doctors [12] ; but are such as the things themselves necessarily produce in us. We are to be said to captivate our understandings when we do not contradict those whose business it is to determine doctrines. [13] is [14] , perhaps, [15] one to whom I owe obedience, [16] he cannot compel me to believe.

[c] The word 'of' here, although present in MS, H, and B, may have been included by mistake.

Quoties ergò in locum aliquem difficiliorem, quàm ut à nobis examinari possit inciderimus, intellectum nostrum verbis ipsis sine examine Philosophico, (propter mysteriorum Divinorum incomprehensibilitatem) debemus subjicere & captivare. Mysteria enim, ut pillulae quas morbo laborantibus praescribunt Medici, si deglutiantur integrae, sanant; mansae autem plerumque revomuntur.

Subjectio autem intellectus non ita intelligitur, ac si teneretur aliquis, alicujus alterius sententiae consentire; nam Sensus, Memoria, Intellectus, & Ratio nostra in Potestate nostrâ non sunt; sed tales sunt, quales res ipsae necessariò in nobis efficiunt. Intellectum tunc subjicere dicendi sumus, quando illis, quorum est de doctrinis statuere, non contradicimus.

Alloquitur homines Deus aut Immediatè, aut alterius hominis, cui Immediatè loquutus ante erat, Mediatione. Quo modo hominem Immediatè alloquatur, intelligi fortè potest ab iis, quos ita alloquutus [174] est; sed idem ut ab alio intelligatur, si non impossibile, certè difficilimum est. Nam si quis mihi diceret, Deum sibi supernaturaliter, & immediatè loquutum esse, dubitanti an id verum esset, non facilè intelligo, quibus argumentis mihi Fidem faceret. Siquidem ita dicit is, cui debeo obedire, obedire teneor, eatenus, ut neque verbo, neque facto dissensum meum patefaciam. Ut credam autem, non potest cogere. Quod si, qui Authoritatem nullam habeat, hujusmodi aliquid dicat, causa nulla est, neque ut credam, neque ut obediam.

[17]For to say that God hath spoken to him in the Holy Scripture, is not to say God hath spoken to him immediately, but by mediation of the Prophets, or of the Apostles, or of the Church, in such manner as he speaks to all other Christian men.[17] To say he hath spoken to him in a Dream, is °no more then° to say he dreamed that God spake to him; [18]which is not of force to win beleef from any man, that[18] knows dreams are for the most part naturall, and may proceed from [19]former thoughts; and such dreams as that, from selfe conceit, and foolish arrogance, and false opinion of a mans own godlinesse, or other vertue, by which he thinks he hath merited the favour of extraordinary Revelation.[19] To say he hath seen a Vision[20], or heard a Voice, [21]is to say, that he hath dreamed between sleeping and waking: for in such manner a man doth many times naturally take his dream for a vision, as not having well observed his own slumbering. To say he speaks by supernaturall Inspiration, is to say he finds an ardent desire to speak, or some strong opinion of himself, for which hee can alledge[d] no naturall and sufficient reason.[21] So that though God Almighty can speak to a man, by Dreams, Visions, Voice, and Inspiration; yet [22]he obliges no man[22] to beleeve he hath so done to him that pretends it; who (being a man) may erre, and (which is [23]more)[23] may lie.

By what marks Prophets are known.

[24]How then can he, to whom God hath never revealed his Wil immediately (saving by the way of natural reason) know when he is to obey, or not to obey his Word, delivered by him, that sayes he is a[24] Prophet? Of 400 Prophets, of whom the K. of Israel asked counsel, concerning [197] the warre he made against Ramoth Gilead, only Micaiah was a true one. The Prophet that was sent [25] to prophecy against the Altar set up by Ieroboam, [26]though a true Prophet, and that by two miracles done in his presence appeared to be a Prophet sent from God, was yet deceived by another old Prophet, that perswaded him as from the mouth of God, to eat and drink with him. If one Prophet deceive[26] another, what certainty is there of knowing the will of God, by other way than that of [27] Reason? To which I answer out of the Holy Scrip-

Quibus Deus loquutus est in Scripturis Sacris, non Immediatè loquutus est, sed per Prophetas, idque omnibus aequaliter. Qui Deum in Somnio ad se loquutum esse dicit, Deum ad se loquutum esse somniâsse se dicit. Somnia autem aliena pro Verbo Dei nemo accipiet, praesertim si somnia maximâ ex parte naturalia esse, & ab arrogantia & superbia somniantis procedere posse sciat. Qui Visionem à Deo vidisse, aut Vocem audisse se dicit, somniâsse credetur; saepe enim & facile vanis & imperitis hominibus somnia illudunt. Qui supernaturaliter inspiratam sibi esse à Deo doctrinam aliquam novam dicit, à sapientibus, ingenii sui admiratione insanire intelligetur. Quanquam autem in Somnio, in Visione, per Vocem, & per Inspirationem hominem alloqui potest Deus omnipotens dicenti tamen Deum sibi ita loquutum esse, credere obligatur nemo, homini scilicet qui & errare, & (quod pejus est) mentiri potest. Quibus ergo rationibus sine Divina revelatione intelligere possibile est, quis sit vel non sit Propheta verus? In quadringentis Prophetis quos consuluit Rex Israelis de bello gerendo contra Ramoth-Gilead, verus erat unicus Micaiah. ture, that there be two marks, by which together, not asunder, a true Prophet is to be known. °One is the doing of miracles; the other is the not teaching any other Religion than that which is already established.° Asunder (I say) neither of these is sufficient. If a Prophet rise amongst you, or [28]a Dreamer of dreams, and shall pretend the doing of a miracle, and the miracle[28] come to passe; if he say, Let us follow [29] strange Gods, which thou hast not known, thou shalt not hearken to [30]him,[30] &c. But that Prophet and [31]Dreamer[31] of dreams shall be put to death, because he hath spoken to you to [32]Revolt[32] from the Lord your God. In which words two things are to be observed; First, that God wil not have miracles alone serve for arguments, to approve the Prophets calling; but [33](as it is in the third verse) for an experiment of the constancy of our adherence to himself. For the works of the Egyptian Sorcerers, though not so great as those of Moses, yet were great miracles.[33] [f] Secondly, that how great soever the miracle be, yet if it tend to stir up revolt against the King, [34]or him that governeth by the Kings authority, he that doth such miracle, is not to be considered otherwise than as sent to make triall of their allegiance. For these words, revolt from the Lord your God, are in this place equivalent to revolt from your King. For they had made God their King by pact at the foot of Mount Sinai; who ruled them by Moses only; for he only spake with God, and from time to time declared Gods Commandements to the people.[34] [g] In like manner, after our Saviour Christ had [35]made his Disciples acknowledge him for the Messiah, (that is to say, for Gods anointed, whom the nation of the Iews daily expected for their King, but refused when he came,)[35] he omitted not to advertise them of the danger of miracles. [36] There shall arise (saith he) false Christs, and false Prophets, and shall doe great wonders and miracles, even to the seducing (if it were possible) of the very Elect. By which it appears, that false Prophets may have the power of miracles; yet are wee not to take their doctrin for Gods Word. St. Paul says further to the Galatians, that if [37]himself,[37] or an Angell from heaven preach another Gospel to them, than he had preached, let him be accursed. [38]That Gospel was, that Christ was King; so that all preaching against the power of the King received, in consequence to these words, is by St. Paul accursed. For his speech is addressed to those, who by his preaching had already received Iesus for the Christ, that is to say, for King of the Iews.[38]

The marks of a Prophet in the old law, Miracles, and Doctrine conformable to the law.

And as Miracles, [39]without preaching[39] that Doctrine which God hath established; so preaching the true Doctrine, without the doing of Miracles, is an unsufficient argument of immediate Revelation. [40]For [198] if a man that teacheth not false Doctrine, should pretend to bee a Prophet without shewing any Miracle, he is never the more to bee regarded for his pretence,[40] as is evident by Deut. 18. v. 21, 22. If thou say in thy heart, How shall we know that the Word °(of the Prophet)° is not that which the Lord hath spoken. [41]When the Prophet shall have spoken in the name of the Lord, that which shall not come to passe, that's the word which the Lord hath not spoken,[41] but the Prophet has spoken it out of the pride of his own heart, [42] fear him not. But a man may here again ask, When the Prophet hath foretold a thing, how shal we know whether it will come to passe or not? For he may foretel it as a thing to arrive after [43]a certain long time, longer then the time of mans life;[43] or indefinitely, that it will come to passe one time or other: in which case this mark of a Prophet is unusefull; and therefore [44]the miracles that oblige us to beleeve a Prophet,[44] ought to be confirmed by an immediate, or a not long deferr'd event. So that it is manifest, that [45]the teaching of the Religion which God hath established, and the shewing of a present Miracle, joined together, were the only marks whereby the Scripture would have a true Prophet, that is to say, immediate Revelation to be acknowledged; neither of them being singly sufficient to oblige any other man to regard what he saith.[45]

Miracles ceasing, Prophets cease, and the Scripture supplies their place.

Seeing therefore Miracles now cease, we have no sign left, whereby to acknowledge the °pretended° Revelations, or Inspirations of any private man; nor obligation to [46]give ear to any Doctrine, farther than it is conformable to[46] the Holy Scriptures, which since the time of [47]our Saviour,[47] supply the place, and sufficiently recompense the [48]want of all other[48] Prophecy; and from which, by [49]wise and learned[49] interpretation, and carefull ratiocination, all rules and precepts necessary to the knowledge of our duty both to God and man, without Enthusiasme, or supernaturall Inspiration, may easily be deduced. And this Scripture is it, out of which [50]I am to take[50] the Principles of my Discourse, concerning the Rights of [51]those that are the Supream Governors on earth,[51] of Christian Common-wealths; °and of the duty of Christian Subjects towards their Soveraigns.° And to that end, I shall speak in the next Chapter, of the Books, Writers, Scope and Authority of the [52] Bible.

Of the Number, Antiquity, Scope, Authority, and Interpreters of the Books of Holy SCRIPTURE.

Of the Books of Holy Scripture.

By the Books of Holy SCRIPTURE, are understood those, which ought to be the Canon, that is to say, the Rules of Christian life. And because all Rules of life, [1]which men are in conscience bound to observe, are Laws; the question of the Scripture, is the question of what is Law[1] throughout all Christendome, both Naturall, and Civill. For though it be not determined in Scripture, what Laws every Christian King [2] shall constitute in his own Dominions; yet it is determined what laws he shall not constitute. Seeing therefore I have already proved, that Soveraigns in their own [3]Dominions[3] are the sole Legislators;[a] those Books only are Canonicall, that is, Law, in every [4]nation,[4] which are established for such by the Soveraign Authority. It is true, that God is the Soveraign of all Soveraigns; and therefore, [5]when he speaks to any Subject, he ought to be obeyed,[5] whatsoever any earthly [6]Potentate[6] command to the contrary. But the question is not of obedience to God, but of when, and what God hath said; which to Subjects that have no supernaturall revelation, cannot be known, but by that naturall reason, which guided them, for the obtaining of Peace and Justice, to [7]obey the authority of their severall Common-wealths; that is to say, of their lawfull Soveraigns. According to this obligation, I can[7] acknowledge no other Books °of the Old Testament,° to be Holy Scripture, but those which have been [8]commanded to be acknowledged for such, by the Authority of[8] the Church of England. CAPVT XXXIII.

De numero, Antiquitate, Scopo, Authoritate, & Interpretibus Librorum Sacrorum.

Libri Sacri illi sunt, qui pro vitae Christianae Canone sive Regulâ habendi sunt. Quoniam autem vivendi Regulae, illis quibus praescribuntur, si illas observare obligantur Leges sunt; quaestio oritur de Legibus per totum orbem Christianum, tum naturalibus tum civilibus, quanam Authoritate Leges factae sint. Quanquam enim in Scriptura Sacra, quas Leges unusquisque Rex, sive Coetus Christianus constituere in Dominio suo debeat, definitum non sit; quas tamen constituere non debet, definitum est: Cum autem ostensum sit supra, illos, qui Summam habent in Civitate sua Potestatem solos Legislatores esse;[a] sequitur, Libros illos solos Canonicos, id est Leges esse in unaquaque Civitate, quae Summi Imperantis Authoritate latae sunt. Imperantium omnium Imperator Deus quidem est, & illi à Civibus praestanda est obedientia; quicquid in contrarium jubet Rex terrenus. Sed de obedientiâ Deo praestandâ controversia nulla est, sed quando & quid loquutus sit Deus; id quod ab iis, quibus nulla data est Revelatio supernaturalis, sciri non potest, nisi per Rationem illam naturalem, qua Pacis & Iustitiae obtinendae causa, Authoritati Summarum Potestatum sese submiserunt. Quare nullos ego Libros pro Scriptura Sacra agnoscere debeo, praeter eos, quos sancivit Ecclesia Anglicana. Quinam autem illi Libri sint, non est opus hoc loco recensere.

are, [9]is sufficiently known, without a Catalogue of them here; and they are the same that are acknowledged by St. Ierome, who holdeth the rest, namely, the Wisdome of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Iudith, Tobias, the first and the second of Maccabees, (though he had seen the first in Hebrew) and the third and fourth of Esdras, for Apocrypha.[b] Of the Canonicall, Iosephus a learned Iew, that wrote in the time of the Emperour Domitian, reckoneth twenty two, making the number agree with the Hebrew Alphabet. St. Ierome does the same, though they reckon them in different manner. For Iosephus numbers[9] five Books of Moses, thirteen of Prophets, [10]that writ the History of their own times (which how it agrees with the Prophets writings contained in the Bible wee shall see hereafter), and four of Hymnes and Morall Precepts.[c] But St. Ierome reckons[10] five Books of Moses, eight of Prophets, and nine of [11]other Holy writ, which he calls of Hagiographa.[d] The Septuagint, who were 70. learned men of the Iews, sent for by Ptolemy King of Egypt, to translate the Iewish law, out of the Hebrew into the Greek, have [200] left us no other for holy Scripture in the Greek tongue, but the same that are received in the Church of England.[11 e]

As for the Books of the New Testament, [12]they are equally acknowledged for Canon by all Christian Churches, and by all Sects of Christians, that admit any Books at all for Canonicall.[12]

Their Antiquity.

Who were the °originall° writers of the [13]severall Books of Holy Scripture, has not been made evident by any sufficient testimony of other History, (which is the only proof of matter of fact); nor can be by any arguments of naturall Reason: for Reason serves only to convince the truth (not of fact, but) of consequence. The light therefore that must guide us in this question, must be that which is held out unto us from[13] the Bookes themselves: And this light, though it shew us not the writer of every book, yet it [14]is not unusefull to give us knowledge of[14] the time, wherein they were written.

13 of] om. MS

[9] it is not necessary to list here. Josephus numbers twenty-two books of the Old Testament: namely,

[10] and four of the rest. Jerome gives the same number, namely,

[11] hagiographa. Both exclude from the canon the book of the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Judith, Tobit, and the first and second books of Maccabees. The Seventy Translators [Septuagint], who were Jews learned in the Greek language, translated the same books into Greek by order of King Ptolemy.[e]

[12] there is no dispute about them among the Christian Churches.

[13] Holy Scriptures cannot be demonstrated from histories. If they could be investigated at all, the investigation would have to be by the light of Eosdem solos transtulerunt Septuaginta Interpretes in linguam Graecam, homines Iudaei Graecae linguae periti, jussu Regis Ptolomaei.[e] De Libris Testamenti Novi inter Ecclesias Christianas controversia nulla est. [b] The Latin translation of the Bible (Vulg) prepared by St Jerome (c.347–420) included some of these books: he translated Tobit and Judith, while translations of Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus (= Sirach), 1 and 2 Maccabees, and 1 and 2 Esdras (= 3 and 4 Ezra) were adopted from the Old Latin translation. In his preface to Samuel and Kings he distinguished these books (which were not in the Hebrew Bible) from the primary canon (though he noted that he had found 1 Maccabees in Hebrew), describing them as 'apocrypha' ('concealed'): see PL xxviii, cols. 556–7. He dismissed 1 and 2 Esdras with some scorn as 'apocrypha' in his preface to Ezra and Nehemiah (PL xxviii, col. 1403).

[c] Flavius Josephus (37–100), who lived through the reign of the Emperor Domitian (r. 81–96), gave this enumeration in his Against Apion, I.39–40, but without making the connection with the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet; Hobbes's source for that connection may have been Richard Field, who attributed it to Josephus (Of the Church, IV.24, p. 245), or he may have confused Josephus' comments with those of Jerome (see below, note d).

[d] Jerome, preface to Samuel and Kings (PL xxviii, cols. 552–4; cf. also col. 547, making the connection with the 22 Hebrew letters).

[e] The 'Septuagint' text is the Greek translation of the Hebrew Bible, made by Jews in Alexandria between the 3rd and 1st centuries BC; legend had it that the translation of the Pentateuch was done by 72 men in 72 days, at the command of King Ptolemy II Philadelphus of Egypt (r. 285–246 BC). It also includes books not present in the Hebrew Bible; most but not all of these were included as 'apocrypha' in AV.

The Pentateuch not written by Moses.

[15]And first, for the Pentateuch, it is not argument enough that they were written by Moses, because they are called the five Books of Moses; no more than these titles, The Book of Ioshua, the Book of Iudges, the Book of Ruth, and the Books of the Kings, are arguments sufficient to prove, that they were written by Ioshua, by the Iudges, by Ruth, and by the Kings. For in titles of Books, the subject is marked, as often as the writer. The History of Livy, denotes the Writer; but the History of Scanderbeg,[f] is denominated from the subject.[15] We read in the last Chapter of Deuteronomie, ver. 6. °concerning the sepulcher of Moses,° that no man knoweth of his sepulcher to this day, that is, to the day wherein those words were written. It is therefore manifest, that those words were written [16]after his interrement. For it were a strange interpretation, to say Moses spake of his own sepulcher (though by Prophecy), that it was not found to that day, wherein he was yet living.[g] But it may perhaps be alledged,[h] that the last Chapter only, not the whole Pentateuch, was written by some other man, but the rest not:[i] Let us therefore consider that which[16] we find in the Book of Genesis, chap. 12. ver. 6. And Abraham passed through the land to the place of Sichem, unto the [17]plain of Moreh,[17] and the Canaanite was then in the land; which must needs bee the words of one that wrote when the Canaanite was not in the land; and consequently, not of Moses, °who dyed before he came into it.° Likewise Numbers 21. ver. 14. [18]the Writer citeth another more ancient Book, Entituled, The Book of the Warres of the Lord, wherein were registred the Acts of Moses, at the Red-sea, and at the brook of Arnon. It is therefore sufficiently evident, that the five Books of Moses were written after his time, though how long after it be not so manifest.[18]

[15] The book of the Pentateuch does not seem to have been written by Moses; it seems rather to have been written about Moses, than by Moses.

[16] long after the time of the death of Moses. When people say that Moses wrote those words prophetically, they are being absurd.[g] Again, [17] famous valley [Vulg]

[18] where we read: 'it is said in the book of the wars of the Lord, "As he did in the Red Sea, so he will do in the torrents of Arnon."' These words could not have been written by Moses himself.

The 'History' referred to here was the biography by Barleti, Historia de vita Scanderbegi, adapted by Jacques de Lavardin as Histoire de Georges Castriote; Lavardin's work was translated by Zachary Jones as The Historie of George Castriot.

[g] The principle that Moses had written prophetically about his own death, and about events after it, was widely accepted by theologians, though some found this reference to his sepulchre problematic: the most influential statement of both opinions was by Tostatus, Opera omnia, v, fo. 183r.

[19]But though Moses did not compile those Books entirely, and in the form we have them; yet he wrote all that which hee is there said to have written: as for example,[19] the Volume of the Law, which is contained, °as it seemeth,° in the 11 of Deuteronomie, and the following Chapters to the [20] 27. which was also commanded [21] to be written on stones, in their entry into the land of Canaan.[j]

The Book of Joshua written after his time.

That the Book of Ioshua was also written long after [24]the time of Ioshua,[24] may be gathered out of °many places of° the Book it self. Ioshua had set up twelve Stones in the middest of Iordan, for a monument of [25]their[25] passage; of which the Writer saith thus, They are there unto this day; °for unto this day, is a phrase that signifieth a time past, beyond the memory of man.° In like manner, upon the saying of the Lord, [26]that he had rolled off from the people the Reproach of Egypt,[26] the Writer saith, The place is called Gilgal unto this day; °which to have said in the time of Ioshua had been improper. So also the name of the Valley of Achor, from the trouble that Achan raised in the Camp, the Writer saith, remaineth unto this day; which must needs bee therefore long after the time of Ioshua.° Arguments of this kind there be many other; as Iosh. 8. 29. 13. 13. 14. 14. 15. 63. [29] ^ The book of Ruth was written after the book of Judges, as is clear from Ruth 1: 1.

Arnon. Quae scribi à Mose ipso non potuerunt. Ea sola scripsit Moses, quae à Scriptore Pentateuchi scripsisse dicitur, nempe volumen Legis, quae habetur in Deuteronomio à Capite undecimo usque ad finem Capitis vicesimi septimi, & quam in aditu terrae Chananeae lapidibus inscribi jussit Deus.[j] Volumen hoc scripsit ipse Moses, tradiditque Sacerdotibus, Senioribusque Israelis, Israelitis omnibus in festo Tabernaculorum septimo quoque anno recitandum. Atque haec Lex ea est, quam Deus à sacerdotibus & levitis transcriptam, à Regibus populi Israelitici futuri legendam esse jussit.

Quod Liber Iosuae longo tempore scriptus sit post mortem ejus, ex Libro ipso colligi potest. Cum in medio alveo Iordanis erexisset Iosua, in monumentum transitus Hebraeorum duodecem lapides; scriptor Libri de illis dicit, Et ibi sunt usque in praesentem diem. Ios. 4, 9. Similiter Ios. 5, 9, cum dixisset Deus ad Iosuam, Hodie abstuli opprobrium Aegypti à vobis. Dicit Scriptor, Vocatum est nomen loci illius Galgala, usque in praesentem diem. Haec & alia argumenta similia ex aliis locis Libri Iosuae, ut Ios. 8, 29: 13, 13: 14, 14: 15, 63. [178] ostendunt Librum Iosuae scriptum esse satis longo tempore post illius mortem.

The like of the Bookes of Samuel.

That the Books of Samuel were also written after his [30]own time, there are the like arguments,[30] 1 Sam. 5.5. 7.13, 15. 27.6. & 30.25. where, after David had adjudged equall part of the spoiles, to them that guarded the Ammunition,[n] with them that [31] fought, the Writer saith, He made it a Statute and an Ordinance to Israel to this day. Again, when David [32](displeased, that the Lord had slain Vzzah, for putting out his hand to sustain the Ark,) called the place Perez-Vzzah, the Writer saith, it is called so[32] to this day: °the time therefore of the writing of that Book, must be long after the time of the fact;[q] that is, long after the time of David.°

[34] It is argument sufficient they were written after the captivity in Babylon, that the History of them [35]is continued till that time.[35] For the Facts[r] Registred are alwaies more ancient than the Register; and much more ancient than such Books as make mention of, and quote the Register; as these Books doe [36]in divers places, referring the Reader to the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda,[36] to the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel, to the [37]Books[37] of the Prophet Samuel, of the Prophet Nathan, of the Prophet [38]Ahijah;[38] to the Vision of Iehdo, to the Books of the Prophet Serveiah, and of the Prophet Addo.[s] [202]

Ezra and Nehemiah.

The Books of Esdras and Nehemiah were written °certainly° after their return from captivity[39]; because their return, the re-edification of the walls and houses of Ierusalem, the renovation of the Covenant, and ordination of their policy[t] are therein contained.

Esther.

The History of Queen Esther [40]is of the time of[40] the Captivity; °and therefore the Writer must have been of the same time,° or after it.

'Iehdo' or 'Jehdo' is the form used in Junius–Tremellius, and the French Geneva Bible (Vulg: 'Iaddo'; AV: 'Iddo'); 'Serveiah' ('Serviah' in the Latin) is apparently an error (either a scribal error, or a compositorial misreading of the copy-MS) for 'Semeiah' (Vulg: 'Semeias'; AV: 'Shemaiah'); 'Addo' is the form used in Vulg (Junius–Tremellius: 'Hiddo'; AV: 'Iddo'). 'Abijah' in the Latin is an error, caused either by a misprint or by confusion with King Abijah (see 2 Chr. 13).

Iob. The Book of Iob hath no mark in it [41] of the time wherein it was written: and though it [42]appear sufficiently [42] (Ezekiel 14. 14. and Iames 5. 11.) that he was no fained person [43]; yet the Book it self seemeth not to be a History, but a [44]Treatise concerning a question in ancient time much disputed, why wicked men have often prospered in this world, and good men have been afflicted;[44] and it is the more probable, because from the beginning, to the third verse of the third chapter, where the complaint of Iob beginneth, the Hebrew is °(as St. Jerome testifies)° in prose; and from thence to the sixt verse of the last chapter in Hexameter Verses; and the rest of that chapter again in prose.[u] So that the dispute [45] is all in verse; and the prose is [46]added,[46] but as a Preface in the beginning, and an Epilogue in the end. But Verse is no usuall stile of such, as either are themselves in great pain, as Job; or of such as come to comfort [47]them,[47] as his friends; but in °Philosophy, especially° morall Philosophy, in ancient time frequent.[v]

The Psalter. The Psalmes were written the most part by David, for the use of the Quire. [48]To these are added some Songs of [48] Moses, and other holy men;[w] and some of them [49] after the return from the Captivity, as the 137. and the 126. [50]whereby it is manifest that the Psalter was compiled, and put into the form it now hath, after the return of the Jews from Babylon.[50]

The Proverbs. The Proverbs, [51]being a Collection of wise and godly Sayings, partly of Solomon, partly of Agur the son of Jakeh, and partly of [51] the Mother of King Lemuel,[y] [52]cannot probably be thought to have been collected by Solomon, rather then by Agur, or the Mother of Lemuel; and that, though the sentences[z] be theirs, yet the collection or compiling them into this one Book, was the work of some other godly man, that lived after them all.[52]

Ecclesiastes and the Canticles. The Books of Ecclesiastes and the Canticles [53]have nothing that was not Solomons, except it be the Titles, or Inscriptions. For The Words of the Preacher, the Son of David, King in Jerusalem; and, The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's,[aa] seem to have been made for distinctions sake, then, when the Books of Scripture were gathered into one body of the Law; to the end, that not the Doctrine only, but the Authors also might be extant.[53] [ab]

Id, quòd ex eo probabilius fit, quod à principio Libri usque ad tertii Capitis, versum tertium, nempe querimoniarum Iobi initium, oratione prosa Hebraice, scriptus est; inde autem usque ad ultimi [179] Capitis versum sextum Versu Hexametro, & rursus quod ultimi Capitis restat oratione prosa. Ita ut disputatio circa quaestionem tota Versus sit; prosa autem in sola Praefatione & Epilogo inveniatur. Versus autem neque illis, qui in magnis doloribus constituti sunt, ut Iob, nec illis qui consolaturi miseros veniunt, ut amici ejus, stilus usitatus est, sed Philosophis moralibus priscis frequentissimus.[v]

Gladish, p. 46). Phocylides and Theognis were Greek poets of the 6th century BC; there survive some fragments by the former, and a collection of short poems by the latter, on human life, moral behaviour, etc. In the Renaissance period a long Greek didactic poem on moral behaviour was attributed to Phocylides, though it is now thought to be the work of a Jewish writer of the 1st century BC or AD (see van der Horst, Sentences of Pseudo-Phocylides). Among writings in verse on moral philosophy, Hobbes may also have had in mind Dionysius Cato, Disticha. Cf. also Sidney, Apologie for Poetrie, sig. C3r, referring to Tyrtaeus, Phocylides, and Cato (moral philosophy) and Lucretius, Vergil, Manilius, and Pontanus (natural philosophy and astronomy).

[y] Prov. 1: 1 and 25: 1 attribute the proverbs that follow to Solomon (though 25: 1 says they were 'copied out' under Hezekiah, a later ruler); 30: 1 attributes the proverbs in that chapter to Agur the son of Jakeh, and 31: 1 calls the proverbs in that chapter 'the words of king Lemuel, the prophecy that his mother taught him'.

But the Book of Jonas is not properly °a Register of° his Prophecy, (for that is contained in these °few° words, Fourty dayes and Ninivy shall be destroyed,)[ae] but a History or Narration of his frowardnesse[af] and [54]disputing Gods commandements; so that there is small probability he should be the Author, seeing he is the subject of it.[54] But the Book of Amos is his Prophecy. [55] [203]

Jeremiah, Abdias,[ag] [56] Nahum, and Habakkuk prophecyed in the time of Josiah. [57]

Ezekiel, Daniel, Aggeus,[ah] and Zacharias, [58] in the Captivity.

When Ioel and Malachi prophecyed, is not evident by their Writings. But °considering the Inscriptions, or Titles of their Books,°[ai] it is manifest enough, that the whole Scripture of the Old Testament, was set forth in the form we have it, after the return [59]of the Iews from their[59] Captivity in Babylon, and before the time of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, °that caused it to bee translated into Greek by seventy men, which were sent him out of Iudea for that purpose.°[aj] And if the [60]Books of Apocrypha (which are recommended to us by the Church, though not for Canonicall, yet for profitable Books for our instruction)[ak] may in this point[60] be credited, the Scripture was set forth [61]in the form wee have it in, by Esdras; as may appear by that which he himself saith,[61] in the second book, chapt. 14. verse 21, 22, &c. °where speaking to God, he saith thus,° Thy law is burnt; therefore no man knoweth the things which thou hast done, or the works that are to begin. But if I have found Grace before thee, send down the holy Spirit into me, and I shall write all that hath been done in the world, since the beginning, which were written in thy Law, that men may find thy path, and that they which will live in the later days, may live. And verse 45.[al] And it came to passe when the forty dayes were fulfilled, that the Highest spake, saying, The first that thou hast written, publish openly, that the worthy and unworthy may read it; but keep the seventy last, that thou mayst deliver them onely to such as be wise among the people. °And thus much concerning the time of the writing of the Bookes of the Old Testament.°

The Roman Catholic position, after 1546, was more complicated: seven books of the former apocrypha were included in the canon but accorded a secondary (later called 'deuterocanonical') status, while three books, including 2 Esdras, were excluded from the canon, though usually printed in an appendix.

The New Testament.

The Writers of the New Testament lived all in [62]lesse then an age after Christs Ascension,[62] and had all of them seen [63]our Saviour, or been his Disciples,[63] except St. Paul, and St. Luke; and consequently whatsoever was written by them, is as ancient as the time of the Apostles. But the time wherein the Books of the New Testament were [64] received, and acknowledged by the Church to be of their writing, is [65]not altogether so ancient.[65] For, as the Bookes of the Old Testament are derived[am] to us, from no higher time then that of Esdras, who [66]by the direction of Gods[66] Spirit retrived them, when they were lost: Those of the New Testament, °of which the copies were not many, nor could easily be all in any one private mans hand,° cannot bee derived from a higher time, than that wherein the Governours of the Church collected, approved, and recommended them to us, as the writings of those Apostles and Disciples[67]; under whose names they go. The first enumeration of all the Bookes, both of the Old, and New Testament, is in the Canons of the Apostles, [68]supposed to be collected[68] by Clement the first (after St. Peter) Bishop of Rome. But because [69]that is but supposed, and by many questioned,[an] the Councell of Laodicea is the first we know, that recommended the Bible to the then Christian Churches, for the Writings of the Prophets and Apostles:[69] and this Councell was held in the 364. yeer after Christ.[ao] At which time, though ambition had so far prevailed on the great Doctors of the Church, as [204] no more to esteem Emperours, though Christian, for the Shepherds of the people, but for Sheep; and Emperours not Christian, for Wolves; and endeavoured to passe their Doctrine, not for Counsell, °and Information, as Preachers;° but for Laws, [70]as absolute Governours; and thought such frauds as tended to make the people the more obedient to Christian Doctrine, to be pious; yet I am perswaded they did not therefore falsifie the Scriptures, though the copies of the Books of the New Testament, were [70] in the hands only of the Ecclesiasticks; because if they had had an intention so to doe, they would surely have made them more favorable to [71]their power over Christian Princes, and Scriptores Testamenti Novi vixerunt omnes tempore ipsius Christi, & (exceptis Paulo & Luca) illum viderant. Tempus autem, in quo Testamenti Novi Libri primùm ab Ecclesia pro ipsorum scriptis agniti & recepti sunt, tempore Apostolorum aliquantò posterius erat. Sicut enim Libros Testamenti Veteris altius derivare non potuimus, quam ab Esdra, qui auxilio Spiritus Sancti, perditos restituit; ita Libri Testamenti Novi ab altiore tempore derivari non possunt, quàm ab eo, quo Rectores Ecclesiarum illos collegerant, probaverant; & ut scriptos ab Apostolis & Discipulis Christi, quorum nominibus inscribuntur, nobis commendaverant. Enumeratio Librorum tum Veteris tum Novi Testamenti prima, est in Canonibus Apostolorum facta à Clemente primo (post Petrum) Episcopo Romano. Sed quoniam de Canonibus illis controversia est,[an] Scripturae Sacrae, qualem habemus nunc, receptio publica, Concilio Laodicensi attribuenda est; quod Concilium habitum est Anno post Christum natum 364. [an] The 'Apostolic Canons' was the name given to a collection of decrees of the early Church, traditionally regarded as a summary of apostolic teachings compiled by St Clement (Clemens Romanus, d. *c.*99 AD, the fourth Pope), but now dated to the 4th or 5th century. Its authenticity had been doubted by many; Hobbes may have known the discussions by André Rivet (Critici sacri specimen, pp. 105–14) and Abraham Scultetus (Medullae theologiae patrum syntagma, pp. 368–9), who both dismissed it as a later work, or by Daniel Toussaint, who described it as a 'Rapsody . . . written long after the times of the Apostles' (Synopsis, p. 18), or by Pierre de Marca, who dated it to between 258 and 325 (De concordia, pp. 393–9). (Cf. also below, pp. 828–9.) Concerning Hobbes's deletion in the MS of the phrase '(after St. Peter)', cf. the doubts expressed below, pp. 874–5.

[ao] The Council of Laodicea (363–4) issued a collection of canons (decrees); canon 60 (or 59, in some versions) lists the books of the Bible, though some modern scholars have argued that this canon is a later addition. Hobbes's knowledge of this may have come from the Magdeburg Centuriators, who printed the canons (Flacius et al., Ecclesiastica historia, ii, cent. 4., cols. 834–8), or from the discussion in Daillé, Traicté de l'employ des saincts peres, pp. 76–7, 230–31.

Civill Soveraignty, than they are. I see not therefore[71] any reason to doubt, but that the Old, and New Testament, as we have them now, are the true Registers of those things, which were done and said by the Prophets, and Apostles. [72]And so perhaps are some of those Books which are called Apocrypha, if left out of the Canon, not for inconformity of Doctrine with the rest, but only because they are not found in the Hebrew. For after the conquest of Asia by Alexander the Great, there were few learned Jews, that were not perfect in the Greek tongue. For the seventy Interpreters that converted the Bible into Greek, were all of them Hebrews; and we have extant the works of Philo and Josephus both Jews, written by them eloquently in Greek.[72 ap] But it is not the [73] Writer, but the authority of the Church, that maketh a Book Canonicall. And [74] although these Books were written by divers men, [75]yet it is manifest the Writers were all indued with one and the same Spirit, in that they[75] conspire[aq] to one and the same end, which is the setting forth of the Rights of the Kingdome of [76] God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. For the Book of Genesis, deriveth the Genealogy of Gods people, from the creation of the World, to the going into Egypt: the other four Books of Moses, [77]contain the Election of God for their King, and the Laws which hee prescribed for their Government:[77] The Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, and Samuel, °to the time of Saul,° describe the acts of Gods people, till [78]the time they cast off Gods yoke,[78] and called for a King, after the manner of their neighbour nations:[ar] The rest of the History of the Old Testament, derives the succession of the line of David[79], to the Captivity, out of which line was to spring the restorer of the Kingdome of [80]God, even our blessed Saviour God the Son,[80] whose coming was foretold in the Bookes of the Prophets, after whom the Evangelists writt his life, and actions, °and his claim to the Kingdome, whilst he lived on earth:° and lastly, the Acts, and Epistles of the Apostles, declare the coming of °God,° the Holy Ghost, and the Authority [81] he left with them, and their successors, for the direction of the Jews, and for the invitation of the Gentiles. In summe, the Histories and the Prophecies of the old Testament, and the Gospels and Epistles of the New Testament, have had one and the same scope, to convert men to the obedience of God; 1. in Moses, and the Priests; 2. in the man Christ; and 3. in the Apostles and the successors to Apostolicall power. For these three at several times did represent the person of God: Moses, and his successors the High Priests, and Kings of Judah, in the [205] Old Testament: Christ himself, in the time he lived on earth: and the Apostles, and their successors, from the day of Pentecost (when the Holy Ghost descended on them)[as] to this day.[81]

illa magis favorabilia. Dubium igitur non est, quin Testamenta Vetus & Novum, ut nunc extant, Monumenta vera sint earum rerum quae dictae & factae sunt à Prophetis, & Apostolis, & aliis Scripturae Sacrae Scriptoribus. Dubium etiam non est quin potuerit Ecclesia in Canonem etiam alios Libros recipere à Iudaeis quanquam lingua Hebraea non scriptos, si modo caeteris Doctrinam non contrariam continuissent. Non enim à Scriptoris Dialecto, sed à Doctrina, partimque etiam à tempore scriptionis, an Liber aliquis in Canonem recipi mereatur, judicandum est. Erant autem in Iudaea Sancti viri Iudaei, qui linguam Graecam perfectè calluerunt. Sed Libri non à Scriptoris, sed ab Ecclesiae Authoritate recipiendi sunt. [72] , and the other writers of Holy Scripture. There is also no doubt that the Church could have received into the canon other books too from the Jews, even though they were not written in Hebrew, so long as they contained doctrine that was not contrary to the rest. For it is not by the language of the writer, but by the doctrine, and also partly by the time of writing, that we should judge whether a particular book deserves to be admitted to the canon. In Judaea there were Jewish holy men who had acquired a perfect knowledge of the Greek language. [73] ^ authority of the

The question of the Authority of the Scriptures stated.

It is a question [82]much[82] disputed between the divers sects of Christian Religion, From whence the [83] Scriptures derive their Authority; which question is also propounded sometimes in other terms, as, How wee know [84]them[84] to be the Word of God, °or, Why we beleeve them to be so:° And the difficulty [85]of resolving it, ariseth chiefly from the impropernesse of the words wherein[85] the question itself is couched. For it is [86] beleeved on all hands, that the °first and originall° Author of them is God; [87]and consequently the question disputed, is not that. Again, it is manifest, that none can know they are Gods Word, (though all true Christians beleeve it,) but those to whom God himself hath revealed it supernaturally; and therefore the question is not rightly moved, of our Knowledge of it. Lastly, when the question is propounded of our Beleefe;[87] because some are moved to beleeve for one, and others for other reasons, there can be rendred no one generall answer for them all. The question truly stated is, By what Authority [88]they[88] are made Law.

Their Authority and Interpretation.

As far as they differ not from the Laws of Nature, there is no doubt, but they are the Law of God, and carry their Authority with them, legible to all men that have the use of naturall reason: but this is no other Authority, then [89]that of all other Morall Doctrine consonant to Reason; the Dictates whereof are Laws, not made, but Eternall.[89]

If they be made Law by God himselfe, [90]they are of the nature of written Law, which[90] are Laws to them only to whom God hath so sufficiently published them, as no man can excuse himself, [91]by saying, he knew not they were his.[91]

He therefore, to whom God hath not supernaturally revealed, that [92]they are his,[92] nor that those that published them, were sent by him, is not obliged to [93]obey[93] them, by any Authority, but his, whose Commands have already the force of Laws; that is to say, by any other Authority, then that of the [94]Common-wealth, residing in the Soveraign,[94] who only has the Legislative power. Again, if it be not the Legislative Authority of the Common-wealth, that [95]giveth them the force of[95] Laws, it must bee some other Authority °derived from God,° either private, or publique: if private, it obliges onely him, Quaestio hodie disputatur inter Christianae Religionis Sectas, Vnde habeant Scripturae Sacrae, eam quam habent Authoritatem; quae quaestio proponi solet sic, Quî scimus Scripturas esse Verbum Dei; difficultatemque habet tantummodo à quaerendi modo. Nam quod Deus ipse Scripturae Sacrae Author sit agnoscunt omnes, & credunt. Quod autem id sciant, nisi à Deo ipso supernaturaliter revelatum esset, impossibile est. Quaestionem hanc proponunt alii sic; Cur credimus Scripturas esse Verbum Dei? Cui quaestioni, quia, ut id credant diversi homines propter causas diversas inducuntur, responsio universalis dari non potest. Quaestionis status verus hic est, qua Auctoritate Scripturae Sacrae fiunt Leges.

Quatenus non differunt Scripturae à Legibus Naturae, dubium non est, quin sint Leges Dei, Auctoritatemque habent, omnibus, qui Ratione Naturali praediti sunt manifestam. Sed Authoritas haec alia non est, quàm quae Doctrinae omni morali, si vera sit, attribuenda est.

Si Leges à Deo ipso factae sint, nempe Leges Divinae positivae, nulla accedente Authoritate humana, illis solis Leges sunt, quibus Deus ipsas ita promulgavit, ut nulla illis per ignorantiam relinquatur excusatio.

Illi igitur quibus Deus non revelavit supernaturaliter, quòd Scripturae ab illo sint, vel eos, qui illas praedicant, ab eo missos esse, nulla, ut eas recipiant, Authoritate obligantur, praeterquam ejus, qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem. Is enim Legislator solus est. Rursus, si Authoritas Civitatis non sit, quae Scripturas facit esse Leges, Authoritate aliquâ aliâ vel privatâ vel publicâ id fiet. to whom in particular God hath [96]been pleased to reveale it.[96] For if every man should be obliged, to take for Gods Law, what particular men, on pretence of °private° Inspiration, or Revelation, should obtrude upon him, (in such a number of men, that out of pride, and ignorance, take °their own° Dreams, and °extravagant° Fancies, and Madnesse, for testimonies of Gods Spirit; or out of ambition, [97]pretend to such Divine testimonies, falsely, and contrary to their own consciences,)[97] it were impossible that any [98]Divine Law should be acknowledged. If publique, it[98] is the Authority of the Common-wealth, or of the Church. But the Church, if it be one person, is the same thing with a Common-wealth °of [206] Christians;° called a Common-wealth, because it consisteth of men °united in one person, their Soveraign;° and a Church, because it consisteth in Christian men, °united in one Christian Soveraign. But if the Church be not one person, then it hath no authority at all; it can neither command, nor doe any action at all; nor is capable of having any power, or right to any thing; nor has any Will, Reason, nor Voice; for all these qualities are personall.° Now if the whole number of Christians be not contained in one Common-wealth, they are not one person; nor is there an Universall Church [99]that hath any authority over them;[99] and therefore the Scriptures are not made Laws, by the [100] Universall Church: [101]or if it bee one Common-wealth, then all Christian Monarchs, and States are[101] private persons, and subject to bee judged, deposed, and punished by an Universall [102]Soveraigne of[102] all Christendome. So that the question of the Authority of the Scriptures, is reduced to this, Whether Christian Kings, and the Soveraigne Assemblies in Christian Common-wealths, be [103]absolute[103] in their own Territories, °immediately under God;° or subject to one Vicar of Christ, °constituted over the Vniversall Church;° to bee judged, condemned, deposed, and put to death, as hee shall think expedient, [104]or necessary for the common[104] good.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Of the Signification of SPIRIT, ANGEL, and INSPIRATION in the Books of Holy Scripture.

Body and Spirit how taken in the Scripture.

Seeing the foundation of all true Ratiocination, is the °constant° Signification of words; [1] which in the Doctrine following, [2]dependeth[2] not (as in naturall science) on the Will of [3]the Writer, nor (as in common conversation)[3] on vulgar use, but on the sense they carry in the Scripture; It is necessary, before I proceed any further, to determine, out of the Bible, the meaning of such words, as by their ambiguity, may render what I am to inferre upon them, obscure, or disputable. I will begin with the words BODY, and SPIRIT, which in the language of the Schools are termed, Substances, Corporeall, and Incorporeall.

The Word Body, in the most generall acceptation, signifieth that which filleth, or occupyeth some certain °room, or imagined° place; and dependeth not [4] on the imagination, but is a reall part of that we call the Vniverse. For the Vniverse, being the Aggregate of all Bodies, there is no reall part thereof that is not also Body; nor any thing properly a Body, that is not also part of °(that Aggregate of all Bodies)° the Vniverse. [5]The same also, because Bodies are subject to change, that is to say, to variety of apparence to the sense of living creatures, is called Substance, that is to say,[5] Subject, to various accidents; as sometimes to °be Moved, sometimes to° stand Still; and to seem to our senses sometimes Hot, sometimes Cold, sometimes of one Colour, Smel, Tast, or Sound, somtimes of another[6]. And this diversity of Seeming, (produced by the diversity of the operation of [7] bodies, on the organs of our sense) [8]we attribute[8] to alterations of the Bodies that operate, & [9]call[9] them Accidents of those Bodies. And according to this acceptation of the word[10], Substance and Body, signifie the same thing; and therefore Substance incorporeall are words, [11]which when they are joined together, destroy one another,[11] as if a man should say, an Incorporeall Body. [12]

25 Accidents] Occidents B

[1] ^ the definitions of [2] depend [3] men, nor [4] ^, as place itself does, [5] And because bodies appear in various ways, they are also said to be [6] ^; and for this reason they are called substances. [7] ^ external [8] makes us attribute those seemings [9] think [10] 'body', [11] without sense, [12] ^ Neither that expression nor 'immaterial' is found anywhere in Holy Scripture.

CAPVT XXXIV.

De Significatione quam habent in Scripturis Sacris Vocabula Spiritus, Angelus, Inspiratio.

Cum rectè ratiocinandi fundamentum positum sit in significatione Vocabulorum; quorum Definitiones in Doctrina sequente non dependent (ut in Scientiis Naturalibus) ab arbitrio hominum, aut vulgi usu, sed à sensu, quem habent in Scriptura Sacra; necessarium est, antequam ulterius progrediar, ut ex Scriptura Sacra, Verborum [183] eorum Significationem stabiliam, quibus per ambiguitatem suam, ea, quae ab illis illaturus sum, reddantur obscura aut dubia. Incipiam autem à Vocabulis Corpus & Spiritus, quae in sermone Scholastico appellari solent Substantia Corporea & Incorporea.

Corpus significat universaliter id quod locum aliquem certum implet sive occupat; nec dependet (ut locus ipse) ab imaginatione nostra, sed pars est realis ejus, quod vocamus Vniversum. Vniversum enim, cum sit Corporum omnium Aggregatum, nullam habet partem, quae non sit etiam Corpus; neque dicitur propriè Corpus, quod non sit totius Universi aliqua pars: Quoniam autem Corpora, variè apparent, dicuntur etiam variis Subjecta esse Accidentibus, nimirum aliquando quiescere, modo Calida, modo Frigida; interdum Coloris, Odoris, Saporis vel Soni unius interdum alterius, & propter eam causam nominantur Substantiae. Diversitas autem haec Apparitionum (quae oritur ab operatione varia corporum externorum in Organa sentiendi) facit, ut illas mutationibus Corporum Agentium attribuamus, & Accidentia esse putemus ipsorum corporum. Iuxta hanc Vocabuli Corporis acceptionem, Corpus & Substantia idem significant; & proinde, vox composita Substantia Incorporea est insignificans, aeque ac si quis diceret Corpus Incorporeum; neque illa neque vox Immaterialis in Scriptura Sacra usquam invenitur.

But in the sense of common people, not all the Universe is [13]called[13] Body, but only such parts thereof as they can discern [14]by the sense of Feeling, to resist their force, or by the sense of their Eyes, to[14] hinder them from a farther prospect. Therefore in the common language of men, Aire, and aeriall substances, use not to be taken for Bodies, but (as often as men are sensible of their effects) are called Wind, or Breath, [15]or (because the same are called in the Latine Spiritus) Spirits; as when they call that aeriall substance, which in the body of any living creature, gives it life and motion,[15] Vitall and Animall spirits. But for those Idols[a] of the brain, [16]which represent Bodies to us, where they[16] are not, as in a Looking-glasse, in a Dream, or to a [208] Distempered brain waking,[b] they are [17] (as the Apostle saith generally of all Idols) nothing;[c] Nothing at all, I say, there where they seem to bee; and in the brain it self, nothing but tumult, proceeding [18]either from the action of the objects, or from the disorderly agitation of the Organs of our Sense. And men, that[18] are otherwise imployed, then to search into [19]their causes,[19] know not of themselves, what to call them; and may therefore easily be perswaded, by those whose knowledge they much reverence, some to call them [20] Bodies, and think them made of aire compacted by a power supernaturall, °because the sight judges them corporeall;° and some to call them Spirits, because the sense of Touch discerneth nothing in the place where they appear, °to resist their fingers:° So that the proper signification of Spirit in common speech, is either a subtile, fluid, and invisible Body, or a [21]Ghost, or other[21] Idol or Phantasme °of the Imagination.° But for metaphoricall significations, [22] there be many: for sometimes it is taken for Disposition or Inclination °of the mind;° as when for [23]the disposition to controwl[d] the sayings of other men,[23] we say, a spirit of contradiction; For [24]a disposition to uncleannesse,[24] an unclean spirit; for [25]perversenesse,[25] a froward[e] spirit; °for sullennesse, a dumb spirit,° and for [26]inclination to godlinesse, and[26] Gods service, the Spirit of God: sometimes for any eminent ability, or extraordinary °passion, or° disease of the mind, as when great wisdome is called the spirit of wisdome; and mad men are said to be possessed with a spirit.

And men whose minds [19] the causes of things, [20] ^ not spectres but [21] spectre, that is, an [22] ^ especially in Holy Scripture, [23] a contentious man [24] an unclean man, [25] a perverse man, [26] him who has disposed himself to Iuxta sensum autem vulgi, non totum Vniversum pro Corpore haberi solet, sed partes ejus illae tantùm quas agere in se ipsos aut Tactu sentiunt, quando resistunt, aut Visu, quando prospectum Impediunt. Itaque in Sermone vulgi Aer & Substantiae Aeriae, non habentur pro Corporibus, sed (quoties ab illis aliquid patiuntur) Ventus & Spiritus dicitur ut Spiritus Vitalis & Spiritus Animalis. Quod autem attinet ad Idola Cerebri, sive Phantasmata, quae videntur & non sunt, qualia in Speculis vel Somniis, vel etiam aliquando per Cerebri intemperiem vigilantibus apparent, Spectra sunt, & (quod Apostolus Vniversaliter de Idolis dicit) Nihil.[c] Nihil, inquam, omnino ibi ubi videntur esse, neque in Cerebro ipso aliud quam tumultus ortus ab Organorum agitatione. Homines autem quorum animi aliis cogitationibus occupati, rerum causas non inquirunt, nesciunt, quomodo vocanda sint, & proinde facile persuaderi possunt ab illis, quorum Scientiam reverentur, ut vocent illa, non Spectra, sed Corpora; putentque compacta esse ex Aëre per Potentiam aliquam Supernaturalem; etiam persuaderi possunt alii, quod sunt Spiritus; propterea, quòd in loco ubi videntur esse, Tactu percipere nihil possunt. Propria ergo significatio Spiritus in Sermone vulgi, aut Corpus subtile, [184] fluidum, & invisibile est, aut Spectrum, id est Idolum seu Phantasma. Significationes autem Metaphoricae, praesertim in Scriptura Sacra, multae sunt. Sumitur enim aliquando pro Dispositione sive Inclinatione; ut quando dicimus Spiritum contradictionis, Spiritum immundum perversum, Spiritum Dei, pro contentioso, pro immundo, pro perverso homine, pro eo qui se disposuit ad serviendum Deo. Aliquando etiam accipitur pro eminente qualibet facultate, vel etiam pro morbo animi insolito; ut ubi Egregia Sapientia appellatur Spiritus Sapientiae; & ubi homines mente capti Spiritu dicuntur possideri.

[a] = insubstantial images (OED, 'idol', n., 5, 6). [b] = while awake (OED, 'wake', v., 1).
[c] 1 Cor. 8: 4. [d] = challenge, find fault with (OED, 'control', v., 3). (Note also that in the following phrase, 'contradiction' has the general sense of 'speaking against'.)
[e] = perverse, disposed to go against what is commanded (OED, 'froward', a., adv., prep., 1).

Other signification of Spirit I find no where any[27]; and where none of these can satisfie [28]the sense of that word[28] in Scripture, the place [29]falleth not under[29] humane Understanding; [30]and our Faith therein consisteth not in our Opinion, but in our Submission; as in all places where God is said to be a Spirit; or where by the Spirit of God, is meant God himselfe.[30] For the nature of God is incomprehensible; °that is to say, we understand nothing of what he is, but only that he is;° and therefore the Attributes we give him, [31]are not to tell one another, what he is, nor to signifie our opinion of his Nature, but our desire to honor him with such names as we conceive most honorable amongst our selves.[31]

The Spirit of God taken in the Scripture sometimes for a Wind, or Breath.

Gen. 1. 2. The Spirit of God moved upon the face of the Waters. Here if by the Spirit of God be meant God himself, then is Motion attributed to God, and consequently Place, which [32]are intelligible only of Bodies, and not of substances incorporeall; and so the place is above our understanding, that can conceive nothing moved that changes not place, or that has not dimension; and whatsoever has dimension, is Body. But the meaning of those words is best understood by the like place,[32] Gen. 8. 1. Where, when the earth was covered with Waters, as in the beginning, God intending to abate them, [33]and again to discover[f] the dry land, useth the like words, I will bring my Spirit upon the Earth, and the waters shall be[33] diminished:[g] in which place by Spirit is understood a Wind, [34](that is an Aire or Spirit moved,) which might be called (as in the former place) the Spirit of God, because it was Gods work.[34] [209]

Secondly, for extraordinary gifts of the Vnderstanding.

Gen. 41. 38. Pharaoh calleth the Wisdome of Joseph, the Spirit of God. For Joseph having advised him to [35]look out a wise and discreet man, and to set him[35] over the land of Egypt, he saith thus, Can we find such a man as this is, [36]in whom is[36] the Spirit of God? And Exod. 28. 3. Thou shalt speak (saith God) to all that are wise hearted, whom I have filled with the Spirit of [37]Wisdome,[37] to make Aaron Garments, to consecrate him[38]. Where extraordinary [39]Understanding,[39] though but in making Garments, [40]as being the Gift of God, is called[40] the Spirit of God. The same [41] is found again, Exod. 31. 3, 4, 5, 6. and [42]35.[42] 31. And Isaiah 11. 2, 3.[i] where the Prophet speaking of the Messiah, saith, The Spirit of the Lord shall abide upon him, the Spirit of wisdome and understanding, the Spirit of counsell, and fortitude; and the Spirit of [43]the fear of the Lord.[43] Where manifestly is meant, not so many Ghosts, [44] but so many eminent graces that God would give him.

Vocabuli Spiritus Significationes in Scripturis Sacris alias non invenio. Siquidem ergo Scripturae loco alicui nulla harum significationum sufficere potest, locus ille intellectum nostrum superare existimandus est. Nec mirum, cum Natura Dei incomprehensibilis sit, & Nomina ei attribuenda sunt, non tam ad naturam ejus, quam ad honorem quem illi exhibere debemus congruentia.

Eodem sensu accipitur Spiritus, Exod. 31. ver. 3, 4, 5, 6, & 36, 31.[h] Isa. 11. 2, 3. Et requiescet super eum Spiritus Domini, Spiritus Sapientiae & Intellectus, Spiritus Consilii & Fortitudinis, Spiritus Scientiae & Pietatis; & replebit eum Spiritus Timoris Domini. [27] ^ in the Holy Scriptures [28] a passage [29] must be reckoned too high for [30] . And this is not surprising, [31] are suitable not to his nature, but to the honour which we ought to show him. [32] cannot be understood of incorporeal things. [33] brought his spirit upon the Earth, and the waters were [Vulg] [34] . Why then should it not also stand for the same thing in the aforementioned passage, chapter 1, verse 2? [35] set a wise and industrious man [36] who is full of [Vulg] [37] prudence, [Vulg] [38] ^, that he may minister unto me [AV] [39] prudence, [40] is called by God [41] ^ meaning of 'spirit' [42] 36.[h] [43] knowledge and piety; and the spirit of fear of the Lord shall fill him. [Vulg] [44] ^ or incorporeal substances, [f] = uncover (OED, 'discover', v., 1). [g] AV: 'and God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters asswaged'. Hobbes's presentation of this as a statement of future action by God has no warrant in any standard version of the biblical text. [h] Correctly: 35: 31.

[i] The passage quoted is v. 2 in AV, vv. 2–3 in Vulg.

Thirdly, for extraordinary Affections.

In the Book of Judges, an extraordinary Zeal, and Courage in the defence of Gods people, is called the Spirit of God; °as when it excited Othoniel,[j] Gideon, Jephtha, and Samson to deliver them from servitude,° Judg. 3. 10. 6. 34. 11. 29. 13. 25. 14. 6, 19. And of Saul, upon the newes of the insolence of the Ammonites towards the men of Jabesh Gilead, it is said (1 Sam. 11. 6.) that The Spirit of God came upon Saul, [45] and his Anger (or, as it is in the Latine, his Fury)[l] was kindled greatly. Where it is not probable was meant a [46]Ghost,[46] but an extraordinary Zeal to punish the cruelty of the Ammonites. In like manner by the Spirit of God, that came upon Saul, when hee was amongst the Prophets [47]that praised[47] God in Songs, and Musick (1 Sam. 19. 20.)[n] is to be understood, not a Ghost, but an unexpected and sudden zeal to [48]join with them in their devotion.[48]

Fourthly, for the gift of Prediction by Dreams and Visions.

The false Prophet Zedekiah, saith to Micaiah (1 Kings 22. 24.) [49]Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me to[49] speak to thee? Which cannot be understood of a [50]Ghost;[50] for Micaiah [51]declared before the Kings of Israel and Judah,[51] the event[p] of the battle, as from a Vision,[q] and not as from [52]a Spirit, speaking in him.[52]

[53]In the same manner it appeareth, in the Books of the Prophets, that though they spake[53] by the Spirit of God, that is to say, by a speciall [54]grace of Prediction;[54] yet their knowledge of the future, [55]was not by a Ghost within them, but by[55] some supernaturall Dream or Vision.

Fifthly, for Life.

Gen. 2. 7. It is said, God made man of the dust of the Earth, and breathed into his nostrills (spiraculum vitae)[r] the breath of life, and man was made a living soul. There the breath of life inspired by God, signifies no more, but that God gave him life; And (Job 27. 3.) as long as the Spirit of God is in my nostrils; is no more then to say, as long as I live. So in Ezek. 1. 20. the Spirit of life was in the wheels, is equivalent to, the wheels were alive. And (Ezek. 2. [56]30.)[56] [s] the Spirit entred into me, and set me on my feet, that is, I recovered my vitall strength; not that any °Ghost, or° incorporeall substance entred into, [57]and possessed his body.[57]

[45] ^ when he heard those tidings, [AV] [46] phantasm, [47] and was praising[m] [48] worship God. [49] Did the spirit of the Lord send me, and [Vulg] [50] phantasm; [51] prophesied [52] an inspiration. [53] Also in the books of the Prophets, when they prophesied [54] gift of God; [55] proceeded not from some incorporeal substance infused into them, but from [56] 3.)[s] [57] him.

In Libro Iudicum, Zelus & Fortitudo in populo Dei propugnando egregia vocatur Spiritus Dei, Iudic. 3. 10: 6. 34: 11. 29: 13. 25: 14. 6, 19: De Saule, cum nuntiaretur illi Ammonitarum in homines ex Iabesk[k] Gilead contumelia, dictum est 1. Sam. 11. 6. Quod insiluit Spiritus Domini in Saulem, cum audisset verba haec, & iratus est furor [185] ejus nimis. Intelligi autem hoc loco Phantasma, verisimile non est, sed zelum ingentem crudelitatem Ammonitarum puniendi. Similiter per Spiritum Dei qui venerat super Saulem, cum Prophetis intererat, canticis & musicâ (1 Sam. 19. 20.)[n] laudans[m] Deum, non Spectrum intelligitur, sed subitus & improvisus Dei colendi zelus.

1 Reg. 22. 24. Interrogat Michaiam, Pseudopropheta Zedekias, Mene ergo dimisit Spiritus Domini & loquutus est tibi? Intelligi autem hoc de Phantasmate non potest, quia Michaias eventum praelii, non ab Inspiratione, sed à Visione prophetaverat.[q]

Etiam in libris Prophetarum, qui per Spiritum Dei, id est per Donum Dei speciale Prophetabant, praescientia, quam habuerunt rerum futurarum, non à Substantia aliqua Incorporea sibi infusa, sed à Somnio vel Visione supernaturali profecta est.

Gen. 2. 7. Legimus, Fecit Deus hominem ex pulvere terrae, & spiravit in nares ejus spiraculum vitae, & factus est homo in animam viventem. Vbi per spiraculum vitae significatur hoc tantum, Deum illi dedisse vitam. [j] = Othonihel [Vulg], Othniel [AV] [k] 'Iabesk', the spelling which occurs in both 68 and 70, is unusual; the word is 'Iabes' in Vulg, and 'Jabeschum' in Beza. Possibly Hobbes gave the English (AV) form 'Jabesh', and the final letter was misread by the compositor.

[l] Hobbes cites Vulg: 'furor' (Junius–Tremellius: 'ira').

[m] The Latin has 'laudans', which means that Saul was praising; this may be a grammatical error for 'laudantibus', which would mean (as in the English) that the prophets were praising.

[n] Correctly: 19: 23; but the reference to songs and music also suggests a conflation with 1 Sam. 10: 5–11. [p] = outcome (OED, 'event', n., 3.a). [q] 1 Kgs 22: 17.

[r] Hobbes cites Vulg here; 'the breath of life' is 'halitum vitae' in Junius–Tremellius.

[s] Correctly: Ezek. 2: 2, or 3: 24.

Sixtly, for a subordination to authority.

In the 11 chap. of Numbers. verse 17. I will take (saith God) of[58] the Spirit, which is upon thee, and will put it upon them, and they shall[58] bear [210] the burthen of the people with thee; that is, upon the seventy Elders: whereupon two of the seventy are said to prophecy in the campe; [59]of whom some complained, and Joshua desired Moses[59] to forbid them; which Moses would not doe.[t] Whereby it appears; that Joshua knew not they had received authority [60]so to do, and prophecyed according to the mind of Moses, that is to say, by a Spirit, or Authority subordinate to his own.[60]

In the like sense we read (Deut. 34. 9.) that Joshua [61] was full of the Spirit of wisdome, because Moses had laid his hands upon him[62]: that is, because [63]he was ordained by Moses, to prosecute the work hee had himselfe begun, (namely, the bringing of Gods people into the promised land), but prevented by death, could not finish.[63]

°In the like sense it is said,° (Rom. 8. 9.) If any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his: not meaning thereby the [64]Ghost[64] of Christ, but °a submission to° his Doctrine. As also (1 John 4. 2.) Hereby you shall know the Spirit of God; Every Spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God; [65]by which is meant the Spirit of unfained Christianity, or submission to that main Article of Christian faith,[65] that Jesus is the Christ; °which cannot be interpreted of a Ghost.°

Likewise these words (Luke 4. 1.) And Jesus full of the Holy Ghost [66](that is, as it is exprest, Mat. 4. 1. and Mar. 1. 12. of the Holy Spirit,) may[66] be understood, for Zeal to doe the work for which hee was sent by [67]God the Father: but to interpret it of a Ghost, is to say, that God himselfe (for so our Saviour was,) was filled with God; which is very unproper, and unsignificant. How we came to translate Spirits, by the word Ghosts, which signifieth nothing, neither in heaven, nor earth, but the Imaginary inhabitants of mans brain, I examine not: but this I say, the word Spirit in the text signifieth no such thing; but either properly a reall substance, or Metaphorically, some extraordinary ability or affection of the Mind, or of the Body.[67]

18 by which] om. MS

[58] your spirit, and shall give it to them, so that they may [Vulg] [59] and Joshua told Moses about this, and warned him [60] to prophesy from Moses. Therefore 'spirit' in this passage stands for authority.

[61] ^ the son of Nun [Vulg, AV] [62] ^, and the children of Israel obeyed him [Vulg]

[63] Joshua received from Moses authority to rule the people of Israel after him. [64] phantasm

[65] 'spirit' in this passage means not an incorporeal substance,[u] but the Christian faith, or an unfeigned profession of this article: [66] may easily

[67] his Father; but to say of Christ that he was filled with an incorporeal substance is rather awkward. Thus far, 'spirit' means not an incorporeal substance, but either a real substance in the proper sense, or (metaphorically) some extraordinary grace.

Num. 11. 17. Auferam de Spiritu tuo, tradamque eis, ut sustentent tecum onus populi, & non tu solus graveris; nempe Septuaginta Senioribus. Tunc vero duo ex illis septuaginta, in castris dicuntur prophetasse; quod cum Iosua Mosi narrâsset, monuissetque ne permitteret, Moses non consensit.[t] Constat hinc nesciisse Iosuam, quod per Authoritatem Mosis prophetarent. Spiritus ergo hoc loco, pro Authoritate ponitur. Eodem sensu legitur Deut. 34. 9. Ioshua verò filius Nun repletus est Spiritu Sapientiae, quia Moses posuit super eum manus suas; & obiederunt ei filii Israël. Accepit enim Ioshua à Mose Authoritatem regendi (post seipsum) populum Israëliticum.

Rom. 8. 9. Nisi quis Spiritum Christi habeat, non est ejus. Vbi non intelligitur Phantasma Christi, sed Doctrina Christiana. Item 1 Iohan. 4. 2. In hoc cognoscitur Spiritus Dei. Omnis Spiritus qui confitetur Iesum Christum in carne venisse, ex Deo est. Spiritus hoc loco significat Fidem Christianam, sive confessionem non fictam, articuli hujus Iesus est Christus; non intelligitur pro Substantia Incorporea.[u]

Verba illa (Luc. 4. 1.) Iesus plenus Spiritu Sancto, pro zelo perficiendi opus, quod ipsi à Patre suo mandatum erat, intelligere facile [186] est; sed de Christo dicere, quod plenus erat Substantia Incorporea duriusculum est. Spiritus hactenus non Substantiam incorpoream, sed vel Substantiam, propriè dictam & realem significat vel Metaphoricè gratiam aliquam excellentem.

9 seipsum] illum 70 14–15 non intelligitur pro Substantia Incorporea this edn.] non pro Substantia Incorporea 68; non Substantiam Incorpoream 70 20 significat vel 70] significat 68

[t] Num. 11: 26–9. [u] The Latin in 68 is defective, though the general sense is clear; 70 remedies the defect, but the 'pro' construction in 68 suggests that some verb such as 'intelligitur', ('it is understood'), supplied here, had gone missing. (Cf. the following sentence: 'pro zelo . . . intelligere.')

Seventhly, for Aeriall Bodies.

The Disciples of Christ, seeing him walking upon the sea, (Mat. 14. 26. and Marke 6. 49.) [68]supposed him to be[68] a Spirit, meaning thereby °an Aeriall Body, and° not a Phantasme: for it is said, they all saw him; which [69]cannot be understood of the delusions of the brain, (which are not common to many at once, as visible Bodies are; but singular, because of the differences of Fancies), but of Bodies only. In like manner, where he was taken for a Spirit, by the same Apostles (Luke 24. 37.): So also (Acts 12. 15.) when St. Peter was delivered out of Prison, it would not be beleeved; but when the Maid said he was at the dore, they said it was his Angel; by which must be meant a corporeall substance, or we must say, the Disciples themselves did follow the common opinion of both Jews and Gentiles, that some such apparitions were not Imaginary, but Reall; and such as needed not the fancy of man for their Existence: These the Jews called Spirits, and Angels, Good or Bad; as the Greeks called the same by the name of Daemons. And some such apparitions may be [211] reall, and substantiall; that is to say, subtile Bodies, which God can form by the same power, by which he formed all things, and make use of, as of Ministers, and Messengers (that is to say, Angels) to declare his will, and execute the same when he pleaseth, in extraordinary and supernaturall manner. But when hee hath so formed them they are Substances, endued with dimensions, and take up roome, and can be moved from place to place, which is peculiar to Bodies; and therefore are not Ghosts incorporeall, that is to say, Ghosts that are in no place; that is to say, that are no where; that is to say, that seeming to be somewhat, are nothing. But if Corporeall be taken in the most vulgar manner, for such Substances as are perceptible by our externall Senses; then is Substance Incorporeall, a thing not Imaginary, but Reall; namely, a thin Substance Invisible, but that hath the same dimensions that are in grosser Bodies.[69]

[68] said he was

[69] is foreign to the nature of phantasms. However, they could perhaps have believed that he was a body compacted out of air. Which can also be said of those who, when Peter was delivered from prison by God, said he was his angel; for there is absolutely no mention of incorporeal substances in the Jewish Scriptures, but that whole doctrine originated with the Greek philosophers. Nevertheless we should not deny that there may be some substantial apparitions. (For what is there that God cannot bring about?) Nor that there are angels (whenever God makes use of them); however, they have dimensions, and indeed since they are finite, they occupy space, and can move; but they are not incorporeal, that is, they are not nowhere, and, since they are seen to be something, they are not nothing.

Discipuli Christi cum illum viderent (Matth. 14. 26. & Marc. 6. 49.) ambulantem super mare, dixerunt Spiritum esse; non quod eum Phantasma esse existimarent, dictum enim est; quod viderunt illum omnes; id quod à natura Phantasmatum alienum est. Potuerant tamen forte credere, quod esset ex Aëre compactum Corpus. Quod de illis quoque dici potest qui Petrum è carcere à Deo liberatum, dixerunt esse Angelum ejus; nam de Substantiis Incorporeis in Scripturis Iudaeorum mentio omnino nulla est; sed tota illa Doctrina à Philosophis Graecis originem ducit. Negandum tamen non est, quin Apparitiones aliquae Substantiales esse possint. (Quid enim est quod Deus perficere non possit?) Neque quin sint (quoties eorum opera Deus utitur) Angeli; habent tamen dimensiones, & siquidem finiti sunt, locum implent & moveri possunt, sed non Incorporei, id est, non sunt nullibi, nec cum videantur esse aliquid, sunt nihil.

Angel what. By the name of ANGEL, [70]is signified generally,[70] a Messenger; and most often, [71] a Messenger of God: And by a Messenger of God, is signified, any thing [72]that makes known his extraordinary Presence; that is to say, the extraordinary manifestation of his power,[72] especially by a Dream, or Vision.

Concerning the creation of Angels, there is nothing delivered in the Scriptures[73]. That they are Spirits, is often [74]repeated: but by the name of Spirit, is signified both in Scripture, and vulgarly, both amongst Jews, and Gentiles,[74] sometimes thin Bodies; as the Aire, the Wind, the Spirits °Vitall, and Animall,° of living creatures; and sometimes [75]the Images that rise in the fancy in Dreams, and Visions; which are not reall Substances,[75] nor last any longer then the Dream, or Vision they appear in; which [76] Apparitions, though no [77]reall Substances, but Accidents of the brain;[77] yet when God raiseth them supernaturally, to signifie his Will, they are not unproperly termed Gods Messengers, that is to say, his Angels.

And as the Gentiles did [78]vulgarly conceive the Imagery of the brain, for things really subsistent without them, and not dependent on the fancy;[78] and out of them framed their opinions of Daemons, Good and Evill; [79]which because they seemed to subsist really, they called Substances; and because they could not feel them with their hands, Incorporeall: so also the Jews upon the same ground, without any thing in the Old Testament that constrained them thereunto,[79] had generally an opinion, (except the °sect of the° Sadduces,)[w] that those apparitions [80](which it pleased God sometimes to produce in the fancie of men, for his own service, and therefore called them his Angels) were substances, not[80] dependent on the fancy, but permanent creatures of God; [81]whereof those which they thought were good to them, they esteemed the Angels of God, and those they thought would hurt them, they called Evill Angels, or Evill Spirits;[81] such as was the Spirit of Python,[x] and the Spirits of Mad-men, of Lunatiques, and Epileptiques: For [82]they esteemed such as were troubled with such diseases,[82] Daemoniaques.

23 were] to be MS 28 Mad-men] Mad-man B

[70] which is a Greek word, both sacred and prophane writers mean [71] ^ in the Holy Scriptures,
[72] by means of which God supernaturally makes known his presence, or his extraordinary power,
[73] ^ in explicit terms. Therefore ecclesiastical writers disagree about the nature of angels. Some of the most eminent of the ancient Fathers thought they were corporeal, and some others that they were incorporeal[v] [74] said in the Scriptures; but spirits were considered by both Jewish and Greek writers to be
[75] phantasms, which are not real, [76] ^ phantasms or [77] substances, but accidents of the organs of sense, [78] consider the phantasms of dreamers to be real substances,
[79] so also the Jews, without the authority of the Old Testament, [80] were angels, not at all
[81] and, like the Greeks, they thought that some of them were good, and angels of God, and that others were evil, [82] the Jews regarded such people as Angelus, vox Graeca, apud scriptores tam sacros quam prophanos, significat Nuncium; in Scripturis autem Sacris, plerumque Nuncium à Deo. Nuncius autem à Deo, est omne id, per quod Deus supernaturaliter praesentiam, sive Potentiam ejus extraordinariam manifestam facit, praecipuè vero in Somniis & Visionibus.

De Creatione Angelorum in Scripturis Sacris disertis verbis nihil traditur. Scriptores igitur Ecclesiastici de Naturâ Angelorum dissentiunt. Veterum autem Patrum aliquot eminentissimi corporeos eos esse putaverunt, alii nonnulli Incorporeos.[v] Vocantur passim in Scripturis Spiritus. Sed Spiritus tum à Scriptoribus Iudaeis tum Graecis, modo corpora subtilia, ut Aër, Ventus, Spiritusque animalium, modo Phantasmata existimantur; quae nec realia sunt, nec diutius permanent quam Somnium & Visio in qua apparent. Quae Phantasmata, sive Apparitiones, etsi substantiae non sint, sed Accidentia Organorum sentiendi; quando tamen à Deo ad Voluntatem suam significandam, supernaturaliter producuntur, non impropriè Nuncii à Deo, id est Angeli appellantur.

Et sicut Gentes Phantasmata somniantium Substantias reales esse existimaverunt, & inde doctrinam suam de Bonis & Malis Daemonibus deduxerunt: ita etiam Iudaei sine Veteris Testamenti Authoritate, tenuerunt ferè omnes (exceptis Sadducaeis)[w] apparitiones illas esse Angelos; nec dependere omninò à Phantasiâ, sed esse Dei creaturas [187] permanentes; &, ut Graeci, alios eorum Bonos esse, & Angelos Dei; alios Malos, qualis erat Spiritus Python,[x] & Spiritus hominis mente capti vel Lunatici & Epileptici. Nam hujusmodi homines apud Iudaeos habebantur pro Daemoniacis.

[v] That angels were incorporeal was the standard view; but John Damascene argued that while they were immaterial in comparison with man, they were material in comparison with God (Exposition of the Orthodox Faith, II.3, PG xciv, col. 868). [w] Acts 23: 8.

[x] In Greek myth, Python was the serpent of the oracle of Delphi; in some versions of the myth, Python was killed and replaced by Apollo, but the priestesses of the oracle were named after her, and were said to speak by her spirit.

But if we consider the places of the Old Testament where Angels are mentioned, we shall find, that in most of them, [83]there can nothing [212] else be understood by the word Angel, but[83] some image raised 84[84] in the fancy, to signifie the presence of God in the execution of some supernaturall work; °and therefore in the rest, where their nature is not exprest, it may be understood in the same manner.°

For we read Gen. 16. that the same apparition is called, not onely an Angel, but God; where that which (verse 7.) is called the Angel of the Lord, in the tenth verse, saith to Agar,[y] I will multiply thy seed exceedingly; [85]that is, speaketh in the person of God. Neither was this apparition a Fancy figured, but a Voice.[85] By which it is manifest, that Angel signifieth there, nothing but [86]God himself, that caused Agar supernaturally to apprehend a voice from heaven; or rather, nothing else but a Voice supernaturall, testifying[86] Gods speciall presence there. °Why therefore may not° the Angels that appeared to Lot, and are called Gen. 19. 13.[z] Men; and to whom, though they were two, Lot speaketh (ver. 18.) as but to one, and [87]that one, as God, (for the words are, Lot said unto them, Oh not so my Lord) be understood of images of men, supernaturally formed in the Fancy; as well as before by Angel was understood a fancyed Voice? When the Angel called to Abraham out of heaven, to stay his hand (Gen. 22. 11.) from slaying Isaac, there was no Apparition, but[87] a Voice; which neverthelesse was called properly enough [88]a Messenger, or Angel of God, because it declared Gods will supernaturally, and saves the labour of supposing any permanent Ghosts.[88] The Angels which Jacob saw [89] on the Ladder of Heaven (Gen. 28. 12.) were a Vision of his sleep; therefore onely Fancy, and a Dream; yet being supernaturall, and signs of Gods [90]speciall presence, those apparitions are not improperly called[90] Angels. The same is to be understood (Gen. 31. 11.) where Jacob saith thus, The Angel of the Lord appeared to mee in my sleep.[aa] °For an apparition made to a man in his sleep, is that which all men call a Dreame, whether such Dreame be naturall, or supernaturall:° and that which there Jacob calleth an Angel, [91]was God himselfe;[91] for the same Angel saith (verse 13.) I am the God of Bethel. Si loca Testamenti Veteris ubi Angelorum mentio fit, consideremus, inveniemus, plerumque si non semper per Angelum Ideam aliquam, in Phantasiâ excitatam à Deo ad significandam praesentiam Divinam in operatione ejus aliqua supernaturali denotari.

Legimus Gen. 16. Apparitionem unam & eandem, & Angelum vocari & Deum, nam (vers. 7.) Angelus Domini vocatur; sed vers. 10. dicit idem Angelus ad Agar,[y] semen tuum multiplicabo valdè, quae verba dici nisi à Deo non possunt. Constat ergo Angelum nihil aliud hoc loco significare, praeter Apparitionem Divinam, per vocem à Coelo praesentiam Dei testantem extraordinariam. Angeli, qui apparuerunt Lot, & vocantur Gen. 19. 13.[z] Viri; & quibus, cum essent duo, loquitur Lot, ut ad unum, & appellat Dominum, imagines erant in Phantasia ejus formatae à Deo, non minus quam apparitio vocatur Angelus, quae facta est ad Agar per Vocem. Angelus, qui apparuit Abrahamo (Gen. 22. 11.) sacrificaturo filium suum Isaac, Vox erat; attamen satis propriè Angelus appellatus est, ut qua nunciatum est illi ne filium interficeret. Angeli, quos vidit Iacob ascendentes & descendentes de Coelo per scalam (Gen. 28. 12.) in somno apparuerunt. Fuerunt ergo Somnium & Phantasma; quia tamen supernaturalia erant, & signa praesentiae Divinae, etiam Angeli. Idem intelligitur ubi Iacob (Gen. 31. 11.) sic dicit, Angelus Domini apparuit mihi in somno.[aa] Illum autem quem hoc loco Iacob appellat Angelum, ipse se appellat Deum, dicens (vers. 13.) Ego sum Deus Bethel. Nec tamen hinc colligendum est Deum aut à Somniantibus aut à Vigilantibus videri posse.

[83] if not in every case, 'angel' means [84] by God [85] – words that can be said only by God.
[86] a divine apparition, testifying by a voice from Heaven
[87] calls him 'Lord', were images formed by God in his fancy, just as that apparition which was made to Agar by means of a voice is called an angel. The angel who appeared to Abraham (Gen. 22: 11) when he was about to sacrifice his son Isaac was [88] an angel, because it was by its means that it was announced to him that he should not kill his son.
[89] ^ ascending and descending [90] presence, they were [91] calls himself God;
[92] ^ Yet it should not be gathered from this that God can be seen either by people who are dreaming, or by people who are awake.

[y] = Hagar (AV) ('Agar' in Vulg). [z] Correctly: 19: 8, 10, or 12. [aa] This version of the text (in English and Latin) appears to be Hobbes's own. Vulg has 'dixitque angelus Dei ad me in somnis' ('and the angel of God said to me in my slumbers'); AV has 'And the angel of God spake unto me in a dream'.

Also (Exod. 14. 9.)[ab] the Angel that went before the Army of Israel [93]to[93] the Red Sea, and then came behind it, is [94] (verse 19.)[ac] the Lord himself; and he appeared not in the form of a °beautifull° man, but in form (by day) of a pillar of cloud, and (by night) in form of a pillar of fire; and yet this [95]Pillar was all the apparition, and[95] Angel promised to Moses °(Exod. 14. 9.)°[ad] for the Armies guide: For this °cloudy° pillar, is said, to have descended, and stood at the dore of the Tabernacle, and to have talked with Moses.[ae]

There you see Motion, and Speech, which are commonly attributed to Angels, attributed to a Cloud, because the Cloud served as a sign of Gods presence; and was no lesse an Angel, then if it had had the form of a °Man, or° Child of never so great beauty; or Wings, as usually they are painted, °for the false instruction of common people.° For it is not the shape; but their use, that makes them Angels. But their use is to be significations of Gods presence in [96]supernaturall[96] [213] operations; As when Moses (Exod. 33. 14.) had desired God to goe along with the [97] Campe, (as he had done alwaies before the [98]making[98] of the Golden Calfe,) God did not answer, °I will goe, nor° I will send an Angell °in my stead;° but thus, my presence shall goe with thee. [99]

To mention all the places of the Old Testament where the name of Angel is found, would be too long. Therefore to comprehend them all at once, I say, there is no text in [100]that part of the Old Testament, which the Church of England holdeth for Canonicall;[100] from which we can conclude, there is, [101]or hath been created, any permanent[101] thing (understood by the name of Spirit or Angel,) that hath not quantity; and that may not be, by the understanding °divided; that is to say,° considered by parts; so as one part may bee in one place, and the next part in the next place to it; and, in summe, which is not (taking Body for that, which is [102]some what, or some where) Corporeall; but in every place, the sense will bear the interpretation of Angel, for[102] Messenger; as John Baptist is called an Angel, and Christ the Angel of the Covenant;[ag] and [103]as[103] (according to the same Analogy) the Dove,[ai] and the Fiery Tongues[104], [aj] in that they were signes of Gods °speciall° presence, might also [105] be called Angels. Though we find in Daniel [106] two names of Angels, Gabriel, and Michael;[ak] [107]yet it is cleer out of the text it selfe, (Dan. 12. 1.) that by Michael is meant Christ, not as an Angel, but as a Prince: and that Gabriel (as the like apparitions made to other holy men in their sleep) was nothing but a supernaturall phantasme, by which it seemed to Daniel, in his dream, that two Saints being in talke, one of them said to the other,[107] Gabriel, let us make this man understand his Vision:[al] For God needeth not, to distinguish his Celestiall servants by names, which are [108] usefull onely to the short memories of Mortalls. Nor in the New Testament is there any place, out of which it can be proved, that Angels °(except when they are put for such men, as God hath made the Messengers, and Ministers of his word, or works)° are things permanent, and withall incorporeall. That [109]they are[109] permanent, may bee gathered from the words of our Saviour °himselfe, (Mat. 25. 41.) where he saith, it shall be said to the wicked in the last day,° Go ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the Devil and his Angels: which place is manifest for the permanence of Evill Angels, [110](unlesse wee might think the name of Devill and his Angels may be understood of the Churches Adversaries and their Ministers;) but then it is repugnant to their Immateriality; because Everlasting[110] fire is no punishment to impatible[am] substances, such as are all things Incorporeall. °Angels therefore are not thence proved to be Incorporeall. In like manner where St. Paul sayes° (1 Cor. 6. 3.) Know ye not that wee shall judge the Angels? And (2 Pet. 2. 4.) For if God spared not the Angels that sinned, but [111]cast them down into hell.[111] And (Iude 1, 6.) And the Angels that kept not their first estate, but left their owne habitation, hee hath reserved in everlasting chaines under darknesse unto the Iudgment of the [112]last[112] day; though it prove the Permanence of Angelicall nature, it confirmeth also their Materiality. And (Mat. 22. 30.) In the resurrection men [214] doe neither marry, nor [113]give[113] in marriage, but are as the Angels of God in heaven: [114]but[114] in the resurrection men shall be Permanent, and not Incorporeall; so therefore also are the Angels. Neque in Testamento Novo locus ullus invenitur, unde probari possit, Angelos res esse permanentes & simul Incorporeas. Quod quidem Angeli aliqui Substantiae sint, & permanentes, colligi potest ex verbis Servatoris nostri, Ite maledicti in ignem aeternum, qui paratus est Diabolo & Angelis ejus; qui locus si malorum Angelorum permanentiam probat, corporeitatem unâ probat. Ignis enim rerum Incorporearum, id est impatibilium paena non est. 1 Cor. 6. 3. Nescitis quoniam Angelos Iudicabimus. 2 Petr. 2. 4. Si enim Deus Angelis peccantibus non pepercit, sed rudentibus inferni detractos in Tartarum tradidit cruciandos in judicium reservari. Iud. 1. 6. Angelos verò, qui non servaverunt suum principatum, sed dereliquerunt suum domicilium, in judicium magni diei, vinculis aeternis sub caligine reservavit. Quae verba etsi naturam [189] Angelicam permanentem esse evincunt, materialitatem simul probant. Item (Matth. 22. 30.) In resurrectione neque nubent, neque nubentur, sed erunt sicut Angeli Dei in Coelis; unde colligitur, quod sicut homines, ita quoque Angeli in resurrectione erunt non incorporei, sed permanentes. Angeli itaque neque ex Veteri neque ex Novo Testamento probantur esse Incorporei.

°There be divers other places out of which may be drawn the like conclusion. To men that understand the signification of these words, Substance, and Incorporeall; as Incorporeall is taken not for subtile body, but for not Body, they imply a contradiction: insomuch as to say, an Angel, or Spirit is (in that sense) an Incorporeall Substance, is to say in effect, there is no Angel nor Spirit at all. Considering therefore the Signification of the word Angel in the Old Testament, and the nature of Dreams and Visions that happen to men by the ordinary way of Nature; I was enclined to this opinion, that Angels were nothing but supernaturall apparitions of the Fancy, raised by the speciall and extraordinary operation of God, thereby to make his presence and commandements known to mankind, and chiefly to his own people. But the many places of the New Testament, and our Saviours own words, and in such texts, wherein is no suspicion of corruption of the Scripture, have extorted from my feeble Reason, an acknowledgment, and beleef, that there be also Angels substantiall, and permanent. But to beleeve they be in no place, that is to say, no where, that is to say, nothing, as they (though indirectly) say, that will have them Incorporeall, cannot by Scripture bee evinced.°

Inspiration what.

On the signification of the word Spirit, dependeth that of the word INSPIRATION; which [116]must either be taken properly; and then it is nothing but the blowing into a man some thin and subtile aire, or wind,[116] in such manner as a man filleth a bladder with his breath; [117]or if Spirits be not corporeall, but have their existence only in the fancy, it is nothing but the blowing in of a Phantasme; which is improper to say, and impossible; for Phantasmes are not, but only seem to be somewhat.[117] That word therefore is used in the Scripture metaphorically onely: As (Gen. 2. 7.) where it is said, that God inspired into man the breath of life, [118]no more is meant, then that God gave unto him vitall motion. For we are not to think that God made first a living breath, and then blew it into Adam after he was made, whether that breath were reall, or seeming; but only as it is (Acts 17. 25.) that he gave him life, and breath; that is, made him a living creature.[118] And where it is said

4 they imply] {it added by TH} implyes MS 18–19 marg. om. MS 22 fancy,] fancy {, then added by TH} MS 26 no more is meant,] is no more MS

[116] , taken properly, is the blowing of some subtle body, such as air, into some place where it was not before, [117] which cannot be understood of incorporeal things.

Significatio vocis Inspiratio dependet à voce Spiritus. Significat autem propriè inflationem corporis alicujus subtilis, ut Aëris in locum aliquem ubi antè non erat; eo modo quo quis spirando vesicam inflat; id quod de rebus Incorporeis intelligi non potest. Vox ergo Inspiratio in Scripturis Sacris Metaphoricè tantum usurpatur: Vt (Genes. 2. 7.) ubi Deus dicitur inspirasse in Adamum Spiraculum vitae, per Inspirationem intelligitur vivificatio. Et

(2 Tim. 3. 16.) all Scripture is given by Inspiration from God, [119]speaking there of the Scripture of the Old Testament, it is an easie metaphor, to signifie, that God enclined the spirit or mind of those Writers,[119] to write that which should be usefull, in teaching, reproving, correcting, and instructing men in the way [120]of righteous living.[120] But where St. Peter (2 Pet. 1. 21.) saith, that Prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but the holy men of God spake as they were [121]moved[121] by the Holy Spirit, by the Holy Spirit, is meant the voice of God in a Dream, or Vision supernaturall, [122]which is not Inspiration:[122] Nor when our Saviour breathing on his Disciples, said, Receive the Holy Spirit,[ao] was that Breath [123]the Spirit, but a sign of the spirituall graces he gave unto them. And though it be [215] said of many, and[123] of our Saviour himself, that he was full of the Holy Spirit;[ap] [124]yet that Fulnesse is not to be understood for Infusion of the substance of God, but for accumulation of his gifts, such as are the gift of sanctity of life, of tongues, and the like, whether attained supernaturally, or by study and industry; for in all cases they are the gifts of God. So likewise[124] where God sayes (Joel 2. 28.) I will powre out my Spirit upon all flesh, and your Sons and your Daughters shall prophecy, your Old men shall dream Dreams, and your Young men shall see Visions, wee are not to understand it in the proper sense, as if his Spirit were like water, subject to effusion, [125]or infusion; but as if God had promised to give them Propheticall Dreams, and Visions. For the proper use of the word infused, in speaking of the graces of God, is an abuse of it; for those graces are Vertues, not Bodies to be carryed hither and thither, and to be powred into men, as into barrels.[125]

[126]In the same manner, to take Inspiration in the proper sense, as to say that Good Spirits[126] entred into men to make them prophecy, or Evill Spirits into those that became Phrenetique,[aq] Lunatique, or Epileptique, is not to take the word in the sense of the Scripture; for the Spirit [127]there is taken for the power of God, working by causes[127] to us unknown. As also (Acts 2. 2.) the wind, that is there said to fill the house wherein the Apostles were assembled on the day of Pentecost, is not to be understood for the Holy Spirit, which is the [128]Deity[128] it self; but for an Externall sign of Gods [129]speciall[129] working on their hearts, to effect in them the °internall graces, and° holy vertues °hee thought° requisite for the performance of their Apostleship.

9 Nor] {Nor del. by TH} MS 10 was that Breath] that breath was not MS 16 powre] not power B 22 graces] grace B 24 as this edn.; {or corr. to as by TH} MS] or H, B

[119] it is the same as if he had said that God, by his grace, inclined the spirits or minds of the prophets [120] to salvation. [121] inspired [Vulg] [122] for that is how God spoke to the prophets, not by breathing. [123] what he meant thereby, but divine grace. Again, when it is said

(2 Timoth. 3. 16.) Omnis Scriptura data est per Inspirationem Divinam. Idem est ac si dixisset, Deus Spiritus sive Animos Prophetarum per suam gratiam disposuit, ad scribendum quae utilia futura essent[an] ad Doctrinam, reprehensionem, correctionem, & instructionem in via ad salutem. Ubi autem S. Petrus (2 Petr. 1. 21.) sic dicit: Non enim voluntate humana allata est aliquando Prophetia, sed Spiritu Sancto Inspirati, loquuti sunt Sancti Dei homines, per Spiritum Sanctum intelligit vocem Dei in Somnio vel Visione supernaturali; sic enim loquutus est Deus ad Prophetas, non autem spirando. Item quando Servator noster spiravit in Discipulos suos dicens, Accipite Spiritum Sanctum,[ao] non voluit halitum suum, sed Divinam gratiam intelligi. Item Servator noster ipse, quando dicitur plenus Spiritu Sancto,[ap] non intelligitur Substantiam Divinam, eo tempore infusam esse (nam Deus erat Christus ab aeterno) sed Divinas gratias in humanitatem ejus accumulatas. Postremò, Ioël. 2. 28. cum dicit Deus Effundam de Spiritu meo super omnem carnem, & prophetabunt filii vestri, & filiae vestrae, senes vestri Somnia somniabunt, & juvenes vestri Visiones videbunt. Non intelligit juxta sensum literalem Spiritum effundi posse quasi aquam, sed intelligit ipsa Somnia & Visiones supernaturales.

Inspirationem igitur intelligere, tanquam Spiritus Dei in illos intraret propriè dictus, per quem prophetarent, vel Spiritus mali intrarent in Phreneticos, Lunaticos, vel Epilepticos, non est verbo illo uti secundum Sensum Scripturae Sacrae. Nam Spiritus Dei pro gratia sive Potentia Dei sumitur operantis per modum nobis ignotum. Etiam (Actor. 2. 2.) Ventus qui dicitur domum illam implêsse ubi congregati erant Apostoli in die Pentecostes, non ita intelligendus est, ac si Spiritus Sanctus, id est Substantia Divina ipsa Ventus [190] esset, sed pro signo externo praesentiae Divinae, efficientis in illis virtutes illas Sacras, quae ad functionem Apostolicam erant necessariae.

[124] it is not meant that the divine substance was at that time infused into him (for Christ was God from eternity), but rather that divine graces were accumulated in his humanity. Finally,
[125] but as referring to those dreams themselves and those supernatural visions.
[126] Therefore to take 'inspiration' as meaning that the Spirit of God (in the proper sense)
[127] of God is taken for the grace or power of God, working in a way that is [128] divine substance
[129] presence,

[an] The Latin in 68 and 70 is defective: it could be taken to mean 'which things [sc. the spirits or minds of the prophets] would be useful . . .', but comparison with the English shows that some such phrase as 'ad scribendum' ('to write'), supplied here, is required. [ao] John 20: 22.

Of the Signification in Scripture of KINGDOME OF GOD, of HOLY, SACRED, and SACRAMENT.

The Kingdom of God taken by Divines Metaphorically, but in the Scriptures properly.

The Kingdome of God in the Writings of Divines, and specially in Sermons, and Treatises of Devotion, is taken °most commonly° for Eternall Felicity, [1] after this life, in the Highest Heaven, which they also call the Kingdome of Glory; and sometimes for (the earnest[a] of that felicity) [2]Sanctification,[2] which they terme the Kingdome of Grace;[b] but never for [3]the Monarchy, that is to say, the Soveraign Power of God over any Subjects acquired by their own consent, which is the proper[3] signification of Kingdome.

To the contrary, I find the KINGDOME OF GOD, to signifie in most places of Scripture, a Kingdome properly so named, constituted by the [4]Votes[4] of the People of Israel [5]in peculiar manner; wherein they[5] chose God for their King by Covenant [6]made with him, upon Gods promising them the possession of the land of Canaan; and but seldom metaphorically; and then it is taken for Dominion over sinne; (and only in the New Testament;) because such a Dominion as that, every Subject shall have in the Kingdome of God, and without prejudice to the Soveraign.[6]

From the very Creation, God not only reigned over all men naturally [7]by his might; but also had peculiar Subjects,[7] whom he commanded by a Voice, as one man speaketh to another. In which manner he reigned over Adam, and gave him commandement to abstaine from the tree of cognizance of Good and Evill; which when he obeyed not, but [8]tasting thereof, took upon him to be as God, judging[8] between Good and Evill, not by his Creators commandement, but by his own sense, his punishment was a privation of [9]the estate of Eternall life, wherein God had at first created him:[d] And afterwards God punished his posterity, for their vices, all but eight persons, with an universall deluge;[e] And in these eight did consist the then Kingdom of God.[9]

CAPVT XXXV.

De significatione in Scripturis Sacris vocabulorum Regnum Dei, Sanctum, Sacrum & Sacramentum.

Regnum Dei in Scriptis Theologorum, praesertim in Concionibus & Libris Devotionum, sumitur pro Foelicitate Aeterna, qua post hanc Vitam Electi in summo Coelo fruituri sunt; quod Regnum Gloriae vocant. Sumitur etiam pro Foelicitatis hujus arrabone, nempe Gratiâ sanctificante, quod appellant Regnum Gratiae. Sed pro Monarchia Civili propriè dicta, id est, pro Summa Potestate super Cives, per ipsorum suffragia acquisita, quae est significatio Regni, nunquam sumitur. Contra in Scripturis Sacris invenio Regnum Dei, ubique ferè significare Regnum propriè dictum, nempe Regnum quod constitutum est consensu populi Israëlitici, qui Deum in Regem sibi Pacto elegerunt. Pactum autem erat hoc, quod Deus Israëlitis traderet terram Chanaan in possessionem aeternam;[c] & quod populus Deo obediret. Ab ipsa creatione mundi Deus in omnes homines regnavit non modo naturaliter sive jure Omnipotentiae, sed etiam in quosdam homines quibus Voce imperavit. Sic regnavit super Adamum, Imperans, ne comederet de arbore Cognitionis Boni & Mali, & puniens eum, cum imperatum ejus transgressus esset, nempe cum arrogâsset sibi judicare de Bono & Malo, non per Creatoris sui mandatum, sed per suum ipsius Sensum; privavit enim illum vitâ aeternâ, quam habere potuit propter arborem Vitae.[d]

Rursus regnavit Deus in Noah & familia ejus; qui quamquam octo tantum essent personae,[e] erant tamen Regnum Dei propriè dictum.

Again, God reigned over Noah and his family, who, although they were only eight people,[e] were nevertheless the Kingdom of God properly so called.

[a] = pledge, instalment, foretaste (OED, 'earnest', *n.*², 1; the Latin has 'arrabone', a term for the pledge-money paid at the outset to ratify a contract).

[b] For the 'Kingdom of God' as eternal felicity see, e.g., Calvin, Institutes, III.xxv.10. The Westminster Shorter Catechism, commenting on the phrase 'Thy Kingdom come', explained (qu. 102) that 'we pray . . . that the kingdom of grace may be advanced, ourselves and others brought into it, and kept in it; and that the kingdom of glory may be hastened'. 'Sanctification', in Calvinist theology, was the process through which the elect became more holy in this life, by Christ's 'word and Spirit dwelling in them' (Westminster Confession, XIII.1). [c] Hobbes uses phrasing here from God's covenant with Abraham in Gen. 17: 8, 'omnem terram Chanaan in possessionem aeternam' (Vulg); 'all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession' (AV). [d] Gen. 2: 17 – 3: 24. [e] Gen. 7 (esp. v. 13).

The originall of the Kingdome of God.

After this, [10]it pleased God to speak[10] to Abraham, and (Gen. 17. 7, 8.) [11]to make[11] a Covenant with him in these words, I will establish my Covenant between me, and thee, and thy seed after thee in their generations, for an everlasting Covenant, to be a God to thee, and to thy seed after thee; And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession. In this Covenant Abraham promiseth for himselfe and his posterity to obey [12]as God, the Lord that[12] spake to him: and God on his part promiseth to Abraham the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession. [217] And for a memoriall, °and a token° of this Covenant, he ordaineth (verse 11.) the Sacrament of Circumcision. This is it which is called the Old Covenant, or Testament; °and containeth a Contract between God and Abraham; by which Abraham obligeth himself, and his posterity, in a peculiar manner to be subject to Gods positive Law (for to the Law Morall he was obliged before) as by an Oath of Allegiance.° And though the name of King be not [13]yet given to God, nor of Kingdome to Abraham and his seed; yet the thing is the same; namely, an Institution by pact, of Gods peculiar Soveraignty over the seed of Abraham; which in the renewing of the same Covenant by Moses, at Mount Sinai, is expressely called a peculiar Kingdome of God over the Jews:[f] and it is of Abraham (not of Moses) St. Paul saith (Rom. 4. 11.) that he is the Father of the Faithfull;[g] that is, of those that are loyall, and doe not violate their Allegiance sworn to God, then by Circumcision, and afterwards in the New Covenant by Baptisme.[13]

That the Kingdome of God is properly his Civill Soveraignty over a peculiar people by pact.

This Covenant, [14]at the Foot of[14] Mount Sinai, was renewed by Moses (Exod. 19. 5.)[h] [15]where the Lord commandeth Moses to speak to the people in this manner,[15] If you will obey my voice indeed, and keep my Covenant, then yee shall be a peculiar people to me, for all the Earth is mine; And yee shall be unto me a Sacerdotall Kingdome, and an holy Nation. [16]For a Peculiar people, the vulgar Latine hath, Peculium de cunctis populis: the English Translation made in the beginning of the Reign of King James, hath, a Peculiar treasure unto me above all Nations; and the Geneva French, the most precious Iewel of all Nations.[i] But the truest Translation is the first, because it is confirmed by St. Paul himself (Tit. 2. 14.) where he saith, alluding to that place, that our blessed Saviour[16]

[13] in that covenant, yet the thing appears there clearly. And the word 'kingdom' is expressly put in this covenant, when, through the ministry of Moses, it is later renewed.[f] But the sacrament of circumcision was nothing other than a sacrament of allegiance, as baptism is now under the New Covenant.

[14] which, at [15] , was as follows:

[16] The same thing is told in Titus 2: 14, where it is said that Christ

Postea alloquutus est Deus Abrahamum (Genes. 17. 7, 8.) fecitque cum illo Pactum in haec verba: Statuam Pactum meum inter me & te, & inter semen tuum post te in generationibus suis, foedere sempiterno: ut sim Deus tuus, & seminis tui post te. Daboque tibi, & semini tuo terram peregrinationis tuae, & omnem terram Canaan in possessionem aeternam. Abrahamus in hoc Pacto promittit, pro se & posteritate sua Deo obedire illi, qui ipsum alloquutus est. Ex alterâ parte paciscitur Deus dare Abrahamo terram Canaan in possessionem aeternam. Pro monumento [191] autem Pacti hujus (vers. 11.) instituit Deus Sacramentum Circumcisionis. Atque hoc illud est, quod vocatur Pactum & Testamentum Vetus. Quanquam autem nomen Regis in eo Pacto non sit, res tamen manifestè apparet. Etiam nomen Regni expressè ponitur in Pacto hoc, ministrante Mose, postea renovato.[f] Sacramentum autem Circumcisionis aliud non erat, quam Sacramentum Fidelitatis, ut nunc sub Testamento novo est Baptismus.

Pactum ad montem Sinai cum Mose renovatum (Exod. 19. 5.)[h] tale est, Si ergo audieritis vocem meam, & custodieritis Pactum meum, eritis mihi in peculium de cunctis populis; mea est enim omnis terra. Et vos eritis mihi in Regnum Sacerdotale & gens sancta. Idem narratur, Tit. 2. 14. ubi dicitur Christum gave himself for us, that he might purifie us to himself, a [17]peculiar (that is, an extraordinary) people: for the word is in the Greek περιούσιος which is opposed commonly to the word ἐπιούσιος: and as this signifieth ordinary, quotidian, or (as in the Lords Prayer) of daily use; so the other signifieth that which is overplus, and stored up, and enjoyed in a speciall manner;[j] which the Latines call Peculium: and this meaning of the place is confirmed by the reason God rendereth of it, which followeth immediately, in that he addeth, For all the Earth is mine,[k] as if he should say, All the Nations of the world are mine; but it is not so that you are mine, but in a speciall manner: For they are all mine, by reason of my Power; but you shall be mine, by your own Consent, and Covenant; which is an addition to his ordinary title, to all nations.[17]

The same [18]is again confirmed in expresse words in the same text, Yee shall be to me[18] a Sacerdotall Kingdome, [19]and an holy Nation. The Vulgar Latine hath it, Regnum Sacerdotale, to which agreeth the Translation of that place (1 Pet. 2. 9.)[19] Sacerdotium Regale, a Regal Priesthood; [20]as also the Institution it self, by which no man might enter into the Sanctum Sanctorum, that is to say, no man might enquire Gods will immediately of God himselfe, but onely the High Priest.[m] The English Translation before mentioned, following that of Geneva, has, a Kingdom of Priests;[n] which is either meant of the [218] succession of one High Priest after another, or else it accordeth not with St. Peter, nor with the exercise of the High priesthood: For there was never any but the High priest onely, that was to informe the People of Gods Will; nor any Convocation of Priests ever allowed to enter into the Sanctum Sanctorum.[20]

[17] populum περιούσιον – that is, 'peculiar', that is (as is said later in Exod. 19) 'not as the other nations are mine.'[l] For the other nations, though they were indeed subject to God's power, were not so by consent and covenant, as the Israelites were. [18] text says, [19] and 1 Pet. 2: 9 says, [20] because the high priests, after God, had the sovereign power in that kingdom. Therefore it is evident that the Kingdom of God was, until Samuel, a kingdom properly so called. And the champions of papal power seem not to disagree: they draw most of their arguments for the power of the Pope from the example of the high priests of the people of Israel.

[j] Hobbes gives here an accurate account of the meaning of περιούσιος, but a faulty one of the meaning of ἐπιούσιος, which means 'coming' or 'following' (thus, in the Lord's Prayer, 'daily bread', in the sense of 'the following day's bread').

[k] Exod. 19: 5.

[l] This is not a quotation, but a gloss on Exod. 19: 5, 'for all the earth is mine'; Hobbes's reasoning is more fully set out in the English.

[m] 'Sanctum sanctorum', 'holy of holies', was a term used in the Pentateuch for things dedicated to God, especially the altar or the Tabernacle, and later for the most holy part of the Temple, containing the ark of the covenant (1 Kgs 6: 16–19). In his comment on the high priest, Hobbes apparently has in mind Exod. 25: 22 and Lev. 16, esp. vv. 2–3, 17.

[n] Hobbes cites the phrase in Exod. 19: 6 (in the AV), which follows that in the Geneva Bible.

dedisse se pro nobis, ut purificaret sibi nos, in populum περιούσιον, id est peculiarem, id est (ut sequitur Exod. 19.) non sicut gentes aliae meae sunt.[1] Caeterae enim gentes potentiae quidem Divinae subditae erant per naturam, non autem per consensum & Pactum sicut Israëlitae. Dicitur autem in textu praedicto Regnum Sacerdotale, & (1 Petr. 2. 9.) Sacerdotium Regale, Propterea quod Summam Potestatem post Deum, habuere in illo Regno summi Sacerdotes. Manifestum ergo est Regnum Dei usque ad Samuëlem fuisse Regnum propriè dictum. Nec dissentire videntur Potestatis Pontificiae propugnatores, qui argumenta sua pro Potestate Papae pleraque deducunt ab

Again, the [21] title of a Holy Nation confirmes the same: for Holy signifies, that which is Gods by speciall, °not by generall° Right. All the Earth °(as is said in the text)° is Gods; but all the Earth is not called Holy, but that onely which is set apart [22]for his especiall service, as was the Nation of the Jews. It is therefore manifest enough by this one place, that by the Kingdome of God, is properly meant a Common-wealth, instituted (by the consent of those which were to be subject thereto) for their Civill Government, and the regulating of their behaviour, not onely towards God their King, but also towards one another in point of justice, and towards other Nations both in peace and warre; which properly was a Kingdome, wherein God was King, and the High priest was to be (after the death of Moses) his sole Viceroy, or Lieutenant.[22]

°But there be many other places that clearly prove the same. As first (1 Sam. 8. 7.) when the Elders of Israel (grieved with the corruption of the Sons of Samuel) demanded a King, Samuel displeased therewith, prayed unto the Lord; and the Lord answering said unto him, Hearken unto the voice of the People, for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them. Out of which it is evident, that God himself was then their King; and Samuel did not command the people, but only delivered to them that which God from time to time appointed him.°

Again, (1 Sam. 12. 12.) where Samuel saith to the People, When yee saw that Nahash King of the Children of Ammon came against you, ye said unto me, Nay, but a King shall reign over us, when the Lord your God was [23]your King:[23] It is manifest that God was their King, [24]and governed the Civill State of their Common-wealth.[24]

[25]And after the Israelites had rejected God, the Prophets did foretell his restitution; as[25] (Isaiah 24. 23.) Then the Moon shall be [26]confounded, and the Sun ashamed,[26] when the Lord of Hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Ierusalem; °where he speaketh expressely of his Reign in Zion, and Jerusalem;° that is, on Earth. And (Micah 4. 7.) And the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion: [27]This Mount Zion is in Jerusalem[27] upon the Earth. And (Ezek. 20. 33.) As I live, saith the Lord God, surely with a mighty hand, and a stretched out arme, and with fury powred out, I wil rule over you; and (verse 37.) I will [28]cause you to passe under the rod,[28] and I will bring you into the bond of the Covenant; that is, I will °reign over you, and° make you to stand to that Covenant which you made with me by Moses, °and brake in your rebellion against me in the days of Samuel, and in your election of another King.°

And in the New Testament, the Angel Gabriel saith of our Saviour (Luke 1. 32, 33.) He shall be great, and be called the Son of the most High, and the Lord shall give him the throne of his Father [219] David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; [29]and of his Kingdome there shall be no end. This is also a Kingdome upon Earth; for the claim whereof,[29] as an enemy to Caesar, he was put to death; the title of his crosse, [30] was, Iesus of Nazareth, King of the Iews;[q] hee was crowned in scorn with a crown of Thornes;[r] and [31]for the proclaiming of him, it is said of the Disciples (Acts 17. 7.) That they[31] did all of them contrary to the decrees of Caesar, saying there was another King, one Iesus. The Kingdome therefore of God[32], is a reall, not a metaphoricall Kingdome; and so taken, [33]not onely in the Old Testament, but the New; when we say,[33] For thine is the Kingdome, the Power, and Glory,[s] [34]it is to be understood of Gods Kingdome, by force of our Covenant, not by the Right of Gods Power; for such a Kingdome God alwaies hath; so that it were superfluous to say in our prayer, Thy Kingdome come,[t] unlesse it be meant of the Restauration of that Kingdome of God by Christ, which by revolt of the Israelites had been interrupted in the election of Saul. Nor had it been proper to say, The Kingdome of Heaven is at hand;[u] or to pray, Thy Kingdome come, if it had still continued.[34]

There be so many other places [35] that confirm this interpretation, that it were a wonder [36]there is no greater notice taken of it, but that it gives[36] too much light to Christian Kings to see their right of Ecclesiasticall Government. °This they have observed, that in stead of a Sacerdotall Kingdome, translate, a Kingdome of Priests:[w] for they may as well translate a Royall Priesthood, (as it is in St. Peter) into a Priesthood of Kings. And whereas, for a peculiar people, they put a pretious jewel, or treasure, a man might as well call the speciall Regiment, or Company of a Generall, the Generalls pretious Jewel, or his Treasure.°

[37]In short,[37] the Kingdome of God is a Civill Kingdome; [38]which consisted, first in the obligation of the people of Israel to those Laws, which Moses should bring unto them from Mount Sinai; and which afterwards the High Priest for the time being, should deliver to them from before the Cherubins in the Sanctum Sanctorum;[x] and which Kingdome having been cast off, in the election of Saul,[38] the Prophets foretold, should be restored [39]by Christ; and the Restauration whereof we daily[39] pray for, when we say in the Lords Prayer, Thy Kingdome come; and the Right whereof we acknowledge, when we adde, For thine is the Kingdome, the Power, and Glory, for ever and ever, °Amen;° and the Proclaiming whereof, was [40]the Preaching of[40] the Apostles; and to which men are [41]prepared, by the Teachers[41] of the Gospel; °to embrace which Gospel, (that is to say, to promise obedience to Gods government) is, to bee in the Kingdome of Grace, because God hath gratis[y] given to such the power to bee the Subjects (that is, Children) of God hereafter, when Christ shall come in Majesty to judge the world, and actually to govern his owne people, which is called the Kingdome of Glory.° If the Kingdome of God (called also the Kingdome of Heaven, from the [42]gloriousnesse, and admirable[z] height of that[42] throne) were not [43]a Kingdome which God by his Lieutenants, or Vicars, who [220] deliver his Commandements to the people, did exercise[43] on Earth; there would not have been so much contention, [44] and warre, about who it is, by whom God speaketh to us; neither would °many° Priests have troubled themselves [45] with Spirituall Jurisdiction, nor any King have denied [46]it[46] them.

Holy what. Out of this literall interpretation of the Kingdome of God, [47]ariseth[47] also the true interpretation of the word HOLY. For it is a word, which in Gods Kingdome answereth to that, which men in their [48]Kingdomes[48] use to call Publique, °or the Kings.°

[aa] The word 'indidisset', printed in 68 and 70, reverses the sense, yielding the meaning 'imposed it on them', 'endowed them with it'.

Concludimus ergo Regnum Dei, Regnum esse Civile; primùm in populo Israëlitico, ubi à Mose Leges Civiles receperunt; & Proregem Dei primum fuisse Mosem, & post eum Summos Sacerdotes singulos, usque ad tempus electionis Regis Saul quando abolitum est; & quod praedixerunt Prophetae restituendum esse; & quam restitutionem à Deo rogamus, quoties dicimus in Oratione Dominica Adveniat Regnum tuum; & cujus Ius agnoscimus dicendo, tuum est Regnum Potentia, & Gloria in secula seculorum; & cujus Promulgatio facta est ab Apostolis; & ad quod praeparandi sunt homines per Euangelii praedicationem. God the Holy one of Israel.[ab]

The King of any [49]Countrey[49] is the Publique Person, [50]or Representative of all his own Subjects. And God the King of Israel was[50] the Holy one of Israel.[ac] The [51]Nation which is subject to one earthly Soveraign, is the Nation of that Soveraign, that is, of[51] the Publique Person. So the [52]Jews,[52] who were Gods [53]Nation,[53] were called (Exod. 19. 6.) a Holy Nation. For by Holy, [54] is alwaies understood, either God himselfe, or that which is Gods in propriety; as by Publique, is alwaies meant, either the Person of the Common-wealth it self, or something that is so the Common-wealths, as no private person can [55]claim any propriety[55] therein.

Therefore the Sabbath (Gods day) is a Holy day; the Temple[56], (Gods house) a Holy house; Sacrifices, Tithes, and Offerings (Gods tribute) Holy duties; Priests, Prophets, and anointed Kings, °under Christ° (Gods Ministers) Holy men; the Coelestiall [57]ministring Spirits[57] (Gods Messengers) Holy Angels; °and the like:° and wheresoever the word Holy is taken properly, there is still something signified of [58] Propriety, °gotten by consent. In saying Hallowed be thy name, we do but pray to God for grace to keep the first Commandement, of having no other Gods but him.[ad] Mankind is Gods Nation in propriety: but the Jews only were a Holy Nation. Why, but because they became his Propriety by covenant?°

And the word Profane, is °usually° taken in the Scripture for the same with Common; and consequently °their contraries,° Holy, and Proper, in the Kingdome of God must be the same also. But figuratively, those [59] men also are called Holy, that °led such godly lives, as if they° had forsaken all worldly designs, and wholly devoted, and given themselves to God. °In the proper sense,° that which is made Holy by [60]Gods appropriating or separating it to his[60] own use, is said to be sanctified °by God,° as the Seventh day in the fourth Commandement; and as the Elect in the New Testament were said to bee sanctified, when they were endued with the Spirit of godlinesse.[ae] And that which is made Holy [61]by the dedication of men, and given to God, so as to be used onely in his publique service,[61] is called also SACRED, °and said to be consecrated,° as Temples, and other Houses of °Publique° Prayer, and their Utensils, °Priests, and° Ministers, Victimes, Offerings, °and the externall matter of Sacraments.°

Degrees of Sanctity.

Of Holinesse there be degrees: for of those things that are set apart for [62]the service of God,[62] there may bee some set apart again, for a °neerer and° more especial service[63]. The whole Nation of the Israelites were a people Holy [64]to God; yet[64] the tribe of Levi was amongst the [221] Israelites a Holy tribe; and amongst the Levites, the Priests were yet more Holy[65]; and amongst the Priests, the High Priest was the most Holy. So the Land of Judea was the Holy Land; but the Holy City wherein God was to be worshipped, was more Holy; and again, the Temple more Holy than the City; and the [66] Sanctum Sanctorum more Holy than the rest of the Temple.[af]

Sacrament.

A SACRAMENT, is a separation of some °visible° thing from common use; and a consecration of it to [67]Gods service,[67] for a sign, either of our admission into the Kingdome of God, [68]to be of the number of his peculiar people,[68] or for a Commemoration of [69]the same.[69] In the Old Testament, the sign of Admission was Circumcision; in the New Testament, Baptisme.[ag] The Commemoration of it in the Old Testament, was the Eating °(at a certaine time, which was Anniversary)° [ah] of the Paschall Lamb; by which they were put in mind of the night wherein they were delivered out of their bondage in Egypt; and in the New Testament, the celebrating of the Lords Supper; by which, we are put in mind, of our deliverance from the bondage of sin, by our °Blessed° Saviours death upon the crosse.[ai] The Sacraments of Admission, are but once °to be° used, because there [70]needs[70] but one Admission; but because we have need of being often put in mind of [71]our deliverance, and of our[71] Alleageance, the Sacraments of Commemoration have need to be reiterated[72]. And these are the principall Sacraments, and as it were the solemne oathes we make of our [73]Alleageance. There be also other Consecrations, that[73] may be called Sacraments, [74]as the word implyeth onely Consecration to Gods service; but as it implies an oath, or promise of Alleageance to God, there were no other[74] in the Old Testament, but Circumcision, and the Passeover; nor are there any other in the New Testament, but Baptisme, and the Lords Supper.

Sanctitatis gradus sunt. Earum enim rerum quae ad usum Divini cultus separantur, aliquae separari rursum possunt ad servitium vel cultum magis specialem. Tota gens Israëlitarum gens Sancta erat; erat tamen inter Israëlitas, Tribus Levi speciatim tribus Sancta; & inter Levitas sanctiores caeteris erant Sacerdotes; & inter Sacerdotes Sanctissimus erat Sacerdos summus. Terra Iudaeorum erat Terra Sancta, sed Vrbs, in qua colendus erat Deus magis Sancta erat; & Vrbe Sanctius erat Templum; & Templo Sanctior ea pars, quae appellabatur Sanctum Sanctorum.[af]

Sacramentum est, quod à communi usu separatum Deo consecratur, in signum admissionis in Regnum Dei (quae est quasi Naturalizatio sive Iuris Civitatis acquisitio) vel in memoriam tanti beneficii institutum. In Vetere Testamento signum Admissionis erat Circumcisio, [194] in Testamento Novo, Baptismus.[ag] Commemoratio in Vetere Testamento erat Agni Paschalis esus, per quem renovabatur noctis illius memoria in qua liberati erant à servitute Aegyptiaca; in Testamento novo, celebratio Coenae Dominicae, in qua memoratur liberatio nostra per mortem in cruce Servatoris nostri, à servitute peccati.[ai] Sacramentum Admissionis semel tantum fit, propterea quod semel tantum Admittimur. Sed quoniam ut beneficium Dei in hominibus servandis, & debitum nostrum fidelitatis opus habet, ut saepe inculcetur, Sacramentum commemorationis saepius repetendum est. Atque haec duo Sacramenta praecipuè sunt, & quasi Iuramenta solennia Fidelitatis nostrae erga Deum nostrum Regem & Redemptorem. Actio quidem consecrandi omnis Sacramentum dici potest; sed Sacramentum id est Iuramentum Fidelitatis in Civitate Dei aliud nullum erat, in Vetere Testamento, praeter Circumcisionem & Pascham; neque in Novo Testamento praeter Baptismum & Coenam Dominicam.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Of the WORD OF GOD, and of PROPHETS.

Word what. When there is mention [1] of the Word of God, or of Man, it doth not signifie a part of Speech, such as Grammarians call a [2]Nown, or a Verb, or any simple voice,[a] without a contexture[b] with other words to make it significative;[2] but a perfect[c] Speech or Discourse, [3]whereby[3] the speaker affirmeth, denieth, commandeth, promiseth, threatneth, wisheth, or interrogateth. In which sense it is not Vocabulum, that signifies a Word; but Sermo, (in Greek λόγος) °that is, some Speech, Discourse, or Saying.°

The words spoken by God, and concerning God, both are called Gods Word in Scripture. Again, if we say the Word of God, or of Man, it may bee understood sometimes of [4]the Speaker, (as the words that God hath spoken, or that a Man hath spoken): In which sense, when we say, the Gospel of St. Matthew, we understand St. Matthew to be the Writer of it:[4] and sometimes of the Subject[5]: In which sense, when we read in the [6]Bible,[6] The words of the days of the Kings of Israel, °or Iudah,°[d] 'tis meant, that the acts that were done in those days, were the Subject of those Words; And in the [7] Greek, °which (in the Scripture) retaineth many Hebraismes,° by the Word of God is oftentimes meant, not that which is spoken by God, but concerning God, and his [8]government;[8] that is to say, the Doctrine of [9]Religion: Insomuch, as[9] it is all one, to say λόγος θεοῦ,[e] and Theologia; which is, that Doctrine which wee usually call Divinity, as is manifest by the places following [Acts 13. 46.] Then Paul and Barnabas waxed bold, and said, It was necessary that the Word of God should first have been spoken to you, but seeing you put it from you, and judge your selves unworthy of everlasting life, loe, we turn to the Gentiles. That which is here called the Word of God, was [10]the Doctrine of Christian Religion; as it appears evidently by that which goes before.[10] And [Acts 5. 20.] where it is said to the Apostles by an

CAPVT XXXVI.

De Verbo Dei & Prophetis.

Quando in Scripturis Sacris reperitur Verbum Dei, vel Verbum Hominis, non intelligendum est pro parte Orationis, ut sumitur Verbum apud Grammaticos; sed pro Sermone perfecto, significante aliquid; ut quando is, qui loquitur, affirmat, negat, jubet, promittit, minatur, optat, vel interrogat. In quo sensu Verbum non est vocabulum, sed sermo, Graecè λόγος.

Rursus, Verbum Dei, vel Hominis intelligitur aliquando pro eo, quod Deus vel Homo loquutus est. Sic Euangelium Matthei, Verbum est Matthei; aliquando pro eo, de quo loquutus est. Atque hoc sensu, ubi legimus in Vetere Testamento, Verba dierum Regum Israëlis, intelligenda sunt res illis diebus gestae quae Verborum illorum Subjectum erant.

In Testamento Novo Graecè scripto, Verbum Dei saepe ponitur, (non pro eo, quod loquutus est Deus) sed pro eo, quod de Deo, & de Regno ejus; id est pro doctrina Christiana dictum est.

In hoc autem sensu idem significant λόγος θεοῦ[e] & Theologia, ut manifestum est Actor. 13. 46. Tunc constanter Paulus & Barnabas dixerunt, Vobis oportebat primùm loqui Verbum Dei. Sed quoniam repellitis illud, & indignos vos judicâstis aeternae vitae, ecce convertimur ad Gentes. Id quod appellatur hîc Verbum Dei, Doctrina erat Christiana. Item [195] (Actor. 5. 20.) ubi Angelus

17 13. 68-Errata] 3. 68

[a] = unit of speech, word (this sense is not specified in OED, but is clearly based on this meaning of the Latin 'vox'). [b] = weaving together (OED, 'contexture', 5). [c] = complete (OED, 'perfect', adj., 3).
[d] Hobbes translates here from Vulg: 1 Kgs 14: 19 'in libro [in the book of] verborum dierum regum Israhel', and 14: 29, 'in libro verborum dierum regum Iuda'. [e] = 'word of God'.

Angel, Go stand and speak in the Temple, all the Words of this life; by the Words of this life, is meant, the Doctrine of the Gospel; as is evident by what they [11]did in the Temple, and is expressed in the last verse of the same Chap.[11] Daily in the Temple, °and in every house° they ceased not to teach and preach Christ Iesus: [12]In which place it is manifest, that[12] Jesus Christ was the subject of this Word of life; or (which is all one) the subject of the Words of this life eternall, that our Saviour offered them. So [Acts 15. 7.] the Word of God, is called the Word of the Gospel, because it containeth the Doctrine of the Kingdome of Christ; and the same Word [Rom. 10. 8, 9.] is called the Word of Faith; that is, as is there expressed, the Doctrine of Christ come, and raised from the dead. [223] Also [Mat. 13. 19.] [13]When any one heareth[13] the Word of the Kingdome; that is, the Doctrine of the Kingdome [14]taught by Christ.[14] Again, the same Word, is said [Acts 12. 24.] to grow and to be multiplyed; which to understand of the Evangelicall Doctrine is easie, but of the Voice, [15]or Speech of God, hard and strange. In the same sense[15] the Doctrine of Devils, signifieth not [16]the Words of[16] any Devill, but the Doctrine of Heathen men concerning Daemons, °and those Phantasms which they worshipped as Gods.°

1 Tim. 4. 1.

Considering these two significations of the WORD OF GOD, [17]as it is taken in Scripture, it is manifest[17] in this later sense (where it is taken for the Doctrine of Christian Religion,) that the whole Scripture is [18] the Word of God: but in the former sense not so. For example, though these words, I am the Lord thy God, &c. to the end of the Ten Commandements, were spoken by God to Moses; yet the Preface, God spake [19] these words and said,[g] is °to be understood for° the Words of him that wrote the °holy° History. The Word of God, as it is taken for that which he hath spoken, is understood sometimes Properly, sometimes Metaphorically. Properly, as the words, he hath spoken to his Prophets: Metaphorically, for his Wisdome, Power, and eternall Decree, in making the world; in which sense, °those Fiats,° Let there be light, Let there be a firmament, Let us make man, &c. [Gen. 1.] are the Word of God. And in the same sense it is said [20] [Iohn 1. 3.] All things were made by it, and without it was nothing made that was made: And [Heb. 1. 3.] [21] He upholdeth all things by the Word of his Power; °that is, by the Power of his Word; that is, by his Power:° and [Heb. 11. 3.] [22] The worlds were framed by the Word of God; [23]and many other places to the same sense: As also amongst the[23] Latines, the name of Fate, °which signifieth properly The Word spoken,°[i] is taken in the same sense.

The Word of God metaphorically used, first, for the Decrees and Power of God.

Apostolos alloquitur dicens, Ite, & stantes loquimini in Templo plebi omnia verba vitae hujus: verba hujus vitae significant Doctrinam Euangelicam; ut patet ex eo, quòd versu ultimo fecisse dicuntur, nempe, Omni autem die non cessabant in Templo docentes & praedicantes Iesum Christum. Christus itaque subjectum erat Verbi Vitae. Porro (Actor. 15. 7.) Verbum Dei appellatur Verbum Euangelii, quia continet Doctrinam de Regno Christi. Idem verbum (Rom. 10. 8, 9.) vocatur Verbum Fidei, id est, ut ibi explicatur, Doctrina de Christo venturo & à mortuis suscitato. Et (Matth. 13. vers. 19.) appellatur idem Verbum Regni, id est Doctrina, quam docuit Deus circa Regnum Dei. Idem denique Verbum (Actor. 12. 24.) Crevisse & multiplicatum esse dicitur. Id quod de Doctrina Euangelica intelligere facile est, sed de Voce Dei difficilimum. Etiam ubi Sanctus Paulus loquitur de doctrina Daemonum, non intelligit id, quod dictum est de[f] Daemone aliquo, sed Daemonologiam Gentium.

Ex his duabus Verbi Dei significationibus, posterior, ubi sumitur pro Doctrina Christiana, continet Scripturam Sacram totam. Prior non item. Quanquam enim verba haec, Ego sum Dominus Deus tuus &c. usque ad finem Decalogi, verba sunt ipsius Dei Mosem alloquentis; praefatio tamen illa Loquutus est Dominus cunctos sermones hos,[g] sunt verba ejus, qui Historiam conscripserat. Verbum Dei, quando sumitur pro eo, quod loquutus est Deus, significationem habet interdum Propriam, interdum Tropicam. Propriam, ut verba, quae loquutus est ad Prophetas suos: Tropicam, quando ponitur verbum pro Sapientia, vel Potentia Dei, vel pro Decreto ejus aeterno de condendo mundo. Atque hoc sensu Verbum Dei est Fiat lumen, Fiat firmamentum, Faciamus hominem. Eodem sensu (Ioh. 1. 3.) de Verbo Dei dictum est, Omnia per illud facta sunt, & sine illo factum est nihil eorum quae facta sunt. Et (Heb. 1. 3.)[h] Per quem fecit secula, & portat omnia verbo virtutis suae. Et (Hebr. 11. 3.) Fide intelligimus aptata esse secula Verbo Dei. Verbum autem hoc sensu verborum omnium quae Deus loquutus est, est primum, ut in ipso principio mundi pronuntiatum. Etiam Latini Ethnici vocabulo Fatum in eodem sensu usi sunt.[i]

[11] are said to have done in the last verse, namely, [12] Thus [13] the same is called [14] of God, taught by God. [15] of God, very difficult. Also, St Paul's expression, [16] that which is said about[f] [17] it is [18] ^ included in [19] ^ all [Vulg; AV] [20] ^ of the word of God [21] ^ by whom he made the worlds, and [Vulg; AV] [22] ^ Through faith we understand that [Vulg; AV] [23] . The 'word' in this sense is the first of all the words that were spoken by God, as it was uttered at the very beginning of the world. Also, among the pagan

[f] 'de' here means 'about'; but the sense suggests that this may be an error for 'à', 'by'.

[g] Exod. 20: 1 (these words appear only in Exod.; the Commandments are in Exod. 20: 2–17; Deut. 5: 6–21). [h] Correctly, Heb. 1: 2, 3. [i] 'Fatum', 'fate', is from the past participle of 'for', to 'speak'; its meaning developed from that of 'pronouncement', 'decree'.

Secondly, for the effect of his Word.

[24]Secondly, for the[24] effect of his Word; that is to say, for the thing it self, which by his Word is Affirmed, Commanded, °Threatned,° or Promised; as [Psalm 105. 19.] where Joseph is said to have been kept in prison, till his Word was come; that is, till that was come to passe which he had [Gen. 40. 13.] foretold to Pharaohs Butler, concerning his being restored to his office: °for there by his word was come, is meant, the thing it self was come to passe.° So also [1 King. 18. 36.] Elijah saith to God, I have done all these thy Words, in stead of I have done all these things [25]at thy Word, or commandement:[25] and [Ier. 17. 15.] Where is the Word of the Lord, is put for, Where is the Evill he threatned: And [Ezek. 12. 28.] [26] There shall none of my Words be prolonged any more: by words are understood those [27]things,[27] which God promised to his people. And in the New Testament [Mat. 24. 35.] heaven and earth shal pass away, but my Words shal not pass away; that is, there is nothing that I have promised °or foretold,° that shall not come to passe. And in this sense it is, that St. John the Evangelist, [28]and, I think, St. John onely calleth our Saviour himself as in the flesh[28] the Word of God [29][as Ioh. 1 .14.][29] the Word was made Flesh;[j] [30]that is to say, the Word, or Promise that Christ should come into the world; who[30] in the beginning was with God;[l] that is to say, [31]it was in the purpose of [224] God the Father, to send God the Son into the world, to enlighten men in the way of Eternall life; but it was not till then put in execution, by his being actually incarnate;[31] So that our Saviour is there called the Word, not because he was the promise, but the thing promised. °They that taking occasion from this place, doe commonly call him the Verbe of God,[n] do but render the text more obscure. They might as well term him the Nown of God: for as by Nown, so also by Verbe, men understand nothing but a part of speech, a voice, a sound, that neither affirms, nor denies, nor commands, nor promiseth, nor is any substance corporeall, or spirituall; and therefore it cannot be said to bee either God, or Man; whereas our Saviour is both.° And this Word °which St. Iohn

[24] 'Word' is also taken very often in the Holy Scriptures for the result or [25] which you commanded;
[26] ^ The word which I have spoken shall be done. [AV] [27] deeds,
[28] (John 1: 1) calls Christ himself [29] and says, a little later, [30] For Christ was promised from the beginning, and [31] God had decreed from eternity that he would come, and that he would take on human flesh.

Sumitur etiam saepissimè in Scripturis Sacris Verbum pro Verbi effectu vel eventu, id est pro eo, quod verbo Affirmatur, Imperatur, vel promittitur; ut (Psal. 105. 19.) ubi Ioseph dicitur in carcere retentus, donec Verbum ejus venerit, id est donec factum esset, quod praedixerat Pharaonis pincernae circa restitutionem ejus in ministerium suum. Item 1 Reg. 18. 36, dicit Elijah Deo, feci omnia verba tua, pro feci omnia quae jussisti. Et (Ier. 17. 15.) ubi est Verbum Domini, [196] ponitur pro, ubi est malum quod minatus est Dominus. Et (Ezek. 12. 28.) & quodcunque loquutus fuero Verbum, fiet. Non prolongabitur amplius, Verba ponuntur pro factis, quae facere populo promiserat. Etiam in Testamento Novo (Matth. 24. 35.) Coeli & Terra transibunt, sed mea verba non transibunt, id est quicquid promisi fiet. Item Iohannes Euangelista (Ioh. 1. 1.) in hoc sensu, Verbum Dei appellat ipsum Christum, & paulò post Verbum factum est Caro. Christus enim à principio promissus est, (Gen. 1.)[k] eratque in principio apud Deum, nempe venturum illum ab aeterno decreverat Deus, & assumpturum carnem humanam. [j] This passage seems corrupted, probably by scribal error. A possible emendation would be: 'our Saviour himself in the flesh the Word of God, as in [Ioh. 1. 14] the Word was made Flesh'.

[k] This reference is wrong. Either it is an error here for '(Joh. 1)', or it has been inserted erroneously into this para. instead of the para. above, where 'Fiat lumen' ('Let there be light'), etc., was quoted, with this reference in the English but without it in the Latin. [l] Adapting John 1: 1.

[m] This clause is intelligible as it stands, but it seems likely that a verb has gone missing: 'sit' ('is'), or 'esset' ('was'). [n] This was not a term in English usage; Hobbes was probably thinking of the French phrase 'le verbe de Dieu' (which was used for Christ).

in his Gospel saith was with God,° is [in his 1 Epistle, °verse 1.°] called [32] the Word of life; and °[verse 2.]° the Eternall life, which was with the Father: °so that he can be in no other sense called the Word, then in that, wherein he is called Eternall life; that is, he that hath procured us Eternall life, by his comming in the flesh.° So also [Apocalypse 19. 13.] °the Apostle speaking of Christ, clothed in a garment dipt in bloud, saith;° his name is the Word of God; °which is to be understood,° as if he had said [33]his name had been,[33] He that was come according to the purpose of God from [34]the beginning, and according to his Word and promises delivered by the Prophets.[34] So that there is nothing here of the Incarnation of a [35] Word, but of the Incarnation of God the Son, °therefore called the Word, because his Incarnation was the Performance of the Promise; In like manner as the Holy Ghost is called the Promise.°

Thirdly, for the words of reason and equity.

There are also places of the Scripture, where, by the Word of God, is signified [36]such Words as are consonant to[36] reason, and equity, though spoken sometimes neither by Prophet, nor by a holy man. For Pharaoh Necho was an Idolater; yet his Words [37]to the good King Josiah, in which he advised him[37] by Messengers, not to oppose him in his march against Carchemish, are said to have proceeded from the mouth of God; and that Josiah not [38]hearkning to[38] them, was slain in the battle; as is to be read 2 Chron. 35. vers. 21, 22, 23. °It is true, that as the same History is related in the first Book of Esdras, not Pharaoh, but Jeremiah spake these words to Josiah, from the mouth of the Lord.[p] But wee are to give credit to the Canonicall Scripture, whatsoever be written in the Apocrypha.°

The Word of God, is then also to be taken for the Dictates of [39]reason, and equity,[39] when the same is said °in the Scriptures° to bee written in mans heart; as Psalm 36.[q] 31. Ierem. 31. 33. °Deut. 30. 11, 14.° and many other like places.

Sunt etiam loca nonnulla in Scriptura Sacra, ubi Verbum Dei ponitur pro Verbis Aequitatis & Rationis, etsi neque à Propheta prolata neque à viro Sancto. Nam Pharaoh Necho Idololatra erat; quando tamen Nuntio misso Iosiam monuit, ne sibi invadenti Carchemish opponeret, Verba ejus profecta esse dicuntur ab ore Dei; etiam Iosias, quia verbis illis non obedivit, praelio occisus est, ut legere est 2 Chron. 35. vers. 21, 22, 23.

Verbum Dei aliquando etiam sumitur pro dictamine rectae Rationis; ut quando, in cordibus hominum scriptum dicitur, ut Psal. 36.[q] 31. Ierem. 31. 33. & multis aliis locis.

Divers acceptions of the word Prophet.

The name of PROPHET, signifieth in Scripture sometimes Prolocutor; that is, he that speaketh [40] from God to Man, or from man to God: And sometimes Praedictor, or a foreteller of things to come: And sometimes one that speaketh incoherently, as men that are distracted.[r] It is most frequently used in the sense of speaking [41] from [41] God to the People. So Moses, Samuel, Elijah, Isaiah, Ieremiah, and others were Prophets. And in this sense the High Priest was a Prophet, [42] for he only went into the Sanctum Sanctorum, to enquire of God; and was to declare [225] his answer to the people.[s] And therefore when Caiphas[t] said, it was expedient that one man should die for the people, St. John saith [chap. 11. 51.] that He [42] spake not this of himselfe, but being High Priest that year, he prophesied °that one man should dye for the nation.° Also they that in Christian [43] Congregations [43] taught the people [1 Cor. 14. 3.] are said to Prophecy. In the like sense it is, that God saith to Moses [Exod. 4. 16.] concerning Aaron, He shall be thy Spokes-man to the People; and he shall be to thee [44] a mouth, and thou shalt be to him in stead of God: [45] that which here is Spokesman, is [chap. 7. 1.] interpreted Prophet;[45] See °(saith God)° I have made thee a God to Pharaoh, and Aaron thy Brother shall be thy Prophet. [46] In the sense of speaking [46] from man to God, Abraham is called a Prophet [Genes. 20. 7.] where God in a Dream speaketh to Abimelech in this manner, Now therefore restore the man his wife, for he is a Prophet, and shall pray for thee; whereby may be also gathered, that the name of Prophet may be given, not unproperly to them that in Christian Churches, have a Calling to say publique prayers [47] for the Congregation. In the same sense, the Prophets that came down from the High place (or Hill of God) with a Psaltery,[u] and a Tabret,[v] and a Pipe, and a Harp [1 Sam. 10. 5, 6.][w] and [vers. 10.] Saul amongst them, are said to Prophecy, in that they praised God, in that manner publiquely.[47] In the like sense, is Miriam [Exod. 15. 20.] called a Prophetesse. So is it also to be taken [1 Cor. 11. 4, 5.] where St. Paul saith, Every man that prayeth or prophecyeth with his head covered, &c. °and every woman that prayeth or prophecyeth with her head uncovered:° For Prophecy in that place, signifieth no more, but praising God in Psalmes, and Holy Songs; which women [48] might doe in the Church, °though it were not lawfull for them to speak to the Congregation. And in this signification it is, that the Poets of the Heathen, that composed Hymnes and other sorts of Poems in the honor of their Gods, were called Vates (Prophets) as is well enough known by all that are versed in the Books of the Gentiles,[x] and as is evident [Tit. 1. 12.] where St. Paul saith of the Cretians, that a Prophet of their owne said, they were Liars; not that St. Paul held their Poets for Prophets, but acknowledgeth that the word Prophet was commonly used to signifie them that celebrated the honour of God in Verse.°

Vox Propheta in Scripturis Sacris significat aliquando Prolocutorem, id est, illum, qui alloquitur homines, ut missus à Deo; vel Deum alloquitur ab homine. Significat etiam aliquando eum, qui futura praedicit. Aliquando etiam illum, qui (ut mente captus) loquitur verba incohaerentia. Saepissimè autem ponitur pro eo, qui in nomine Dei alloquitur populum. Quo sensu Moses, Samuel, Elijah, Isaiah, Ieremiah, aliique Prophetae erant. Etiam in hoc sensu Summus Sacerdos Propheta erat, ut (Ioh. 11. 51.) hoc autem (Caiphas)[t] à semetipso non dixit, sed cum esset Pontifex anni illius, Prophetavit. Etiam qui populum in Ecclesiis Christianis docuerunt (1 Cor. 14. 3.) dicuntur Prophetâsse. Eodem sensu ad Mosem dicit Deus (Exod. 4. 16.) de Aarone, erit tibi pro Prolocutore ad populum; eritque tibi instar oris, & eris ei tu instar Dei. Et cap. 7. 1. Ecce feci te Pharaoni Deum, & frater tuus Aaron erit Propheta tuus. Abrahamus autem ideò Propheta dicitur, (Gen. 20. 7.) [197] quia loquutus est pro homine ad Deum. Deus enim Abimelecum in somnio alloquens dicit, nunc ergò restitue homini uxorem suam, nam est Propheta, & orabit pro te. Intelligi hinc potest illos, qui in Ecclesiis Christianis, ad officium vocati sunt publicè precandi, non impropriè Prophetas dici. Prophetae etiam erant, quibus immiscuit se Saul. (1 Sam. 10. 5, 6.) Eodem sensu Miriam (Exod. 15. 20.) dicitur Prophetissa. Ita quoque sumi debet (1 Cor. 11. 4, 5.) ubi dicit S. Paulus, Vnusquisque qui precatur vel prophetat capite operto, &c. Prophetia enim aliud non significat eo loco praeterquam Psalmis & Cantilenis Sacris laudare Deum; id quod facere in Ecclesiis etiam foeminis licuit.

Praediction of future contingents, not alwaies Prophecy.

When by Prophecy is meant Praediction, or foretelling of future Contingents; [49]not only they were Prophets, who were Gods Spokes-men, and foretold those things to others, which God had foretold to them; but also all those[49] Impostors, that pretend by °the helpe of familiar° spirits, or by superstitious divination [50]of events past, from false causes, to foretell the like[50] events in time to come: of which (as I have declared [51] already in the 12. chapter of this Discourse) there be many kinds,[z] who gain °in the opinion of the common sort of men,° a greater reputation of Prophecy, by [52]one casuall[aa] event that may bee but wrested to their purpose,[52] than can be lost again by [53]never so many failings.[53] Prophecy is not an Art, nor (when it is taken for Praediction) a constant Vocation; but an extraordinary, and temporary [54]Employment from[54] God, most often of Good men, but sometimes also [226] of the Wicked. The woman of Endor, who is said to have had a familiar spirit, and thereby to have raised a Phantasme of Samuel, and foretold Saul his death, was not therefore a Prophetesse; for neither had she any science, whereby she could [55]raise such a Phantasme;[55] nor does it appear that God commanded °the raising of° it; but onely guided that Imposture to be a means of Sauls [56]terror and discouragement; and by consequent, of the discomfiture, by which he fell.[56] [ac] And for Incoherent Speech, it was amongst the Gentiles taken for °one sort of° Prophecy, because the Prophets of their Oracles, [57]intoxicated with a spirit, or vapor from the cave of the Pythian Oracle at Delphi,[ad] were for the time really mad, and spake like mad-men; of whose loose words a sense might be made to fit any event, in such sort, as all bodies are said to be made[57] of Materia prima.[ae] °In the Scripture I find it also so taken [1 Sam. 18. 10.] in these words, And the Evill spirit came upon Saul, and he Prophecyed in the midst of the house.°

Prophetia, quatenus sumitur pro Praedictione futurorum Contingentium, non solum veris Prophetis, sed etiam aliquando Impostoribus attribuitur, qui praedicere se futura dicunt per Spiritus, & per Divinationem superstitiosam, idque multis modis, ut supra (Cap. 12.) speciatim diximus.[z] Atque hi existimationem Prophetiae majorem per unum aliquem eventum fortuitò[aa] praedictum sibi acquirunt, quàm quae innumeris praedictionibus rerum quae non evenerunt, potest tolli. Prophetia non est Ars, neque (ut sumitur pro Praedictione) negotium constans, sed onus temporarium atque extraordinarium impositum à Deo, plerumque viris bonis, sed interdum etiam malis. The manner how God hath spoken to the Prophets.

And although there be so many significations in Scripture of the word Prophet; yet is that the most frequent, in which it is taken for him, to whom God [58]speaketh immediately, that which the Prophet is to say from him, to some other man, or to the people.[58] And hereupon a question may be asked, in what manner God [59]speaketh to such a Prophet. Can it (may some say) be properly said, that God hath voice and language, when it cannot be properly said, he hath[59] a tongue, or other organs[60], as a man? [61]The Prophet David argueth thus,[61] Shall he that made the eye, not see? or he that made the ear, not hear?[ag] [62]But this may be spoken, not (as usually) to signifie[62] Gods nature, but to signifie our intention to honor him. For to see, and hear, are Honorable Attributes, and may be given to God, °to declare (as far as our capacity can conceive) his Almighty power.° But if it were to be taken in the strict, and proper sense, one might argue [63]from his making of all[63] other parts of mans body, that he had [64]also the same use of them which we have; which would be many of them so uncomely, as[64] it would be the greatest contumely in the world to ascribe them to him. Therefore we are to interpret Gods speaking to men immediately, for that way (whatsoever it be), by which God makes them understand his will: And the wayes whereby he doth this, are many; and to be sought onely in the Holy Scripture: °where though many times it be said, that God spake to this, and that person, without declaring in what manner; yet there be again many places, that deliver also the signes by which they were to acknowledge his presence, and commandement; and by these may be understood, how he spake to many of the rest.°

To the Extraordinary Prophets of the Old Testament he spake by Dreams, or Visions.

°In what manner° God spake to Adam, and Eve, and Cain, [65]and Noah, is not expressed; nor[65] how he spake to Abraham, till such time as he came out of his own countrey to Sichem in the land of Canaan; and then [Gen. 12. 7.] God is said to have appeared to him. So there is one way, whereby God made his presence manifest; that is, by an Apparition, or Vision. And again, [Gen. 15. 1.] The Word of the Lord came to Abraham in a Vision; that is to say, [66]somewhat, as a[66] sign of Gods presence, appeared °as Gods Messenger, to speak° to him. Quanquam autem in Scripturis Sacris, vocabuli Propheta tot sint significationes, frequentissima tamen ea est, in qua sumitur pro eo cui Deus illud immediatè loquutus est, quod is homini vel hominibus loquutus erat.[af] Sed quomodo (dicet aliquis) propriè dici potest loquutum esse Deum, qui linguam, aliaque organa loquendi non habet, sicut homo. Quid autem, qui fecit oculum (dicit David) non videbit? Is qui fecit aurem non audiet?[ag] Etsi nec videt nec audit Deus ut homo, scit tamen quae dicimus & facimus. Caeterum verba illa Davidis non ponuntur ad naturae Divinae declarationem, sed ad voluntatis nostrae [198] in Deo honorando significationem. Videre enim & audire sunt Attributa honoris, & Deo attribui possunt. Sed si in propria & stricta significatione sumerentur, à caeteris etiam partibus corporis humani argumenta similia sumi possent, tribuendi Deo caeteras omnes actiones humanas; quarum plurimae turpes sunt, & proinde attribuere illas Deo contumelia maxima esset. Itaque vocem Dei ad homines immediatam sumere oportet eo modo (quicunque is sit) per quem facit Deus, ut voluntas sua intelligatur. Modi autem quibus id facit, multi sunt, & in Scripturis Sacris solis reperiendi.

Onely to Moses hee spake in [69]a more[69] extraordinary manner in Mount Sinai, and in the Tabernacle; and to the High Priest in the Tabernacle, and in the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Temple.[aj] But Moses, and after him the High Priests were Prophets of a more eminent place, [70]and degree in Gods favour; And God himself in express words declareth, that to other Prophets hee spake in Dreams and Visions, but to his servant Moses, in such manner as a man speaketh to his friend. And [Ioel 2. 28.] [76] Your sons and your daughters shall Prophecy; your old men shall dream Dreams, and your young men shall see Visions: where again, the word Prophecy is expounded by Dream, and Vision[77]. And in the same manner [78]it was, that God spake to Solomon, promising him Wisdome, Riches, and Honor; for the text saith,[78] [1 Kings 3. 15.] And Solomon awoak, and [79]behold[79] it was a Dream: So [80]that generally[80] the Prophets extraordinary in the Old Testament took notice of the Word of God no otherwise, than from their Dreams, or Visions; that is to say, from [81]the imaginations which they had in their sleep, or in an Extasie: which imaginations in every true Prophet were supernaturall; but in false Prophets were either naturall, or feigned.[81]

[82]The same Prophets were neverthelesse said to speak by the Spirit;[82] [228] as [Zach. 7. 12.] where [83]the Prophet speaking of the Jewes,[83] saith, They made their hearts hard as Adamant, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the Lord of Hosts hath sent in his [84]Spirit by[84] the former Prophets. °By which it is manifest, that speaking by the Spirit, or Inspiration, was not a particular manner of Gods speaking, different from Vision, when they that were said to speak by the Spirit, were extraordinary Prophets, such as for every new message, were to have a particular Commission, or (which is all one) a new Dream, or Vision.°

To Prophets of perpetuall Calling, and Supreme, God spake in the Old Testament from the Mercy Seat, in a manner not expressed in the Scripture.

Of Prophets, that were so by a perpetuall Calling in the Old Testament, some were supreme, and some subordinate: Supreme were first Moses; and after him the High Priests, every one for his time, as long as the Priesthood was Royall; and after the people of the Jews, had [85]rejected God, that he should no more reign over them,[an] those Kings which submitted themselves to Gods government, were also his chief Prophets; and[85] the High Priests office became Ministeriall. And when God was to be consulted, [86]they[86] put on the holy vestments, and enquired of the Lord, [87] as the King commanded them, and were deprived of their office, [88]when the King thought fit.[88] For King Saul [1 Sam. 13. 9.] commanded the burnt offering to be brought, and [1 Sam. 14. 18.] he commands the Priest to bring the Ark neer him; and [ver. 19.] again to let it alone, °because he saw an advantage upon[ao] his enemies.° And in the same chapter Saul asketh counsell of God.[ap] In like manner °King° David, after his being anointed, though before he had possession of the Kingdome, [89]is said to enquire[89] of the Lord [1 Sam. 23. 2.] whether he should fight against the Philistines at Keilah; and [verse 10.][aq] David commandeth the Priest to bring him the Ephod,[ar] to enquire [90]whether he should stay in Keilah, or not.[90] And King Solomon [1 Kings 2. 27.] took the Priesthood from Abiathar, and gave it [verse 35.] to Zadoc. Therefore Moses, and the High Priests, and the pious Kings, who enquired of God on all [91]extraordinary occasions, how they were to carry themselves, or what event they were to have,[as] were all[91] Soveraign Prophets. [92]But in what manner God spake unto them, is not manifest. To say that when Moses went up to God in Mount Sinai, it was a Dream, or Vision, such as other Prophets had, is contrary to that distinction which God made between Moses, and other Prophets, Numb. 12. 6, 7, 8.[92] To say God spake or appeared as he is in his own nature, is to deny his Infinitenesse, Invisibility, Incomprehensibility. To say he spake by °Inspiration, or° Infusion of the Holy Spirit, as the Holy Spirit signifieth the Deity, is to make Moses equall with Christ, in whom onely the Godhead [as St. Paul speaketh Col. 2. 9.] dwelleth bodily. And lastly, to say he spake by the Holy Spirit, as it signifieth the [93]graces, or gifts of the Holy Spirit, is to attribute nothing to him supernaturall.[93] For God disposeth men to Piety, Justice, Mercy, Truth, Faith, and all manner of Vertue, both Morall, and Intellectuall, by doctrine, example, and by [94]severall occasions,[94] [at] naturall, and ordinary.

[95]And as these ways cannot be applyed to God, in his speaking to Moses, at Mount Sinai; so also, they cannot be applyed to him, in his [229] speaking to the High Priests, from the Mercy-Seat.[au] Therefore in what manner God spake to those Soveraign Prophets of the Old Testament, whose office it was to enquire of him, is not intelligible. In the time of the New Testament, there was no Soveraign Prophet, but our Saviour; who was both God that spake, and the Prophet to whom he spake.[95]

To Prophets of perpetuall Calling, but subordinate, God spake by the Spirit.

To subordinate Prophets of perpetuall Calling, I find not any place [96] that proveth God spake to them supernaturally; but onely in such manner, as naturally he inclineth to Piety, to Beleef, to Righteousnesse, [97]and to other vertues all other Christian men.[97] Which way, though it consist in [98]Constitution,[av] Instruction, Education, and the occasions and invitements men have to Christian vertues;[98] yet it is truly attributed to the operation of the [99]Spirit of God, or Holy Spirit, (which we in our language call the Holy Ghost): For there is no good inclination, that is not of the operation of God. But these operations are not alwaies supernaturall.[99] When therefore a Prophet is said to speak °in the Spirit, or° by the Spirit of God, we are to understand no more, but that he speaks [100]according to Gods will, declared by the supreme Prophet. For the most common acceptation of the word Spirit, is in the signification of a mans intention, mind, or disposition.[100]

In the time of Moses, there were seventy men besides himself, that Prophecyed in the Campe of the Israelites. In what manner God spake to them, is declared in the 11 of Numbers, verse 25. The Lord came down in a cloud, and spake unto Moses, and took of the Spirit that was upon him, and gave it to the seventy Elders. °And it came to passe,° when the Spirit rested upon them, they Prophecyed, and did not cease. By which it is manifest, first, that their Prophecying to the people, was subservient, and subordinate to the Prophecying of Moses; [101]for that God took of the Spirit of Moses, to put upon them; so that they Prophecyed [101] as Moses would have them: [102]otherwise they had not been suffered to Prophecy at all. For there was [verse 27.] a complaint made against them

Prophetis autem vocationis perpetuae, sed subordinatis loquutum esse Deum supernaturaliter, in Scripturis nusquam constat, sed naturaliter tantùm, eo modo quo ad Pietatem Fidem, & Iustitiam disponit Deus quos ad salutem destinavit. Qui modus, etsi consistat in Instructione, Educatione hominum, verè tamen dici potest Spiritus Sancti operatio; nam inclinatio omnis tum ad sanctitatem tum ad virtutem à Deo est; quando igitur Propheta loqui dicitur per Spiritum Dei, intelligere debemus, ita illum loqui, ut Deus per Prophetam suum summum (cui Propheta subordinatus obedire obligatur) loqui illum jussit.

Cumque requievisset in eis Spiritus, prophetaverunt, nec ultrà cessaverunt*. Ex quibus verbis manifestum est, primò, Prophetationem eorum ad populum, subservientem & subordinatam fuisse Prophetationi Mosis, per cujus Spiritum prophetaverunt, id est, ita ut voluit Moses; quod confirmatur (vers. 27.) ex eo, quod cum Mosi dixis-to Moses; and Joshua would have Moses to have forbidden them; which he did not, but[102] said to Joshua, Bee not jealous in my behalf. Secondly, that the Spirit of God in that place, signifieth nothing but the [103]Mind and Disposition[103] to obey, and assist Moses in the administration of the Government. For [104]if it were meant they had the substantiall Spirit of God; that is, the Divine nature, inspired into them, then they had it in no lesse manner then Christ himself, in whom onely the Spirit of God dwelt bodily.[104] It is meant therefore of the Gift and Grace of God, that guided them to co-operate with Moses; [105]from whom their Spirit was derived. And it appeareth [verse 16.] that, they were such as Moses himself should appoint for Elders and Officers of the People: For the words are, Gather unto me seventy men, whom thou knowest to be Elders and Officers of the people: where, thou knowest, is the same with thou appointest, or hast appointed to be such. For we are told before [Exod. 18.] that Moses following the counsell of Jethro his Father-in-law, did appoint Judges, and Officers over the people, such as feared God; and of these, [230] were those Seventy, whom God by putting upon them Moses spirit, inclined to aid Moses in the Administration of the Kingdome:[105] and in this sense the Spirit of God is said [1 Sam. 16. 13, 14.] °presently[aw] upon the anointing of David,° to have come upon David, and left Saul; God giving his graces to him he chose to govern his people, [106]and taking them away from him, he rejected. So that by the Spirit is meant Inclination to Gods service; and not any supernaturall Revelation.[106]

God sometimes also spake by Lots.

God spake also [107]many times[107] by the event[ax] of Lots; which were ordered by such as [108]he had put in Authority over his[108] people. So °wee read that° God manifested by the Lots which Saul caused to be drawn [1 Sam. 14. 43.] the fault [109]that Jonathan had committed, in eating a honey-comb, contrary to the oath taken by the people.[109] And [Iosh. 18. 10.] God divided the land of Canaan °amongst the Israelites,° by the lots that Ioshua did [110]cast[110] before the Lord in Shiloh. In the same manner it seemeth to be, that God discovered[az] [Ioshua 7. 16, &c.] the [111]crime[111] of Achan. And these are the wayes whereby God declared his Will in the Old Testament.

Secundò, ex eodem loco colligitur, Spiritum Dei non aliud ibi significare, praeter parendi voluntatem, & adjuvandi Mosem in administratione Regiminis. De substantia enim Divina intelligi non potest, quae solummodò in Christo habitavit corporaliter. Spiritus ergo ibi significat Donum sive Gratiam Divinam, qua ducti cum Mose cooperabantur, cujus habebant Spiritum; Septuaginta enim [201] illi viri, electi à Mose antè erant, quàm Spiritum Mosis accepissent. All which ways he used also in the New Testament. To the Virgin Mary, by a Vision of an Angel: To Ioseph in a Dream: again to Paul in the way to Damascus in a Vision °of our Saviour:° and to Peter in the Vision of a sheet let down from heaven, °with divers sorts of flesh, of clean, and unclean beasts;° and in prison, by Vision of an Angel:[ba] And to all the Apostles, and Writers of the New Testament, by [112]the[112] graces of his Spirit; and to the Apostles again (at the choosing of Matthias [113]in the place of Judas Iscariot)[113] by lot.[bb]

Every man ought to examine the probability of a pretended Prophets Calling.

Seeing then all Prophecy supposeth Vision, or Dream, °(which two, when they be naturall, are the same,)° or some especiall [114]gift of God, so rarely observed in mankind, as to be admired where observed; And seeing as well such gifts,[114] as the most extraordinary Dreams, and Visions, may proceed [115]from God, not onely by his supernaturall, and immediate, but also by his naturall operation, and by mediation of[115] second causes; there is need of [116] Reason and Judgment to discern between naturall, and supernaturall [117]Gifts,[117] and between naturall, and supernaturall Visions, or Dreams. And consequently men had need to be °very circumspect, and° wary, in obeying [118]the voice of man, that pretending himself to be a Prophet, requires us to obey God in that way, which he in Gods name telleth us to be the way to happinesse.[118] For he that pretends to teach men the way of [119]so great felicity, pretends to govern them; that is to say,[119] to rule, and reign over them; which is a thing, that all men naturally desire, and [120]is[120] therefore worthy to be suspected of Ambition and Imposture; and consequently, ought to be examined, and tryed by every man, before hee yeeld them obedience; unless [121]he have yeelded it them already, in the institution of a Common-wealth; as when the Prophet[121] is the Civill Soveraign, or by the Civil Soveraign Authorized. And if this examination of Prophets, and Spirits, were not allowed to every one of the people, it had been to no purpose, to set out the marks, [122]by which every man might be able, to distinguish between those, whom they ought, and those whom they [231] ought not to follow.[122] Seeing therefore such marks are set out [Deut. 13. 1, &c.] to know a Prophet by; and [1 Iohn 4. 1. &c.] to know a Spirit by: and seeing there is so much Prophecying in the Old Testament; and so much Preaching in the New Testament against Prophets; and so much greater a number °ordinarily° of false Prophets, then of true; every one is [123]to beware of obeying their directions, at their own perill. And first, that there were many more false then true Prophets, appears by this, that when Ahab [1 Kings 12.][bd] consulted four hundred Prophets, they were all false Impostors, but onely one Michaiah. And a little before the time of the Captivity, the Prophets were generally lyars.[123] The Prophets (saith the Lord by Ieremy, cha. 14. verse 14.) prophecy Lies in my name. I sent them not, neither have I commanded them, nor spake unto them, they prophecy to you a false Vision, [124]a thing of naught[124]; and the deceit of their heart. [125]In so much as God commanded the People by the mouth of the Prophet Ieremiah [chap. 23. 16.] not to obey them. Thus saith the Lord of Hosts,[125] hearken not unto the words of the Prophets, that prophecy to you. They [126]make you vain,[126] they speak a Vision of their own heart, and not out of the mouth of the Lord.

All prophecy but of the Soveraign Prophet is to be examined by every Subject.

Seeing then there was in the °time of the° Old Testament,[be] such [127] quarrells amongst the Visionary Prophets, one contesting with another, and asking, When departed the Spirit from me, to go to thee? as between Michaiah, and the rest of the four hundred;[bf] and such giving of the Lye to one another, (as in Ierem. 14. 14.) and such [128] controversies in the New Testament[bg] at this day, amongst [129]the Spirituall Prophets:[129] Every man then was, and now is bound to make use of his Naturall Reason, to apply to [130]all Prophecy[130] those Rules which God hath given us, to discern the true from the false. Of which Rules, in the Old Testament, one was, conformable doctrine to that which Moses the Soveraign Prophet [131] had taught them; and the other the [132]miraculous power of foretelling what God would bring to passe,[132] as I have already shewn out of Deut. 13. 1. &c. And in the New Testament there was but one onely mark[133]; and that was the preaching of this Doctrine, That Iesus is the Christ, that is, the King of the Jews, [134]promised[134] in the Old Testament. Whosoever denyed that Article, he was a false Prophet, whatsoever miracles he might seem to work; °and he that taught it was a true Prophet.° For St. Iohn [135] [1 Epist. 4. 2, &c.] speaking °expressely° of the means to examine Spirits, whether they be of God, or not; °after he had told them that there would arise false Prophets,° saith thus, Hereby know ye the Spirit of God. Every Spirit that confesseth that Iesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God; that is, [136]is approved and allowed as a Prophet of God: not that he is a godly man, or one of the Elect, for this, that he confesseth, professeth, or preacheth Jesus to be the Christ; but for that he is a Prophet avowed.[136] For God sometimes speaketh by Prophets, whose persons he hath not accepted; as he did by Baalam; and °as he foretold Saul of his death,° by the Witch of Endor.[bh] Again in the next verse, [137] Every Spirit that [138]confesseth not that Iesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of Christ.[138] And this is °the Spirit° of Antichrist. So that the Rule is perfect[bi] on both [232] sides; that he is a true Prophet, which preacheth the Messiah already come, in the person of Jesus; and he a false one that denyeth him come, and looketh for [139]him[139] in some future Impostor, [140]that shall take upon him that honour falsely, whom the Apostle there properly calleth Antichrist. Every man therefore ought to consider who[140] is the Soveraign Prophet; that is to say, who [141]it is, that is Gods Vicegerent[bj] on Earth; and hath next under God, the Authority of Governing Christian men; and[141] to observe for a Rule, that Doctrine, which in the name of God, hee hath commanded to bee taught; [142]and thereby to examine and try out the truth of those Doctrines, which pretended[142] Prophets with miracle, or without, shall [143]at any time advance: and if they find it contrary to that Rule, to doe as they did, that came to Moses, and complained that there were some that Prophecyed in the Campe, whose Authority so to doe they doubted of;[bk] and leave to the Soveraign, as they did to Moses to uphold, or to forbid them, as hee should see cause; and if hee disavow them, then no more to obey their voice; or if he approve them, then to[143] obey them, as men to whom God hath given a part of the Spirit of [144]their Soveraigne.[144] For when Christian men, take

CHAP. XXXVII.

Of MIRACLES, and their Vse.

A Miracle is a work that causeth Admiration.

By Miracles are signified the Admirable[a] works of God: [1]& therefore they are also called Wonders. And because they are for the most part, done, for a signification of his commandement, in such occasions, as without them, men are apt to doubt, (following their private naturall reasoning,) what he hath commanded, and what not, they are commonly[1] in Holy Scripture, called Signes, [2] in the same sense, as they are called by [3]the Latines,[3] Ostenta, and Portenta,[b] [4]from shewing, and fore-signifying that, which the Almighty is about to bring to passe.[4]

And must therefore be rare, and whereof there is no naturall cause known.

To understand therefore what is a Miracle, we must first understand what works they are, which men wonder at, °and call Admirable.°[c] And there be but two things which make men wonder at any event: The one is, if it be strange, that is to say, such, as the like of it hath never, or very rarely been [5]produced:[5] The other is, if when it is produced, we cannot imagine it to have been done by naturall [6]means,[6] but onely by the immediate [7]hand[7] of God. But when wee [8]see[8] some possible, naturall cause of it, how rarely soever [9]the like[9] has been done; or if the like have been often [10]done, how impossible soever it be to imagine a naturall means[10] thereof, we no more wonder, nor esteem it for a Miracle.

Therefore, if a Horse, or Cow should speak, it [11]were[11] a Miracle;[d] because both the thing is strange, & the naturall cause [12]difficult[12] to imagin: So also were it, to see a strange deviation of nature, in the [13]production of some new shape of a living creature.[13] But when a man, or other Animal, engenders his like, though we know no more how this is done, than the other; [14]yet because 'tis usuall, it is no[14] Miracle. In like manner, if a man be metamorphosed into a stone, °or into a pillar,° it is a Miracle;[e] because strange: but if a peece of wood be so changed; because [15]we see it[15] often, it is no Miracle: and yet we know no more, by what operation of God, the one is brought to passe, than the other.

CAPVT XXXVII.

De Miraculis, & eorum usu.

Per Miracula intelliguntur opera Dei mirabilia. Quoniam autem dubitare solent homines suam ipsorum sequuti Rationem naturalem, utrum quod à Propheta pro mandato Dei pronuntiatur, mandatum ipsius Dei sit necne, Miracula in Sacris Scripturis vocantur Signa, ut quae voluntatis Dei signa sunt; sicut etiam apud Scriptores Ethnicos, propter eandem causam vocantur Ostenta & Portenta.[b] Vt intelligatur ergò, quid sit Miraculum, observandum est, quaenam opera ea sint, quae homines Admirantur. Sunt autem, quae faciunt, ut opus aliquod admirentur, duae tantum res. Altera si sit rarum, cujus simile raro aut nunquam ante factum viderant; altera, si postquam factum est, concipere non possunt per causas naturales factum esse, sed solummodo per operationem Dei immediatam. Nam si facti causas naturales intelligimus, utcunque opus rarum fuerit, vel si factum simile saepe viderimus, etsi causam ejus naturalem non concipimus, non amplius admiramur, nec Miraculum appellamus.

Itaque si Bos aut Equus loqueretur, Miraculum vocaretur,[d] quia [204] rarum, & cujus causam naturalem non possumus imaginari. Similiter in generatione animalium, naturae deviatio omnis insolita, pro Miraculo haberetur. At si Homo vel animal aliud sui simile generet, quanquam & hoc & illud quomodo factum sit aequè nesciamus, Miraculum esse non putamus. Item si homo transformaretur in lapidem, Miraculum esset; quia rarum. Sed si lignum ita mutaretur, quia saepe fit, Miraculum non est; aequè tamen ignoramus, quomodo id in homine & ligno Deus operetur.

[a] 'Admirable' here has the sense of causing admiration, i.e., wonder or surprise (OED, 'admirable', a., 1; 'admiration', 1).

[b] Both terms (derived from the verbs 'ostendo', to 'show'; 'portendo', to 'portend', 'foretell') mean 'portents', the former with the connotation that the portent consists of something wonderful or strange.

[c] See above, note a. [d] Cf. Num. 22: 28–30. [e] Cf. Gen. 19: 26.

The first Rainbow that was seen in the world, was a Miracle, because the first; and consequently strange; and [16]served for[16] a sign from God, placed in heaven, to assure his people, there should be no more °an universall° destruction of the world by Water.[f] But at this day, because they are [17]frequent, they are not Miracles, neither to them that know their naturall causes, nor to them who know them not.[17] Again, there be many [18]rare[18] works produced by the Art of man: yet [19]when we know they are so done; because thereby wee know also the means[19] how they are done, we count them not for Miracles, °because not [234] wrought by the immediate hand of God, but by mediation of humane Industry.°

That which seemeth a Miracle to one man, may seem otherwise to another.

Furthermore, seeing Admiration[g] [20]and Wonder, is consequent to[20] the knowledge and experience, wherewith men are endued, [21]some more, some lesse; it followeth, that the same thing, may be a Miracle to one, and not[21] to another. And thence it is, that ignorant, and superstitious men make great Wonders of those works, which other men, [22]knowing to proceed from Nature, (which is not the immediate, but the ordinary work of God,)[22] admire not at all: As when Ecclipses of the Sun and Moon have been taken for supernaturall works, by the common people; when [23]neverthelesse, there were others, could from their naturall causes, have foretold the very hour they should arrive:[23] Or, as when a [24] man, by confederacy, °and secret intelligence,° getting knowledge of the private actions of an ignorant, unwary man, thereby tells him, [25]what he has done in former time; it seems to him a Miraculous thing;[25] but amongst wise, and cautelous[h] men, such [26]Miracles as those, cannot[26] easily be done.

The End of Miracles.

Again, it belongeth to the nature of a Miracle, that it be wrought for the procuring of credit [27] to Gods Messengers, Ministers, and Prophets; that thereby men may know, they are [28]called, sent, and employed by God, and thereby be the better inclined to obey them.[28] And therefore, though the creation of the world, and after that the °destruction of all living creatures in the° universall deluge, were [29] admirable[i] works; yet because they were not done to procure credit to any °Prophet, or other° Minister of God, they use not to be called Miracles. °For how admirable soever any work be, the Admiration consisteth not in that it could be done, because men naturally beleeve the Almighty can doe all things, but because he does it at the Prayer, or Word of a man.° But the works of God in Egypt, by the hand of Moses, were °properly°

Arcus primus in Coelo apparens, Miraculum erat; quia primus, id est insolitus; & quia pro signo in Coelo à Deo ostensus est, ad significandum non amplius diluvio periturum esse mundum.[f] Verum hodie, quia arcus coelestes videntur saepe, Miracula nemini sunt. Rursus opera Mirabilia Arte humana multa producuntur; quia tamen postquam facta sunt, quomodo facta sunt, intelligimus, non habemus ea pro Miraculis.

Admiratio dependet plerumque à scientia & experientia hominum, ita ut alii videatur, quod vidit Miraculum, alii non videatur. Itaque homines imperiti & superstitiosi pro magnis Miraculis habere solent ea, quae periti doctique omnino non mirantur. Eclipses Solis & Lunae pro operibus supernaturalibus à vulgo habitae quondam sunt; quarum causas naturales docti viri intelligentes, eas praedixerunt. Etiam homines callidi inter se confoederati, secretas actiones incauti & imperiti hominis exquirentes, easdemque ipsi post narrantes, magnae admirationi fuerunt, cum cautis prudentibusque viris non tam facile imponere potuissent.

Ad naturam Miraculi etiam pertinet, ut eo fine factum sit, ut Nunciis, Ministris & Prophetis Dei fides apud populum habeatur, sciatque inde populus missos illos esse à Deo. Itaque Creatio Mundi, & postea Diluvium universale mirabilissima opera erant; quoniam tamen non eo fine à Deo facta erant, ut Ministro suo fidem facerent, Miracula appellari non solent. Sed opera Dei in Aegypto per Mosem, Miracula erant; propterea quod eo fine facta sunt, ut

Miracles; because they were done with intention to make the people of Israel beleeve, that Moses came unto them, not out of any design of his owne interest, but as sent from God. Therefore after God had commanded him to deliver the Israelites from the Egyptian bondage, when [30]he said[30] They will not beleeve me, but will say, the Lord hath not appeared unto me, God gave him power, to turn the Rod he had in his hand into a Serpent, and again to return it into a Rod; and [31]by putting his hand into his bosome, to make it leprous; and again by pulling it out[31] to make it whole, to make the Children of Israel beleeve °(as it is verse 5.)° that the God of their Fathers had appeared unto him: And if that were not enough, he gave him power to turn their waters into bloud. And when hee had done these Miracles before the people, it is said °(verse 41.)° [j] that they beleeved him. Neverthelesse, for fear of Pharaoh, they [32]durst not yet[32] obey him. Therefore [33]the other works which were done to plague Pharaoh, and the Egyptians, tended all[33] to make the Israelites beleeve in Moses, °and were properly Miracles.° In like manner if we consider all the Miracles done by [34]the hand of[34] Moses, and °all the rest of° the Prophets, till the Captivity; and those of our Saviour, and his Apostles °afterward;° we shall find, their end was alwaies to beget, or confirm [235] beleefe, that they came not of their own motion, but were sent by God. [35]Wee may further observe in Scripture, that[35] the end of Miracles, was to beget beleef, not universally in all men, °elect, and reprobate;° but in the elect only; that is to say, in such as [36]God had determined should become his Subjects.[36] For those °miraculous° plagues of Egypt, had not for end, the conversion of Pharaoh; For God had [37]told Moses[37] before, that he would harden the heart of Pharaoh, that he should not let the people goe: And when he let them goe °at last,° not the Miracles °perswaded him,° but the plagues forced him to it.[k] So also of our Saviour, it is written, (Mat. 13. 58.) that he wrought not many Miracles in his own countrey, because of their unbeleef; and (in Marke 6. 5.) [38]in stead of, he wrought not many, it is, he could work none. It was not because[38] he wanted power; °which to say, were blasphemy against God;° nor that the end of Miracles was not to convert incredulous men °to Christ;° for the end of all the [j] Correctly: verse 31. [k] Exod. 4: 21; 12: 29–31. [l] The Latin gives vv. 5–6. It quotes Vulg, where 'virtutem' [AV: 'mighty work'] might be translated as 'operation of power'.

Miracles of Moses, of the Prophets, of our Saviour, and of his Apostles was to adde men to the Church; [39]but it was, because the end of their Miracles, was to adde to the Church (not all men, but) such as should be saved; that is to say, such as God had elected. Seeing therefore our Saviour was sent from his Father, hee could not use his power in the conversion of those, whom his Father had rejected.[39] They that expounding this place of St. Marke, say, that this word, Hee could not, is put for, He would not,[m] do it [40] without example in the Greek tongue, °(where Would not, is put sometimes for Could not, in things inanimate, that have no will; but Could not, for Would not, never,) and thereby lay a stumbling block before weak Christians; as if Christ could doe no Miracles, but amongst the credulous.°

The definition of a Miracle.

From that which I have here set down, of the nature, °and use° of a Miracle, we may define it thus, A MIRACLE, is a work of God, (besides [41]his operation by the way[41] of Nature, ordained in the Creation,) done, for the making manifest to his elect, the mission of an extraordinary Minister for their salvation.

And from this definition, we may inferre; First, that [42]in all Miracles, the work done,[42] is not the effect of any vertue in the Prophet; [43]because it is the effect of the immediate hand of God; that is to say, God hath done it, without using the Prophet therein, as a subordinate cause.[43]

Secondly, that no Devil, Angel, or °other° created Spirit, can do a Miracle. For it [44]must either be[44] by vertue of some naturall science, or by Incantation, [45] that is, by vertue of words. For if the Inchanters do it by their own power °independent,° there is some power that proceedeth not from God; which all men deny: and if they doe it by [46]power given them, then is the work not from the immediate hand of God, but naturall, and consequently no Miracle.[46]

22 is, by this edn.; is {by added by TH} MS] is, H, B

[39] . So what should we say, except that our Saviour, being sent by his Father, could not use the power given to him by his Father in any other way than for the conversion of those alone whom his Father had not rejected? [40] ^ unnecessarily and [41] the operation [42] a miracle

[43] at whose word it was done, but an immediate work of God.

[44] is not to be called a 'miracle' if it is done [45] ^ or charm,

[46] an extraordinary power given by God, it is not their miracle, but one done immediately by God.

[m] The Geneva Bible gives the text as 'And he could there do no great workes', and adds the marginal note: 'That is, he would not.'

Miracula Moses & Prophetae, & ipse Christus, & Apostoli ejus, homines ad Ecclesiam aggregandi causa omnia fecerunt. Quid ergo dicendum est, nisi quod Servator noster missus à Patre, Potentia à Patre data aliter uti non potuit, quam ad conversionem eorum tantùm quos Pater ejus non reprobaverat. Quod locum hunc S. Marci exponentes quidam poni dicunt, non poterat,[m] pro non voluit, non necessariò id faciunt, & sine exemplo linguae Graecae. Ab his, quae jam dicta sunt de natura Miraculi, definiri potest, Miraculum esse opus Dei (praeter operationem naturae in Creatione ordinatam) eo fine factum, ut cognoscerent Electi Nuncium à Deo extraordinarium ad eos salutis eorum causa missum esse.

Ab hac autem definitione inferimus, primò, Miraculum non esse effectum Virtutis alicujus in ipso Propheta, ad cujus verbum factum est, sed opus Dei immediatum.

Secundò, neque Diabolum, neque Angelum, neque Spiritum creatum quemcunque Miraculum facere posse. Nam neque si virtute Naturalis alicujus Scientiae id faciunt, neque si Incantatione, aut Excantatione, id est Virtute Verborum Miraculum dicendum est. Si propria Potentia id facere possit Incantator, Potentia aliqua esset, quae à Deo non dependeret; quod omnes negant. Sin Potentia à Deo data extraordinaria faciat, Miraculum ejus non est, sed Dei factum immediatum. [206]

There be some texts of Scripture, that seem to attribute the power of working [47]wonders (equall to some of those immediate Miracles, wrought by God himself,) to certain[47] Arts of Magick, and Incantation. As for example, when we read that after the Rod of Moses being [236] cast on the ground became Exod. 7. 11. a Serpent, the Magicians of Egypt did the like by their Enchantments; and that after Moses had turned the waters of the [48]Egyptian Streams, Rivers, Ponds,
Exod. 7. 22. and Pooles of water[48] into blood, the Magicians of Egypt did so likewise, with their Enchantments; and that after Moses had by the power of God brought Exod. 8. 7. frogs upon the land[49], the Magicians also did so [50]with their Enchantments, and brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt; will not a man be apt to attribute Miracles to Enchantments; that is to say, to the efficacy of[50] the sound of Words; and think the same [51]very well proved out of this, and other such places?[51] and yet there is no place of Scripture, that telleth us what an Enchantment is. If therefore Enchantment be not, as many think it, a working of [52]strange[52] effects by [53]spells,[53] and words; but Imposture, and delusion, wrought [54]by ordinary means;[54] and so far from supernaturall, as the Impostors need not [55]the study so much as[55] of naturall causes, but the ordinary ignorance, stupidity, and superstition of mankind, to doe them; those texts that [56] seem to countenance [57]the power of Magick, Witchcraft,[57] and Enchantment, must needs have another sense, than at first sight they seem to bear.

That men are apt to be deceived by false Miracles.

For it is evident enough, that Words have no effect, but on those that understand them; and then they have no other, but to signifie the [58]intentions, or passions[58] of them that speak; °and thereby produce, hope, fear, or other passions, or conceptions in the hearer.° Therefore when a Rod seemeth a Serpent, or the Waters Bloud, or any other Miracle seemeth done by Enchantment; if it be not to the edification of Gods people, not the Rod, nor the Water, nor any other thing is enchanted; °that is to say, wrought upon by the Words,° but the Spectator. So that all the Miracle [59] consisteth in this, that [60]the Enchanter[60] has deceived a man; which is no Miracle, °but a very easie matter to doe.°

Sunt Scripturae Sacrae loca aliqua, quae Miraculorum operationem attribuere videntur Incantationibus, & Artibus Magicis; ut ubi legimus quod postquam Moses Virgam suam projiciendo in terram convertisset in Serpentem, Magi Aegyptii simile fecerunt Incantationibus suis. Et quod postquam Moses aquas Aegyptiorum convertisset in Sanguinem, idem fecerunt Magi Incantationibus suis; & postquam Moses per Potentiam Dei in terras Aegyptiorum induxisset ranas, simile fecerunt Magi; Nonne Miracula efficaciam habere à sono verborum, & ab his locis satis probari existimabimus? Attamen nullus Scripturae locus docet, quid sit Incantatio. Itaque si Incantatio non sit (ut multi esse putant) effectio Mirabilium per Verba & Sonos, sed Impostura, & modis naturalibus facta illusio, adeoque procul ab operatione supernaturali, ut Impostores ipsi scientia nulla causarum naturalium, ut ea faciant nec alia re indigeant, quam ignorantia, stupore, & superstitione communi generis humani; loca illa, quae opinioni de Magia & Incantationibus favere videri possunt; alium sensum habere debent, quam primo intuitu habere videantur.

Satis enim manifestum est Verba effectum, nisi in eos qui intelligunt, habere nullum. Neque effectum in ipsos intelligentes ullum, praeter declarationem quid cogitant illi qui loquuntur. Itaque quando Virga videtur Serpens, aut Aqua sanguis, aut aliud Miraculum factum videtur per Incantationem; nisi fiat ad populi Dei aedificationem, neque Virga neque Aqua, neque aliud Incantatur praeter Spectatorem, totumque Miraculum Incantatoris in eo consistit ut Impostor hominem deceperit; quod Miraculum non est.

For such is the ignorance, and aptitude to error generally of all men, but especially of them that have not much knowledge of naturall causes, and of the [61]nature, and interests of men; as by innumerable and easie tricks to be abused. What opinion of miraculous power, before it was known there was a Science of the course of the Stars, might a man have gained, that should have told the people, This hour, or day the Sun should be darkned? A Juggler by the handling of his goblets, and other trinkets, if it were not now ordinarily practised, would be thought to do his wonders by the power at least of the Devil. A man that hath practised to speak by drawing in of his breath, (which kind of men in antient time were called Ventriloqui,) and so make the weaknesse of his voice seem to proceed, not from the weak impulsion of the organs of Speech, but from distance of place, is able to make very many men beleeve it is a voice from Heaven, whatsoever he please to tell them. And for a crafty man, that hath enquired into the secrets, and familiar confessions that one man ordinarily maketh to another of his actions and adventures past, to tell them him again is no hard matter; and yet there be many, that by such means as that, obtain the reputation of being Conjurers.[61 p] But it is too [237] long a businesse, to reckon up the severall sorts of °those men, which the Greeks called° Thaumaturgi, that is to say, workers of things wonderfull; and yet these do all they do, by their own single dexterity. But if we looke upon the Impostures wrought by Confederacy, [62]there is nothing how impossible soever to be done, that is impossible[62] to bee beleeved. For [63]two[63] men conspiring, one to seem lame, the other to cure him with a charme, will deceive many: but many conspiring, one to seem lame, another so to cure him, and all the rest to bear witnesse; will deceive many more.

Sed si Imposturas eorum consideremus, qui foederati faciunt, nihil factu impossibile videbitur, quod possibile est credi. Homines enim improbi si duo tantum conspirarent, unus ut simularet se claudum esse, alter ut Incantatione illum sanet, multos deciperent: sed si conspirent multi, ut unus simularet se claudum esse, alter ut eum sanet, & reliqui omnes, ut testimonium dicant, decipient multo plures.

Cautions against the Imposture of Miracles.

In this aptitude of mankind, to give too hasty beleefe to °pretended° Miracles, there can be no better, °nor I think any other° caution, then that which God hath prescribed, first by Moses, (as I have said before °in the precedent chapter,°)[q] in the beginning °of the 13.° and end of the 18. of Deuteronomy; That wee take not any for Prophets, that teach any other Religion, then that which [64]Gods Lieutenant, (which at that time was Moses,) hath established; nor any, (though he teach the same Religion,) whose Praediction we doe not see come to passe.[64] Moses therefore in his time, and Aaron, and his successors in their times, [65]and the Soveraign Governour of Gods people, next under God himself, that is to say, the Head of the Church[65] in all times, are to be consulted, what doctrine [66]he hath established,[66] before wee give credit to [67]a pretended[67] Miracle, or Prophet. And when [68]that is done, the thing they pretend to be a Miracle,[68] we must both see it [69]done,[69] and use all means possible to [70]consider, whether it be really done; and not onely so, but whether it be such, as no man can do the like by his naturall power, but that it requires the immediate hand of God. And in this also we must have recourse to Gods Lieutenant; to whom in all doubtfull cases, wee have submitted our private judgments.[70] For example; if a man pretend, that after certain words spoken [71] over a peece of bread, that [72]presently[t] God hath made it not[72] bread, but a God, or a man, °or both,° and neverthelesse it looketh still as like bread as ever it did; there is no reason for any man to think it really done; nor °consequently° to fear him, till he enquire of God, by his °Vicar, or° Lieutenant[73], whether it be done, or not. If he say not, then followeth that which Moses saith, (Deut. 18. 22) he hath spoken it presumptuously, thou shalt not fear him. If he say 'tis done, then he is not to contradict it. So also if wee see not, but

[64] he who bears the person of God in the commonwealth permits by laws; nor, also, should we take those men for prophets, if they try[s] to force on us some new article [of faith], without an undoubted miracle. As [65] so too the sovereign rulers of a Christian people, that is, the sovereign governors of churches,
[66] they have permitted to be taught, [67] an unknown
[68] a miracle is claimed on behalf of new doctrines, [69] ourselves,
[70] investigate and examine it, and judge the truth of the miracle in accordance with public reason, that is, in accordance with the reason of the sovereign of the commonwealth. [71] ^ by him

In tali generis humani proclivitate, fidem Miraculis temerè adhibendi, cautela melior esse non potest, quam quae à Deo per Mosem (ut ante dictum est)[q] docetur in Cap. 18. Deuteronomii initio, & fine;[r] nempe, ne pro Prophetis habeamus illos, qui Religionem [207] aliam docent, quàm quae ab eo, qui personam Dei in Civitate gerit, Legibus pemittitur; neque etiam illos, si novum aliquem articulum obtrudere conentur,[s] pro Prophetis habeamus, sine Miraculo indubitato. Itaque ut Moses suo tempore, & Aaron Successoresque ejus temporibus suis; ita Summi Imperantes in populo Christiano, id est Ecclesiarum Summi rectores omnibus temporibus consulendi sunt, quas doctrinas doceri permiserunt, antequam Miraculis aut Prophetis ignotis fidem habeamus. Etiam Miracula, quae praetenduntur doctrinis novis, debemus videre ipsi, & quantum possumus excutere, & examinare, & secundum Rationem publicam, id est secundum rationem ejus qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem, de veritate Miraculi judicare. Exempli gratiâ, si quis dicat, quod post certa verba ab ipso prolata super buccam Panis, non sit amplius Panis, sed Deus, vel Homo, etsi oculis, ut ante, Panis videatur; causa nulla est, cur quis ita factum realiter esse putet, neque illum timeat, donec à Deo per illum, qui locum ejus in Civitate tenet, utrum realiter factum sit necne, inquisierit; & siquidem ille negat, tunc sequitur id, quod à Mose dictum est Deut. 18. 22. temere loquutus est, non timebis illum; sin factum esse realiter dicat, acquiescendum est. Item in Miraculis quae non vidimus facta, sed fama

[q] In the English, Hobbes apparently refers to Ch. 36, pp. 676–9; but that passage mentions only Deut. 13, and refers back to the substantive discussion in Ch. 32, pp. 582–5, where the beginning of Deut. 13 and the end of Deut. 18 were quoted. In the Latin, the omission of the reference to the precedent chapter suggests that Hobbes had noticed that the passage he had in mind was not in Ch. 36.

[r] Comparison with the English shows that the Latin (which means 'in the beginning and the end of ch. 18 of Deuteronomy') is defective here; the original may perhaps have been 'in Cap. 13. Deuteronomii initio, & in Cap. 18. fine' (which gives the meaning of the English).

[s] To accord with the meaning of the English, 'though he teach the same Religion', the Latin here could be emended by adding 'non' ('not'): 'if they do not try to force on us some new article'. However, the argument in the next sentence of the Latin suggests that the Latin here is correct as it stands.

And [76]this is chiefly the case of men, that in these days live under Christian Soveraigns.[76] For in these times, I do not know one man, that ever saw any such wondrous work, done by the charm, or at the word, or prayer of a man, that a [77]man endued but with a mediocrity of reason, would[77] think supernaturall: and the question is no more, whether [78]what wee see done, be a Miracle; whether the Miracle we[78] hear, or read of, were a reall work, [79]and not[79] the Act of a tongue, or pen; °but in plain terms, whether the report be true, or a lye.° In which question we are not [80]every one, to make[80] our own private Reason, or Conscience, but the Publique Reason, [81]that is, the reason of Gods Supreme Lieutenant, Judge; and indeed we have made him Judge already, if wee have [238] given him a Soveraign power, to doe all that is necessary for our peace and defence.[81] A private man has alwaies the liberty, (because thought is free,) to beleeve, or not beleeve °in his heart,° those acts that have been [82]given out for Miracles, according as he shall see, what benefit can accrew by mens belief, to those that pretend, or countenance them, and thereby conjecture, whether they be Miracles, or Lies.[82] But when it comes to confession of that faith, the Private [83]Reason must submit to the Publique; that is to say, to Gods Lieutenant.[83] But who is this °Lieutenant of God, and Head of the Church,° shall be considered in its proper place hereafter.[u] [84]

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Of the Signification in Scripture of ETERNALL LIFE, HELL, SALVATION, THE WORLD TO COME, and REDEMPTION.

The maintenance of Civill Society, depending on Justice; and Justice on the power of Life and Death, and other lesse °Rewards and° Punishments, residing in them that have the Soveraignty of the Common-wealth; It is impossible a Common-wealth should stand, where any other [1]than the Soveraign,[1] hath a power of giving greater rewards than Life; and of inflicting greater punishments, than Death. Now seeing Eternall life is a greater reward, than the life present; and Eternall torment a greater punishment than the death of Nature; It is a thing worthy to be well considered, of all men that desire (by [2]obeying Authority)[2] to avoid the [3]calamities of Confusion, and[3] Civill war, what is meant in holy Scripture, by Life Eternall, and Torment Eternall; and for what offences, and against whom committed, men are to be Eternally tormented; and for what actions, they are to [4]obtain[4] Eternall life.

The place of Adams Eternity if he had not sinned, had been the terrestiall Paradise.

°And first° we find, that Adam was created in such a condition of life, as had he not broken the commandement of God, he had [5]enjoyed it in the Paradise of Eden Everlastingly.[5] For there was the Tree of life; whereof he was so long allowed to eat, as he should forbear to eat of the tree of Knowledge of Good and Evill; °which was not allowed him.° [a] And therefore as soon as he had eaten of [6]it,[6] God thrust him out of Paradise, lest he should put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and[7] live for ever.[8] By which it seemeth °to

CAPVT XXXVIII.

De significatione quam habent in Scripturis Sacris Vocabula Vita aeterna, Infernum, Salvatio, Mundus venturus, & Redemptio.

Quoniam Societatis Civilis conservatio dependet à Iustitia; & Iustitia à Potestate Vitae & Necis, aliarumque Poenarum leviorum (quam Potestatem habet is, qui Summam in Civitate Potestatem possidet) impossibile esset conservari Civitatem illam, in quâ Persona alia sit, quae Potestatem habeat majores infligendi poenas quam est mors, vel majora praemia tribuendi, quam est vita. Cum ergo Vita aeterna praemium majus est quam Vita praesens, & Cruciatus aeterni poena gravior, quam mors naturalis; res diligentia multa digna est, illis, qui per obedientiam civilem, confusionem calamitatesque belli civilis vitare cupiunt, quid sit quod in Sacris Scripturis per Vitam aeternam, & Cruciatus aeternos intelligendum est perscrutari; & propter quae crimina, & contra quos commissa, cruciandi in Aeternum sunt; & propter quae facta Vita aeterna fruituri sunt.

Adamum ea conditione creatum esse legimus, ut nisi mandatum Dei violâsset, potuisset in aeternum vixisse in Paradiso, ubi à Deo ab initio collocatus erat. In Paradiso enim erat Arbor Vitae; cujus esus illi tamdiu permissus erat, quamdiu ab esu fructus Arboris Scientiae Boni & Mali se abstinuisset. Itaque quam primum ex fructu Arboris hujus vetito comedisset, Deus illum è Paradiso expulit, ne forte mittat manum suam, & sumat etiam de ligno Vitae & comedat & vivat in aeternum. me, (with submission neverthelesse both in this, and in all questions, whereof the determination dependeth on the Scriptures, to the interpretation of the Bible authorized by the Common-wealth, whose Subject I am,)° that Adam if he had not sinned, had had an Eternall Life [9] on Earth: and that Mortality entred upon himself, and his posterity, by his first Sin. [10] Not that actuall Death then entred; for °Adam then could never have had children; whereas° he lived long after, and saw a numerous posterity ere he dyed. But where it is said, In the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt [11]surely die,[11 b] it must needs bee meant [12] of his Mortality, and certitude of death. [13] Seeing then Eternall life was lost by [14]Adams forfeiture, in committing sin, he that should cancell that forfeiture was to recover thereby, that Life again.[14] Now [239] Jesus Christ hath [15]satisfied for[15] the sins of all that beleeve in him; and therefore recovered to all beleevers, that ETERNALL LIFE, which was lost by [16]the sin of Adam.[16] And in this sense it is, that the comparison of St. Paul holdeth[d] (Rom. 5. 18, 19.)[e] As by the offence of one, [17]Iudgment came upon all men to condemnation,[17] even so by the righteousnesse of one, [18]the free gift came upon all men to Iustification of Life. Which is again[18] (1 Cor. 15. 21, 22.) °more perspicuously delivered in these words,° For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive.

Texts concerning the place of Life Eternall, for Beleevers.

Concerning the place wherein men shall enjoy that Eternall Life, [19]which Christ hath obtained for them, the texts next before alledged[19 f] seem to make it on Earth. For if [20]as in Adam, all die, that is, have forfeited Paradise, and Eternall Life on Earth, even so in Christ all shall bee made alive; then all men shall be made to live on Earth; for else the comparison were not proper.[20] Hereunto seemeth to agree that of the Psalmist, (Psal. 133. 3.) [21]Vpon Zion God commanded the blessing, even Life for evermore: for Zion, is in Jerusalem, upon Earth:[21] as also that of S. Joh. (Rev. 2. 7.) To him that overcommeth I will give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the Paradise of God. This was the tree of Adams Eternall life; but °his life was to have been° virtute naturae suae, sed per gratiam Dei adventitiam, nempe, virtute Arboris Vitae, cujus comedendi dum copiam haberet, non potuit mori. Videtur ergo Adamus nisi peccâsset victurus fuisse in terrestri Paradiso in aeternum; Mortalitatem autem in se & posteros suos intrasse per hoc peccatum ejus primum; Mortalitatem, inquam, tunc statim intrasse, non Mortem ipsam. Vixit enim longo post tempore, suamque vidit antequam moreretur posteritatem numerosam. Vbi autem dicitur, in quocunque die comederis ex eo, morte morieris,[b] intelligendum [209] est, non de morte in illo die, sed de certitudine mortis, id est de Mortalitate. Quod autem non dicitur simpliciter morieris, sed morte morieris, ita intelligendum est (ut interpretatur Athanasius) quando morieris, non revivisces.[c] Cum ergo Vita aeterna per peccatum amissa esset, manifestum est, quod quicunque peccatum illud aboleret, Vitam illi aeternam, quam perdiderat, restituturus esset. Sed Iesus Christus peccatum illius, & omnium in ipsum credentium abolevit, & proinde omnibus credentibus Vitam illam aeternam, quam perdidit Adamus recuperavit, nempe Vitam in Paradiso futuram. Siquidem enim perdidit Adamus Paradisum, & Vitam illic aeternam; Paradisum & Vitam illic aeternam, credentibus in ipsum Christus recuperavit, nec aliam. Cui doctrinae congruere videtur quod dicit Psalmista (Psal. 133. 3.) Dominus, qui fecit Coelos & Terram, benedicat tibi è Zion.[g] Alioqui dixisset benedicat tibi è Coelo; item Iohannes Apoc. 2. 7. Illi, qui vincit dabo comedere ex fructu Arboris Vitae, quae est in medio Paradisi Dei, quae Arbor, Adamo Arbor Vitae erat, sed in Terra. on Earth. The same seemeth to be confirmed again by St. Joh. (Rev. 21. 2.) where he saith, I Iohn saw the Holy City, New Ierusalem, coming down [22]from God out of heaven, prepared[22] as a Bride adorned for her husband: [23]and again v. 10. to the same effect: As if he should say, the new Jerusalem, the Paradise of God, at the coming again of Christ, should come down to Gods people from Heaven, and not they goe up to it from Earth. And this differs nothing from that, which the two men in white clothing (that is, the two Angels) said to the Apostles, that were looking upon Christ ascending[23] (Acts 1. 11.) This same Iesus, who is taken up °from you° into Heaven, shall so come, as you have seen him go up °into Heaven.° Which soundeth[i] as if they had said, he should come [24]down to govern them under his Father, Eternally[24] here; and not take them up to govern them in Heaven; and is conformable to the Restauration of the Kingdom of God, instituted under Moses; which was a [25]Political government[25] of the Jews on Earth. Again, that saying of our Saviour (Mat. 22. 30.) that in the Resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but [26]are[26] as the Angels of God in heaven, is a description of an Eternall Life, resembling that which we lost in Adam, in the point of Marriage. For °seeing° Adam, and Eve, if they had not sinned, had lived [27]on Earth Eternally, in their individuall persons; it is manifest, they should not continually have procreated their kind.[27] For if Immortals should have generated, as Mankind doth now; the Earth in a small time, would not have been able to afford them place to stand on. The Jews that asked [28]our Saviour the question, whose wife the woman that had married many brothers,[28] should be, in the resurrection,[j] [29]knew not what were[29] the consequences of Life Eternall: and therefore our Saviour [30]puts them in mind of this consequence of Immortality; that there shal be no Generation, and consequently no marriage, no more than there is Marriage, or[30] generation among the Angels.[k] The comparison between that Eternall life which Adam lost, and [31]our Saviour by his Victory over[31] death hath recovered;[l] [240] holdeth also in this, that as Adam lost Eternall Life by his sin, and yet lived after it for a time; so the faithful Christian hath [32]recovered[32] Eternal Life by Christs [33]passion,[33] though he die a natural death, and remaine dead for a time; namely, till the Resurrection. For as Death is reckoned [34]from the Condemnation of Adam, not from the Execution; so Life is reckoned from the Absolution, not from the Resurrection of them that are elected in Christ.[34]

Ascension into heaven.

That the place wherein [35]men[35] are to live Eternally, after the Resurrection, is the Heavens, meaning by Heaven, those parts °of the world,° which are the most remote from Earth, as where the stars are, or °above the stars,° in another Higher Heaven, called [36] Coelum Empyreum,[n] [37](whereof there is no mention in Scripture, nor ground in Reason) is not easily to be drawn from any[37] text that I can find. By the Kingdome of Heaven, is meant the Kingdom of [38]the King[38] that dwelleth in Heaven; [39]and his Kingdome was the people of Israel, whom he ruled by the Prophets his[39] Lieutenants, first Moses, and after him Eleazar,[p] and the [40]Soveraign Priests, till in the days of Samuel they rebelled, and would have a mortall man for their King, after the manner of other Nations.[40] [q] And when our Saviour °Christ,° by the preaching of his Ministers, shall have [41]perswaded the Jews to return, and called the Gentiles to his obedience,[41] then shall there be a new Kingdom of Heaven; °because our King shall then be God, whose throne is Heaven;° without any necessity evident in the Scripture, that man shall ascend to his happinesse any higher than [42]Gods footstool the Earth.[42] [r] On the contrary, we find written (Ioh. 3. 13.) that no man hath ascended into Heaven, but he that came down from Heaven, even the Son of man, that is in Heaven. °Where I observe by the way, that these words are not, as those which go immediately before, the words of our Saviour, but of St. John himself; for Christ was then not in Heaven, but upon the Earth.° The like is said °of David° (Acts 2. 34.) where St. Peter, to prove à Christo morte sua restitutam,[l] etiam in hoc congrua est, quod sicut Adamus, etsi Vitam aeternam peccato suo perdidit, vixit tamen postea aliquamdiu; ita Christiani fideles Vitam aeternam morte Christi receperunt, & tamen moriuntur morte naturali, & mortui aliquamdiu manent, nimirum usque ad Resurrectionem. Sicut enim Mors computata est in Adamo, non ab ipsa Morte, sed à Condemnatione; ita etiam Electorum Vita ab Absolutione sive remissione peccatorum, non à Resurrectione computatur.[m]

the Ascension of Christ, using the words of the Psalmist, (Psal. 16. 10.) Thou wilt not leave my soule in Hell, nor suffer thine Holy one to see corruption, saith, they were spoken (not of David, but) of Christ; and to prove it, addeth this Reason, For David is not ascended into Heaven. But to this a man may easily answer, and say, that though their bodies were not to ascend [43]till the generall day of [43] Judgment, yet their souls [44]were in Heaven [44] as soon as they were departed from their bodies; which also seemeth to be confirmed by the words of our Saviour (Luke 20. 37, 38.) who proving the Resurrection out of the words of Moses, saith thus, That the dead [45]are[45] raised, even Moses shewed, [46]at the bush, when he calleth the Lord,[46] the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Iacob. For he is not a God of the Dead, but of the Living; °for they all live to him.° But if these words be to be understood °only° of the Immortality of the Soul, they prove not at all that which [47]our Saviour [47] intended to prove, which was the Resurrection of the Body, that is to say, the Immortality of the Man. Therefore our Saviour [48]meaneth,[48] that those Patriarchs were Immortall; not by a property consequent to the essence, °and nature° of mankind; but by the will of God, that was pleased of his mere grace, to bestow Eternall life upon the [49]faithfull.[49] [241] And though at that time the Patriarchs and many other faithfull men were dead, yet [50]as it is in the text, they lived to God; that is, they [50] were written in the Book of Life[s] [51] with them that were absolved of their sinnes, and ordained to Life eternall at the Resurrection. That the Soul of man is in its own nature Eternall, and a living Creature independent on the body; or that any meer man is Immortall, otherwise than by the Resurrection in the last day, (except Enos[t] and Elias,[u]) is a doctrine not apparent in Scripture.[51] The whole 14. [50] Christ said that they lived. The reason was that their names [51] ; and therefore he added these words, as we see in the text, that 'they lived to God'. But what reason is there why the souls of the just should go into Heaven before their bodies, when men are not to receive the reward of their works before the Judgement (as is evident from Luke 14: 14,[v] 'When thou makest a feast, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, and the blind, and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee; for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just' [AV])? So before the resurrection, the soul has nothing to do in Heaven, even if it were to exist through its own nature. This expression 'immortal soul' is found nowhere in Holy Scripture; but 'eternal life' is found in many places. [52] ^ one of

Christi ascensionem, utens verbis Psalmistae (Psal. 16. 10.) Non relinques animam meam in inferno, nec dabis sanctum tuum videre corruptionem, dicit Petrus, non ea de Davide sed de Christo dicta esse; probans ex eo, quod David non ascendit in Coelum. Sed huic loco respondere aliquis poterit, quod etsi corpora eorum non ascensura erant in Coelum ante diem Iudicii ultimi; animae tamen eorum ascenderunt simul atque ex corporibus eorum excesserant; quod confirmari videtur ex verbis Servatoris nostri Luc. 20. 37, 38, qui probans Resurrectionem ex verbis Mosis, sic dicit, Mortuos resurrecturos esse, etiam ostendit Moses, qui ad rubum Dominum invocans, appellat Deum Abrahami, Deum Isaaci, & Deum [211] Iacobi. Non est enim Deus mortuorum, sed viventium. Sed si verba illa intelligenda sunt de Immortalitate animae, non id probant, quod probatum voluit Christus, nempe, Resurrectionem Corporis, quae est Immortalitas Hominis. Dicit ergo Servator noster; Patriarchas illos Immortales quidem esse, at non per proprietatem aliquam humanae Essentiae consequentem, sed per voluntatem Dei, qui ex mera gratia Electos donavit Vita aeterna. Quod autem Patriarchae illi, aliique multi fideles homines tunc mortui essent, vivere tamen eos dixit Christus. Causa erat, quod nomina eorum scripta erant in Libro Vitae;[s] & propterea addidit verba haec, ut in textu videre est, quod viverent Deo. Quid autem est, propter quod animae Iustorum in Coelum irent ante corpora, cum mercedem operum suorum recepturi non sint homines ante Iudicium, ut manifestum est ex Luc. 14. 14.[v] Cum facis convivium, voca pauperes, debiles, claudos, & coecos, & beatus eris, quia non habent retribuere tibi, retribuetur enim tibi in Resurrectione Iustorum. Itaque ante Resurrectionem, nil habet in coelo quod faciat anima etsi per se existeret. Verbum hoc Anima Immortalis in Scriptura Sacra nusquam, Vita aeterna passim invenitur. friends, but of himselfe, is a complaint of this Mortality of [53]Nature;[53] and yet no contradiction of the Immortality at the Resurrection. There is hope of a tree [54](saith hee verse 7.) if it be cut down,[54] Though the root thereof wax old[55], and the stock thereof die in the ground, yet when it senteth[w] the water it will bud, and bring forth boughes [56]like a Plant.[56] But man dyeth, and [57]wasteth away, yea, man giveth up the Ghost,[57] and where is he? and (verse 12.) man [58]lyeth down,[58] and riseth not, till the heavens be [59]no more.[59] But when is it, that the heavens shall be [60]no more?[60] St. Peter tells us, that it is at the °generall° Resurrection. For in his 2. Epistle, 3. Chapter, and 7 verse, he saith, that the Heavens and the Earth that are now, are [61] reserved unto fire against the day of Iudgment, and perdition of ungodly men, and (verse 12.)[x] [62]looking for, and hasting to the comming of God, wherein the Heavens shall be on fire, and shall be dissolved, and the Elements shall melt with fervent heat.[62] Neverthelesse,we according to the promise look for new Heavens, and a new Earth, wherein dwelleth righteousnesse. Therefore where Job saith, man riseth °not till the Heavens be° no more; it is all one, as if he had said, the Immortall Life [63](and Soule and Life in the Scripture, do usually signifie the same thing) beginneth not in man, till the Resurrection, and day of Judgement;[63] and hath for cause, not [64]his specificall[z] nature, and generation;[64] but the Promise. °For St. Peter saies not, Wee look for new heavens, and a new earth, (from Nature,) but from Promise.°

Lastly, seeing it hath been already proved °out of divers evident places of Scripture,° in the 35. chapter of this book, that the Kingdom of God is a [65]Civil Common-wealth,[65] where God himself is Soveraign, by vertue first of the Old, and since of the New Covenant, wherein he reigneth by his Vicar, or Lieutenant; °the same places do therefore also prove, that° after the comming again of our Saviour in his Majesty, and glory, to reign [66]actually, and Eternally; the Kingdom of God is to[66] be on Earth. °But because this doctrine (though proved out of places of Scripture not few, nor obscure) will appear to most men a novelty; I doe but propound it; maintaining nothing in this, or any other paradox[aa] of Religion; but attending the end of that dispute of the sword, concerning the Authority, (not yet amongst my Countrey-men decided,) by which all sorts of doctrine are to bee approved, or rejected; and whose commands, both in speech, and writing, (whatsoever be the opinions of private men) must by all men, that mean to be protected by their Laws, be obeyed. For the points of doctrine concerning the Kingdome of God, have so great influence [242] on the Kingdome of Man, as not to be determined, but by them, that under God have the Soveraign Power.°

The place after Judgment, of those who were never in the Kingdome of God, or having been in, are cast out.

As the Kingdome of God, and Eternall Life, so also Gods Enemies, and their Torments after Judgment, appear by the Scripture, to have their place on Earth. The name of the place, where all men remain till the Resurrection, that were either buryed, or swallowed up of the Earth, is usually called in Scripture, °by words that signifie under ground; which the Latines read generally° Infernus, and Inferi, and [67] the Greeks ᾅδης; that is to say, a place where [68]men cannot see;[68] [ab] and containeth as well the Grave, as any other deeper place. But for the place of the [69]damned[69] after the Resurrection, it is not determined, neither in the Old, nor New Testament, by [70]any note[ac] of[70] situation; but onely by the [71]company: as that it shall bee, where such wicked men were, as God in former times in extraordinary, and miraculous manner, had destroyed from off the face of the Earth:[71] As for example, that they are in Inferno, in Tartarus,[ad] °or in the bottomelesse pit;° [ae] because Corah, Dathan, and Abirom, were swallowed up alive into the earth.[af] Not that the [72]Writers of the Scripture[72] would have us beleeve, there could be in the globe of the Earth, which is not only finite, but also (compared to the height of the [73] Stars) of no considerable magnitude, °a pit without a bottome; that is,° a hole of infinite depth, such as [74]the Greeks in their Daemonologie (that is to say, in their doctrine concerning Daemons,) and after them the Romans called Tartarus; of which Virgill sayes, Tartarus.

[ab] This etymology, deriving the word from the adjective ἀειδής (with the meaning 'invisible', 'unseen'), was discussed and rejected by Plato (Cratylus, 403A, 404B), but accepted (with the meaning 'in which we see nothing') by the standard Greek etymological dictionary, the Etymologicon magnum (17.18–19).

[ac] = indication (OED, 'note', *n.*², 3a).

[ad] 'Tartarus' was a Latin term (from Greek) for Hell; in Greek mythology, an abyss below Hades. The term is used once for Hell in Vulg (2 Pet. 2: 4).

[ae] A term used in Rev. (e.g., 9: 1–2; 20: 1, 3).

[af] Korah (Vulg: 'Core'), Dathan, and Abiram, rebels against Moses: Num. 16: 1–33; Ps. 106: 17.

[ag] Vergil, Aeneis, VI, ll. 578–9 ('it opens precipitately downwards, extending into the shadows twice as far as the upward view of the sky does towards heavenly Olympus').

The congregation of Giants.

Again, because those [76]mighty men of the Earth,[76] that lived in the time of Noah, before the floud, [77](which the Greeks called Heroes, and the Scripture Giants,[ah] and both say, were begotten, by copulation of the children of God, with the children of men,) were for their wicked life[77] destroyed by the generall deluge; the place of the [78]Damned, is therefore also sometimes marked out, by the company of those deceased[78] Giants; as Proverbs 21. 16. The man that wandreth out of the way of [79]understanding,[79] shall remain in the congregation of the Giants, and Job 26. 5. Behold the Giants groan under water, and they that dwell with them. Here the place of the [80]Damned, is[80] under the water. And Isaiah 14. 9. Hell is troubled how to meet thee, [81](that is, the King of Babylon) and will displace[81] the Giants for thee:[ai] [82]and here again the place of the Damned, (if the sense be literall,) is to be[82] under water.

Lake of Fire.

Thirdly, because the Cities of Sodom, and Gomorrah, °by the extraordinary wrath of God,° were consumed for their [83] wickednesse with Fire and Brimstone,[aj] and °together with them° the countrey about made a stinking bituminous Lake: the place of the Damned is [84]sometimes[84] expressed by Fire, and a Fiery Lake: as in the Apocalypse ch. 21. 8. But the timorous, incredulous, and abominable, and Murderers, and [243] Whoremongers, and Sorcerers, and Idolaters, and all Lyars, shall have their part in the Lake that burneth with Fire, and Brimstone; which is the second Death. So that it is manifest, that [85]Hell Fire, which is here expressed by Metaphor, from the reall Fire of Sodome, signifieth not any certain kind, or place of Torment; but is to be taken indefinitely, for Destruction, as it is[85] in the 20. Chapter, at the 14. verse; °where it is said, that° Death and Hell were cast into the Lake of Fire; [86]that is to say were abolished, and destroyed; as if after the day of Judgment, there shall be no more Dying, nor no more going into Hell; that is, no more going to Hades (from which word perhaps our word Hell is derived,)[ak] which is the same with no more Dying.[86]

[85] the place of the reprobate is not some definite place where the wicked are tormented, but a general descriptive term for any destruction whatsoever. So too

Et Iob. 26. 5. Ecce Gigantes gemunt sub aquis, & qui habitant cum eis. Locus Reproborum hic sub aquis esse significatur. Et Isaiah 14. 9. Infernus conturbatus est in occursum adventus tui suscitavit tibi Gigantes.[ai] Dictum hoc ab Isaiah est contra Regem Babylonis, locum Reproborum rursus innuens sub aquis esse.

Tertiò, quia Vrbes Sodoma & Gomorra propter impietatem incolarum Igne & Sulphure è coelo consumptae erant,[ak] & regio vicina in lacum bituminis foetentis conversa; locus Reproborum saepe in Scripturis Sacris significatur per Ignem & Lacum ignis, ut Apoc. 21. 8. Timidis autem & incredulis, & execratis, & homicidis, & fornicatoribus, & veneficis, & idololatris, & omnibus mendacibus, pars illorum erit in stagno ardenti igne & sulphure; quod est mors secunda. Manifestum ergo videtur locum Reproborum non esse certum aliquem locum in quo torquentur Impii, sed nomen cujuscunque perditionis appellativum. [213] Etiam Cap. 20. vers. 14. Ipse infernus & mors missi sunt in stagnum ignis. Haec est mors secunda. Adeo ut sensisse videtur Euangelista impios omnes Iudicio ultimo damnatos, & in lacu ignis denuo morituros esse, & propterea mortem hanc secundam appellavisse.

[ah] Gen. 6: 4. [ai] In these three passages Hobbes cites and translates from Vulg, which refers to 'gigantes' ('giants'); the Junius–Tremellius translation gives 'vitae expertes' ('those deprived of life'), and the Geneva and Bishops' Bibles, and AV, give 'the dead'. ('Giants' and 'shades of the dead' were alternative interpretations of the Hebrew word 'rephaim'.) [aj] Gen. 19: 24–9.

[ak] This was not a common etymology. Richard Verstegan derived 'hell' from a Germanic word meaning 'hidden' (Restitution, p. 193); Henry Ainsworth derived it from another Germanic word meaning 'a low or deepe place' (Annotations, 1st pagination, p. 136); and James Ussher discussed these and four other etymologies (not including 'Hades'), preferring Verstegan's (Answer to a Challenge, p. 287).

Vtter Darknesse.

Fourthly, from the Plague of Darknesse inflicted on the Egyptians, of which it is written (Exod. 10. 23.) [87]They saw not one another, neither rose any man[87] from his place for three days; but all the Children of Israel had light in their dwellings; the place of the wicked [88]after Judgment, is called Vtter Darknesse, or (as it is in the originall) Darknesse without. And so it is expressed (Mat. 22. 13.) where the King commandeth his Servants, to bind hand and foot the man that had not on his Wedding garment, and to cast him out, εἰς τὸ σκότος τὸ ἐξώτερον,[al] Externall darknesse, or Darknesse without: which though translated Vtter darknesse, does not signifie how great, but where that darknesse is to be;[am] namely, without the habitation of Gods Elect.[88]

Gehenna, and Tophet.

Lastly, whereas there was a place neer Jerusalem, called the Valley of the Children of Hinnon; in a part whereof, called Tophet, the [89]Jews had committed most grievous Idolatry, sacrificing their children[89] to the Idol Moloch;[an] and wherein also God had [90]afflicted his enemies with most grievous punishments;[90] [ao] and wherein Josias had burnt the Priests of Moloch upon their own Altars, as appeareth at large in the 2 of Kings chap. 23. the place [91]served afterwards, to receive the filth, and garbage which was carried thither, out of the City; and there used to be fires made, from time to time, to purifie the aire, and take away the stench of Carrion. From this abominable place, the Jews used ever after to call the place of the Damned, by the name of Gehenna, or Valley of Hinnon. And this Gehenna, is that word, which is usually now translated HELL;[ap] and from the fires from time to time there burning, we have the notion of Everlasting, and Vnquenchable Fire.[91]

Of the literall sense of the Scripture concerning Hell.

Seeing now there is none, that so interprets the Scripture, as that [o]after the day of Judgment,[o] the wicked are all Eternally to be [92]punished[92] in the Valley of Hinnon; or that they shall [93]so rise again, as to be ever after under ground, or under water; or that after the Resurrection, they shall no more see one another; nor stir from one place to another;[93] it followeth, me thinks, very necessarily, that that which is thus said [94]concerning Hell Fire,[94] is spoken metaphorically; and that therefore [95]there is a proper sense to bee enquired after, (for of all Metaphors there is some reall ground, that may be expressed in proper words) both of the Place of Hell, and the nature of Hellish Torments, and Tormenters.[95] [244]

[93] be thrust down, either under water, or in [70: into] Tartarus; or that they shall not move, because of the darkness;
[94] in the Scriptures about the place of the reprobate
[95] we should enquire into the more proper sense of those words about that place, and about those tortures.

[al] 'Into the outer darkness'.

Satan, Devill, not Proper names, but Appellatives.

And first for the Tormenters, wee have their nature, and properties, °exactly and° properly delivered by the names of, °The Enemy, or° Satan; °The Accuser, or° Diabolus; °The Destroyer, or° Abaddon.[aq] Which °significant° names, Satan, Devill, Abaddon, set not forth to us any Individuall person, as proper names use to doe; but onely an office, or quality; and are therefore Appellatives;[ar 96] which ought not to have been left untranslated, as they are, in the Latine, and Modern Bibles; because thereby they seem to be the proper names of Daemons; and men are the more easily seduced to beleeve the doctrine of Devills; which at that time was the Religion of the Gentiles, and contrary to that of Moses, and of Christ.[96]

And because [97] by the Enemy, the Accuser, and Destroyer, is meant, the Enemy of them that shall be in the Kingdome[97] of God; therefore if the Kingdome of God after the Resurrection, bee upon the Earth, °(as in the former Chapter[as] I have shewn by Scripture it seems to be,)° The Enemy, and his Kingdome must be on Earth also. For [98] so also was it, in the time before the Jews had deposed God. For Gods Kingdome was in Palestine; and[98] the Nations round about, were the Kingdomes of [99] the Enemy; and consequently by Satan, is meant any Earthly Enemy of the Church.[99]

Torments of Hell.

The Torments of Hell, are expressed sometimes, by weeping, and gnashing of teeth, as Mat. 8. 12. Sometimes, by the worm of Conscience; as Isa. 66. 24. and Mark 9. 44, 46, 48: sometimes, by [100] Fire, as in the place now quoted, where the worm dyeth not, and the fire is not quenched, and many places beside:[100] sometimes by shame, and contempt, as Dan. 12. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the Earth, shall awake; some to Everlasting life; and some to shame, and everlasting contempt. All which places design[at] metaphorically a grief, °and discontent of mind,° from the sight of that Eternall felicity in others, which they themselves through their own incredulity, and disobedience have lost. And because such felicity in others, is not [101] sensible but by comparison with their own actuall miseries;[101] it followeth that they are to suffer [102] such bodily paines, and calamities, as are incident to those, who not onely live under evill and cruell Governours, but have also for Enemy, the Eternall King of the Saints, God Almighty. And amongst these bodily paines, is to be reckoned also to every one of the wicked [102] a second Death. For though the Scripture

The Joyes of Life Eternall, and Salvation the same thing.

The joyes of Life Eternall, are in Scripture comprehended all under the name of SALVATION, or being saved. To be saved, is to be secured, either respectively, against speciall Evills, or absolutely, against all Evill, comprehending Want, Sicknesse, and Death it self. [112]And because man was created in a condition Immortall, not subject to corruption, and consequently to nothing that tendeth to the dissolution of his nature; and fell from that happinesse by the sin of Adam;[112] it followeth, that to be saved from Sin, is to be saved from all [113]the Evill, and Calamities that Sinne hath brought upon us.[113] And therefore in the Holy Scripture, Remission of Sinne, and Salvation from Death and Misery, is the same thing, as it appears by the words of our Saviour, °who having cured a man sick of the Palsey, by saying,° (Mat. 9. 2.) Son be of good cheer, thy Sins be forgiven thee; and °knowing that the Scribes took for blasphemy, that a man should pretend to forgive Sins, asked them° (v. 5.) whether it were easier to say, Thy Sinnes be forgiven thee, or, Arise and walk; °signifying thereby, that it was all one, as to the saving of the sick, to say, Thy Sins are forgiven, and Arise and walk; and that he used that form of speech, onely to shew he had power to forgive Sins.° And it is besides evident in [114] reason, that since Death and Misery, were the punishments of Sin, the discharge of Sinne, must also be [115]a discharge[115] of Death and Misery; [116]that is to say, Salvation absolute, such as the faithfull are to enjoy after the day of Judgment, by the power, and favour of Jesus Christ, who for that cause[116] is called our SAVIOUR.

Salvation from Sin, and from Misery, all one.

Concerning Particular Salvations, such as are understood, 1 Sam. 14. [117]39. as the Lord liveth that saveth Israel, that is, from their temporary enemies,[117] and 2 Sam. 22. 4.[aw] [118]Thou art my Saviour, thou savest me from violence;[118] and 2 Kings 13. 5. Vitae autem aeternae gaudia comprehenduntur à Scriptoribus Sacris sub nomine Salutis sive Salvationis. Salvari autem Servari est, sive specialiter à Malis certis, sive universaliter à malis omnibus, nempe Indigentia, aegritudine & morte ipsa, à quibus omnibus, nisi peccasset Adamus, incolumis virtute arboris Vitae, vixisset in aeternum. Servari ergo ab his malis omnibus idem est ac servari à Peccato. Et in Scripturis Sacris eadem res est, Peccata remitti, & à morte & miseriis servari, ut constat ex verbis Servatoris nostri Matth. 9, 2. Confide fili, remittuntur peccata tua. Et vers. 5. Vtrum est facilius dicere, dimittuntur tibi peccata tua, an dicere, Surge & ambula. Etiam Rationis naturalis est, cum Mors & Miseria, punitio fuerit peccatorum, ut remissio peccatorum abolitio esset mortis & miseriarum, & proinde Salvari, & peccata sibi remitti eadem res sit; & ab hac remissione peccatorum per mortem Christi est, quod Christum appellemus Servatorem nostrum.

The Place of Eternall Salvation.

But concerning the Generall Salvation, [121]because it must be[121] in the Kingdome of Heaven, there is great difficulty concerning the Place. [122]On one side, by Kingdome (which is an estate ordained by men for their perpetuall security against enemies, and want) it seemeth that this Salvation[122] should be on Earth. For by Salvation is [123]set forth unto us, a glorious Reign of our King, by Conquest;[123] not a safety by Escape: and therefore there where we look for Salvation, we must look also for Triumph; and before Triumph, for Victory; and before Victory, for Battell; which cannot well be supposed, shall be in Heaven. But [124]how good soever this reason may be, I will not trust to it, without very evident places of Scripture. The state of Salvation is described at large,[124] Isaiah 33. ver. 20, 21, 22, 23, 24.

Look upon Zion, the City of our solemnities; thine eyes shall see Ierusalem a [125]quiet[125] habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.

[126]But there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers, and[126] streams; wherein shall goe no Gally with oares; neither shall [127]gallant ship[127] passe thereby.

For the Lord is our Iudge, the Lord is our Lawgiver, the Lord is our King, he will save us.

Thy tacklings are loosed; [128]they could not well strengthen their mast; they could not spread the sail:[128] then is the prey of a great spoil divided; the lame take the prey.

And the [129]Inhabitant shall not say, I am sicke;[129] the people that shall dwell therein shall be forgiven their Iniquity.

In which words wee have [130]the place from whence Salvation is to proceed, Ierusalem, a quiet habitation; the Eternity of it, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down, &c. The Saviour of it, the Lord, their Iudge, their Lawgiver, their King, he will save us; the Salvation, the Lord shall be to them as a broad mote of swift waters, &c. the condition of their Enemies, their tacklings are loose, their masts weak, the lame shal take the spoil of them. The condition of the Saved, The Inhabitant shal not say, I am sick: And lastly, all this[130] is comprehended in Forgivenesse of sin, The people °that dwell therein° shall be forgiven their iniquity. By which it is evident, that Salvation shall be on Earth, then, when God

Sed de loco Salvationis universalis fidelium hominum, in Regno Coelesti, difficultas magna est; cum enim Regnum Coeleste, Civitas sit, ab hominibus securitatis causa contra hostes instituta, videtur Salvatio contra hostes debere esse in Terra. Per Salvationem enim innuitur Regnum illius Regis coelestis per Victoriam, non incolumitas per fugam. Ubi ergo salutem illam expectamus, expectamus Triumphum; & ante Triumphum, Victoriam; & ante Victoriam, Praelium; quae non facile supponi possunt futura esse in Coelo. Videamus autem, de hac re quid dicant Scripturae Sacrae Isaias 33, vers. 20, 21, 22, 23, 24: *Respice Zion Civitatem solennitatis nostrae: oculi tui videbunt Ierusalem habitationem opulentam, tabernaculum quod nequaquam transferri poterit: nec auferentur clavi ejus in sempiternum, & omnes funiculi ejus non rumpentur: quia solummodo ibi magnificus est Dominus noster: locus fluviorum rivi latissimi, & patentes: non transibit per eum navis remigum, neque trieris magna transgredietur eum. Dominus enim Iudex noster, Dominus Legifer noster, Dominus Rex noster: ipse salvabit nos. Laxati sunt funiculi tui, sed non praevalebunt, sic erit malus tuus, ut dilatare signum non queas. [121] of the faithful,

[122] For since the heavenly kingdom is a commonwealth, instituted by men for the sake of security against enemies, it seems that this salvation against enemies

[123] implied, a kingdom of that heavenly king by victory,

[124] let us see what the Holy Scriptures say about this matter: [125] wealthy [Vulg]

[126] Because only there is our Lord magnificent: a place of rivers, very wide and extensive [Vulg]

[127] a great trireme [Vulg]

[128] but they will not be of great strength; your mast will be in such a condition that you will not be able to unfurl your flag. [Vulg] [129] neighbour will not say, I have grown weak; [Vulg]

[130] , first, the place of salvation, 'Jerusalem, a wealthy habitation'; secondly, its duration, 'a tabernacle that shall not be taken down'; thirdly, who the saviour is, 'the Lord our judge, our lawgiver, our king'; fourthly, the nature of that salvation itself, 'a place of rivers, very wide streams'; fifthly, the condition of those who will be saved, 'the neighbour will not say, I have grown weak'; sixthly, the condition of the enemies, 'thy tacklings are loosed, but they will not be of great strength', etc.; and lastly, all this prosperity of the citizens shall reign, (at the coming again of Christ) in Jerusalem; and from Jerusalem [131]shall[131] proceed the Salvation of the Gentiles °that shall be received into Gods Kingdome:° as is also more expressely declared by the same Prophet, Chap. 65. 20, 21.[ax] And they °(that is, the Gentiles who had any Jew in bondage)° shall bring all your brethren, for an offering to the Lord, out of all nations, upon horses, and in charets,[ay] and in litters, and upon mules, and [132]upon swift beasts,[132] to my holy mountain, Ierusalem, saith the Lord, as the Children of Israel bring an offering in a clean vessell into the House of the Lord. And I will also take of them for Priests and for Levites, saith the Lord: Whereby it is manifest, that the chief seat of [133]Gods Kingdome[133] (which is the Place, [1247] from whence the Salvation of °us that were° Gentiles, shall proceed) shall be [134]Jerusalem: And the same is also [135]confirmed by our Saviour, in his discourse with the woman of Samaria, concerning the [136]place of Gods worship; to whom he saith, Iohn 4. 22. that °the Samaritans worshipped they knew not what, but the Jews worship what they knew, For° Salvation is of the Iews [137](ex Iudaeis, that is, begins at the Jews): as if he should say, you worship God, but know not by whom he wil save you, as we doe, that know it shall be by one of the tribe of Judah, a Jew, not a Samaritan. And therefore also the woman not impertinently[137] [az] answered him again, We know the Messias shall come. So that which our Saviour saith, Salvation is from the Iews, is the same that Paul sayes (Rom. 1. 16, 17.) [138]The Gospel[138] is the power of God to Salvation to every one that beleeveth: To the Iew first, and also to the Greek. For therein is the righteousnesse of God revealed from faith to faith; from the faith of the Jew, to the faith of the [139]Gentile.[139] In the like sense the Prophet Ioel describing the day of Judgment, (chap. 2. 30, 31.) [140]that God would[140] shew wonders in heaven, and in earth, bloud, and fire, and [141]pillars[141] of smoak, The Sun should be turned to darknesse, and the Moon into bloud, before the great and terrible day °of the Lord° come, °he addeth verse 32.° and it shall come to passe, that whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord, shall be saved. For in Mount Zion, and in Ierusalem shall be Salvation. [142] And Obadiah verse 17. °saith the same,° Vpon tunc futuram esse quando regnabit Deus (in adventu Christi) in Ierusalem; & à Ierusalem procedere debere Salutem Gentium: id quod apertius etiam declaratur ab eodem Propheta, cap. 66, 20, 21. Et adducent omnes fratres vestros de cunctis gentibus, donum Domino, in equis, & in quadrigis, & in lecticis, & in mulis, & in carrucis, ad montem [216] *sanctum meum Ierusalem, dicit Dominus, quomodo si inferant filii Israelis, munus in vase mundo in domum Domini. Idem etiam confirmari videtur à Servatore nostro, in colloquio cum muliere Samaritana, circa locum divini cultus futuri Ioh. 4, 22, ubi mulieri dicit Christus Salvationem esse ex Iudaeis, id est Salvatorem non à Samaria futurum esse, sed à Iudaea. Cui Respondens dicit Mulier, scimus venturum esse Messiam. Quod ergo dicit Christus Salvationem esse ex Iudaeis, idem est, quod dicit Paulus Rom. 1, 16, 17. Non enim erubesco Euangelium, Virtus enim Dei est in salutem omni credenti, Iudaeo primum, & Graeco. Iustitia enim in eo revelatur ex fide in fidem, id est ex fide Iudaei in fidem Graeci. Eodem sensu Propheta Ioel describens diem Iudicii, (cap. 2. 30, 31.) Dabo prodigia in coelo & in terra, sanguinem, & ignem, & vaporem fumi. Sol convertetur in tenebras, & Luna in sanguinem, antequam veniat dies magnus & horribilis, & erit ut omnis qui invocaverit nomen Domini, salvus erit, quia in monte Zion & in Ierusalem erit Salvatio, sicut dixit Dominus. Et Obad. vers. 17. In monte Sion

Mount Zion shall be Deliverance; and [143]there shall be holinesse, and the house of Iacob shall possesse their possessions, that is, the possessions of the Heathen,[143] which possessions he expresseth more particularly in the following verses, by the mount of Esau, the Land of the Philistines, the fields of Ephraim, of Samaria, Gilead, and the Cities of the South, and concludes with these words, the Kingdom shall be the Lords. [144]All these places are for Salvation, and the Kingdome of God (after the day of Judgement) upon Earth. On the other side, I have not found any text that can probably be drawn, to prove any Ascension of the Saints into Heaven; that is to say, into any[144] Coelum Empyreum,[bb] or other aetheriall Region; saving that [145]it is called the Kingdome of Heaven: which name it may have, because God, that was King of the Jews, governed them by his commands, sent to Moses by Angels from Heaven; and after their revolt, sent his Son from Heaven, to reduce them[bc] to their obedience; and shall send him thence again, to rule both them, and all other faithfull men, from the day of Judgment, Everlastingly: or from that, that the Throne of this our Great King is in Heaven; whereas the Earth is but his Footstoole.[bd] But that the Subjects of God should have any place as high as his Throne, or higher than his Footstoole, it seemeth not sutable to the dignity of a King, nor can I find any evident text for it in holy Scripture.[145]

From this that hath been said of the Kingdom of God, and of Salvation, it is not hard to interpret what is meant by the WORLD TO COME. There are three worlds mentioned in Scripture, the Old World, the Present World, and the World to come. Of the first, St. Peter speaks, If God spared not the Old World, but saved Noah the eighth person, a Preacher of righteousnesse, bringing the flood upon the world of [1248] the ungodly, &c. So the [146]first World, was[146] from Adam to the °generall° Flood. Of the present World, [147]our Saviour[147] speaks (Iohn 18. 36.) My Kingdome is not of this World. For [148]he came onely to teach men the way of Salvation, and to renew the Kingdome of his Father, by his doctrine.[148] Of the World to come, St. Peter speaks, Neverthelesse °we according to his promise° look for new Heavens, and a new Earth[149]. This is that WORLD, wherein Christ coming down from Heaven, in the clouds, with great power, and glory, shall send his Angels, and shall gather together his elect, from the four winds, and from the uttermost parts of the Earth,[be] and thence forth reign over them, °(under his Father)° Everlastingly.

Ex his quae dicta sunt de Regno Dei, & Salvatione, facile intelligitur quid sit Mundus venturus. Invenitur in Sacris Scripturis mentio facta trium Mundorum, nimirum, Mundi Veteris, Mundi Presentis, & Mundi Venturi. De primo loquitur S. Petrus (2 Petr. 2, 5.) Si originali Mundo non pepercit Deus, sed octavum Noem justitiae praeconem custodivit, diluvium Mundo impiorum inducens &c. De Mundo venturo loquitur S. Petrus (2 Pet. 3, 13.) Novos vero Coelos & novam Terram & promissa ipsius expectamus. Atque hic est Mundus ille, in quo Christus è Coelo in nubibus descendens in potentia & gloria magna, Angelos suos mittens congregabit Electos suos, à quatuor ventis, & ab extremis Terrae,[be] & regnabit super eos in aeternum.

So when will that kingdom by covenant be the Lord's? That kingdom will be the Lord's when our Saviour will come with majesty and glory to judge the living and the dead. Redemption.

Salvation of a sinner, supposeth a precedent REDEMPTION; for he that is once guilty of Sin, is obnoxious[bf] to the Penalty [150]of the same; and must pay (or some other for him) such Ransome, as he that is offended,[bg] and has him in his power,[150] shall require. And seeing the person offended, is Almighty God, [151]in whose power are all things; such Ransome is to be paid before Salvation can be acquired, as[151] God hath been pleased to require. °By this Ransome, is not intended a satisfaction for Sin, equivalent to the Offence, which no Sinner for himselfe, nor righteous man can ever be able to make for another:° The dammage a man does to another, he may [152]make amends for[152] by restitution, or recompence, but sin cannot be taken away by [153]recompence; for that were to make the liberty to sin, a thing vendible. But sins may bee pardoned to the repentant, either gratis,[bh] or upon such penalty, as God is pleased to accept.[153] That which God usually accepted in the Old Testament, [154]was some Sacrifice, or Oblation. To forgive sin[154] is not an act of Injustice, though the punishment have been threatned. Even amongst men, though the promise of Good, bind the promiser; yet threats, that is to say, promises of Evill, bind them not; much lesse shall they bind God, who is infinitely [155]more mercifull then men.[155] Our Saviour °Christ° therefore to Redeem us, did not in that sense satisfie [156] for the Sins of men, as that [157]his Death, of its own vertue, could make it unjust in God to punish sinners with Eternall death; but did make that Sacrifice, and Oblation of himself, at his first coming, which God was pleased to require, for the Salvation at his second coming, of such as in the mean time should repent, and beleeve in him. And though this act of our Redemption, be not alwaies in Scripture called a Sacrifice, and Oblation, but sometimes a Price; yet by Price we are not to understand any thing, by the value whereof, he could claim right to a pardon for us, from his offended Father; but that Price which God the Father was pleased in mercy to demand.[157]

8 for himselfe,] om. MS 8–9 for another] eyther for himselfe, or any other MS 16 promiser] {promiser corr. to promisers by TH} MS 27 but] but {illeg. corr. to to by TH} vnderstand MS 27 God the Father] he MS

[150] , which he, or another on his behalf, is obliged to pay as the price of redemption; which price is as much as he that is offended [151] it follows that the price of redemption is whatever [152] take away [153] either of these. But a sin may be either pardoned to the sinner by the person offended, freely, or redeemed by a penalty, however small.

[154] from a sinner, for the redemption of a sin, was a sacrifice or oblation. For him who has suffered an injury, to forgive the sinner [155] merciful. [156] ^ his father

[157] the punishment of sins should thereby have become unjust; but his death was only a sacrifice, and it pleased God to accept it for the sins of those who repented and believed in their redeemer. And therefore in the Holy Scriptures 'redemption', and 'sacrifice', and 'oblation', and 'price' often mean the same thing.

Salvatio peccatoris supponit Redemptionem praecedentem; nam qui semel peccati reus est, poenas debet, quas ipse vel alius pro ipso solvere obligatur, pro pretio Redemptionis; quod pretium tantum est, quantum is qui laesus est postulabit. Laesus autem Deus est; pretium ergo Redemptionis est quicquid Deo imponere visum erit. Damnum quod alii fit tolli potest per Restitutionem, vel compensationem, quarum neutra tollit peccatum. Ignosci tamen peccatori à laeso aut gratis, aut poena quantulacunque, peccatum ejus redimi, potest. Id autem quod Deus plerumque à peccatore (sub vetere Testamento) pro peccati Redemptione exigere solitus est, Sacrificium erat vel Oblatio. Peccatori enim ignoscere is qui injuriam passus est, quanquam illum punire minatus erat, jure potest; cum etiam apud homines etsi Promissio Boni Promissorem obliget; minae tamen, id est Promissio Mali, neminem obligant; Multo minus obligabunt Deum, cujus misericordia est infinita. Servator ergo noster, ut nos redimeret, non ita pro peccatis hominum patri suo satisfecit, ut punitio peccatorum propter eam rem injusta esset; sed Sacrificium tantum erat mors ejus, quam placuit Deo acceptare pro peccatis poenitentium, & in Redemptorem suum credentium. Et propterea Redemptio in Scripturis Sacris, & Sacrificium, & Oblatio, & Pretium saepenumero idem significant.

CHAP. XXXIX.

Of the signification in Scripture of the word CHURCH.

Church the Lords house.

The word Church, (Ecclesia) signifieth in the Books of Holy Scripture divers things. Sometimes °(though not often)° it is taken for Gods House, that is to say, for a Temple, wherein [1]Christians assemble to perform holy duties publiquely;[1] as, 1 Cor. 14. ver. 34. Let your women keep silence in the Churches: [2]but this is Metaphorically put, for the Congregation there assembled; and hath been since used for the Edifice it self, to distinguish between the Temples of Christians, and Idolaters. The Temple of Jerusalem was Gods house,[a] and the House of Prayer; and so is any Edifice dedicated by Christians to the worship of Christ, Christs house: and therefore[2] the Greek Fathers call it Κυριακή, The Lords house; °and thence, in our language it came to be called Kyrke, and Church.°

Ecclesia properly what.

[3]Church (when not taken for a House) signifieth the same that Ecclesia signified in the Grecian Common-wealths; that is to say, a Congregation, or an Assembly of Citizens, called forth, to hear the Magistrate speak unto them; and which in the Common-wealth of Rome was called Concio, as he that spake was called Ecclesiastes, and Concionator. And when they were called forth by lawfull Authority, it[3] was Ecclesia legitima, a Lawfull Church, [4]ἔννομος Ἐκκλησία. But when they were excited by tumultuous, and seditious clamor, then it was a confused Church, Ἐκκλησία συγκεχυμένη.[4] [d]

Acts 19. 39.

It is taken also sometimes for the men that have right to be of the Congregation, though not actually assembled; °that is to say, for the whole multitude of Christian men, how far soever they be dispersed:° as (Act. 8. 3.) where it is said, that Saul made havock of the Church: °And in this sense is Christ said to be Head of the Church. And sometimes for a certain part of Christians, as (Col. 4. 15.) Salute the Church that is in his house.° Sometimes also for the Elect onely; as (Ephes. 5. 27.) [5] A Glorious Church, without spot, or wrinkle, °holy, and without blemish;° which is meant of the Church triumphant, [6]or, Church to come. Sometimes, for a Congregation assembled, of professors of Christianity, whether their profession be true, or counterfeit,[6] as it is understood, Mat. 18. 17. where it is said, Tell it to the Church, and if hee neglect to hear the Church, let him be to thee as a Gentile, or Publican.

CAPVT XXXIX.

De significatione quam habet in Scripturis Sacris Vocabulum Ecclesia.

Ecclesia in Scripturis Sacris variè accipitur. Interdum pro Domo Dei, id est pro Templo in quo populus Dei publicè congregari consuevit ad cultum Divinum; ut 1 Cor. 14, 34. Mulieres in Ecclesiis taceant. In hoc sensu à Patribus Graecis dicitur Ecclesia Κυριακή, id est Domus Domini. Frequentissime autem sumitur, juxta ἔτυμον. Graeca enim vox est, significatque Coetum hominum evocatorum,[b] [218] nempe Cives congregatos, & evocatos ad concionem publicam, à Magistratu, secundum Leges; atque haec Ecclesia erat legitima. Etiam Cives per tumultum & seditionem in unum locum multi convenientes, vocantur interdum Ecclesia, sed Ecclesia confusa, ut Act. 19, 39.[c] Manifestum autem hinc est, Ecclesiam nullam legitimam esse posse, quae Authoritate illius non sit convocata, qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem. Sumitur etiam interdum pro hominibus, qui in Coetum jure intrare possunt, etiamsi non sint actu congregati, ut Act. 8, 3. Ubi dicitur Saulus autem devastabat Ecclesiam. Interdum etiam pro solis Electis ut Eph. 5, 27. Vt exhiberet sibi gloriosam Ecclesiam, non habentem maculam aut rugam. Id quod intelligi non potest nisi de Ecclesia Triumphante. Caeteris significationibus omissis, loquemur hoc loco de Ecclesia in sensu proprio, nempe quatenus legitima est, habetque authoritatem legitimam, sicut sumitur Matth. 18, 17, ubi dicitur Dic Ecclesiae; si autem Ecclesiam non audierit, sit tibi sicut Ethnicus,

[3] But very often it is taken in its etymological sense. For it is a Greek word, and it means an assembly of men who have been called forth,[b] that is, citizens who have been gathered and called forth to a public meeting, by the magistrate, in accordance with the laws; and this
[4] . Also, when many citizens came together in one place, in tumult and sedition, they were sometimes called a 'Church', but a 'confused Church', as in Acts 19: 39. From this it is evident that no Church can be legitimate that has not been called together by the authority of the sovereign of the commonwealth.
[5] ^ That he might present it to himself [Vulg; AV]
[6] . Leaving aside its other meanings, we shall speak here of the Church in its proper sense, that is, insofar as it is lawful and has lawful authority,

[a] E.g., 2 Chr. 5: 14.
[b] Hobbes refers to the correct etymology of ἐκκλησία, from ἐκκαλέω, to 'call forth'.
[c] Acts 19: 39 refers to the legitimate church, 19: 32 to the confused. [d] Acts 19: 32.

In what sense the Church is one Person.

[7]And in this last sense only it is that the Church can be taken for one[7] Person; that is to say, that it can °be said to° have power to will, to pronounce, to command, to be obeyed, to make laws, or to doe any other action [8]whatsoever; For without authority from a lawfull Congregation, whatsoever act be done in a concourse of people, it is the [²248] particular act of every one of those that were present, and gave their aid to the performance of it; and not the act of them all in grosse, as of one body; much lesse the act of them that were absent, or that being present, were not willing it should be done. According to this sense, I define a[8] CHURCH to be, A company of men professing Christian Religion, united in the person of one Soveraign; at whose command they ought to assemble, and without whose [9]authority[9] they ought not to assemble. And because in all Common-wealths, that Assembly, which is without warrant from the °Civil° Soveraign, is unlawful; that Church also, which is assembled in any Common-wealth, that hath forbidden them to assemble, is an unlawfull Assembly.

Church defined.

A Christian Common-wealth, and a Church all one.

It followeth also, that there is on Earth, no such universall Church, as all Christians are bound to obey; because there is no [10]power[10] on Earth, to which all other Common-wealths are subject: [11]There are Christians, in the Dominions of severall Princes and States; but every one of them is subject to that Common-wealth, whereof he is himself a member; and consequently, cannot be subject to the commands of any other Person.[11] And therefore a Church, such a one as is capable to °Command, to° Judge, Absolve, Condemn, or do any other act, is the same thing with a [12]Civil Common-wealth, consisting of Christian men; and is called a Civill State, for that the subjects of it are Men; and a Church, for that the subjects thereof[12] are Christians. Temporall and Spirituall Government, are [13]but two[13] words brought into the Quoniam autem in omni Civitate conventiones illae, quae sine Authoritate habentur Imperantis summi, illegitimae sunt; etiam Ecclesia illa, quae habetur in illa Civitate, quae conventiones tales Lege vetuit, illegitima est.

Manifestum etiam hinc est nullam in terra esse Ecclesiam universalem quam audire obligantur Christiani universi; cum nulla sit in terra Civitas aliarum Civitatum omnium Domina. In Civitatibus singulis, Christiani Legibus Civitatis suae obedire obligantur: & per consequens, Legibus Civitatis aliae teneri non debent. Ecclesia ergo cui Potestas est Iudicandi, Absolvendi, Condemnandi, aut actionem quamcunque Agendi, eadem res est cum Civitate: & Civitas ideo quidem est, quia Cives sunt Homines: Ecclesia autem, quia Cives sunt Christiani. [16]There is therefore no other Government in this life, neither of State, nor Religion, but Temporall; nor teaching of any doctrine, lawfull to any Subject, which the Governour both of the State, and of the Religion, forbiddeth to be taught: And that Governour must be one; or else there must needs follow Faction, and Civil war in the Common-wealth,[16] between the Church and State; between Spiritualists, and Temporalists; between the Sword of Iustice, and the Shield of Faith;[e] and (which is more) in every Christian mans own brest, between the Christian, and the Man. The Doctors of the Church, are called Pastors; [17]so also are Civill Soveraignes:[17] But if Pastors be not subordinate one to another, so as that there may bee one chief Pastor, men will be taught contrary Doctrines, whereof both may be, and one must be false. Who that one chief Pastor is, according to the law of Nature, hath been already shewn; namely, that it is the Civill Soveraign:[f] [18]And to whom the Scripture hath assigned that Office,[18] we shall see in the Chapters following.

CHAP. XL.

Of the RIGHTS of the Kingdome of God, in Abraham, Moses, the High Priests, and the Kings of Judah.

The Soveraign Rights of Abraham.

The Father of the Faithfull, and first in the Kingdome of God by Covenant, was Abraham. For with him was the Covenant first made; wherein he obliged himself, and his seed after him, to °acknowledge and° obey the commands of God;[a] not onely [1]such, as he could take notice of, (as Morall Laws,) by the light of Nature;[1] but also such, as God should [2]in speciall manner[2] deliver to him by Dreams, and Visions. For as to the [3]Morall law, they were[3] already obliged, and needed not have been contracted withall, °by promise of the Land of Canaan. Nor was there any Contract, that could adde to, or strengthen the Obligation, by which both they, and all men else were bound naturally to obey God Almighty:° And therefore the Covenant which Abraham made with God, was to take for the Commandement of God, that which in the name of God was commanded him, in a Dream, or Vision; and to deliver it to his family, and cause them to observe the same.

In this Contract °of God with Abraham,° wee may observe three points of important consequence in the government of Gods people. First, that at the making of this Covenant, God spake onely to Abraham; and therefore contracted not with any of his family, or seed, otherwise then as their wills [4](which make the essence of all Covenants) were before the Contract[4] involved in the will of Abraham; who °was therefore supposed to have° had a lawfull power, to make them perform all that he [5]covenanted[5] for them. According whereunto (Gen. 18. 18, 19.) God saith[6], All the Nations of the Earth shall be blessed in him, For I know him that he will command his children and his houshold after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord[7]. CAPVT XL.

De Iure Regni Dei in Abrahamo, Mose, Summis Sacerdotibus, & Regibus Iudaeae.

Pater Fidelium, & per Pactum primus in Regno Dei erat Abrahamus. Cum illo primo Pactum initum fuit: per quod Pactum seipsum & semen suum post se obedire mandatis Dei obligavit,[a] non solum naturalibus, sed etiam illis mandatis, quae Deus supernaturaliter manifesta faceret, per Somnia & Visiones. Legibus enim Naturalibus, ante tenebatur: ut de illis pacisci opus non esset. Pactus ergo est cum Deo Abrahamus, pro mandato divino habere, quicquid in Dei nomine, per Somnium, vel Visionem illi imperaretur, & idem familiae suae praecipere, & facere ut observarent. In Pacto hoc tria veniunt consideranda, maximi momenti in populi Dei gubernatione. Primum, quod in Pacti hujus institutione, solum alloquutus est Deus Abrahamum: neque omnino cum familia quicquam Pactus est, neque adhuc cum semine, nisi quatenus voluntates eorum intelligantur in voluntate Abrahami comprehensae esse: habuit enim jus Abrahamus familiam suam cogendi, ut quae pro illis promiserat, illi praestarent: juxta id quod legitur Gen. 18, 18, 19, ubi dicit Deus de Abrahamo: Benedicendae sunt in illo omnes nationes terrae. Scio enim quod praecepturus [220] sit filiis suis, & domui suae post se, ut custodiant viam Domini, & faciant Iudicium & Iustitiam. Manifestum hinc est, illos quibus

°this first point,° that they to whom God hath not spoken immediately, are to receive [8]the positive commandements of God, from[8] their Soveraign; as the family and seed of Abraham did from Abraham their Father, and Lord, °and Civill Soveraign.° And consequently in every Common-wealth, they who have no supernaturall Revelation to the contrary, [9]ought[9] to obey the laws of their own Soveraign, in [10]the externall acts and profession of Religion. As for[10] the inward thought, and beleef of men, which humane Governours can take no notice of, °(for God onely knoweth the heart)[b] they° are not voluntary, nor the effect of the laws, but [11]of the [250] unrevealed will, and[11] of the power of God; and consequently [12]fall not[12] under obligation.

Abraham had the sole power of ordering the Religion of his own people.

From whence proceedeth another point, that it was not unlawfull for Abraham, when any of his Subjects should pretend Private Vision, or Spirit, or other Revelation from God, for the countenancing of [13]any[13] doctrine which Abraham should forbid, [14]or when they followed, or adhered to any such pretender, to punish them;[14] and consequently that it is lawfull now for the Soveraign to punish any man that shall oppose his Private Spirit against the Laws[15]: For hee hath the same [16]place[16] in the Common-wealth, that Abraham had in his own Family.

No pretence of Private Spirit against the Religion of Abraham.

There ariseth also from the same, a third point; that as none but Abraham in his family, so none but the Soveraign in a Christian Common-wealth, [17]can take notice what is, or what is not the Word of God. For God spake onely to Abraham; and it was he onely, that was able to know what God said, and to interpret the same to his family: And therefore also, they that have the place of Abraham in a Common-wealth, are the onely Interpreters of what God hath spoken.[17]

Abraham sole Judge, and Interpreter of what God spake.

The same Covenant was renewed with Isaac; and afterwards with Jacob;[c] [18]but afterwards no more, till the Israelites were freed from the Egyptians, and arrived at the Foot of Mount Sinai: and then it was renewed by Moses (as I have said before, chap. 35.) in such manner, as they became from that time forward the Peculiar Kingdome of God; whose Lieutenant was Moses, for his owne time: and the succession to that office was setled upon Aaron, and his heirs after him, to bee to God[18] a Sacerdotall Kingdome for ever.

The authority of Moses whereon grounded.

Deus immediatè loquutus non est, accipere pro Legibus Dei eas debere, quas dictaverit is, qui Summam in eos habet Potestatem; sicut & Familia & semen Abrahami, eas accepit ab Abrahamo Patre & Domino suo. In omni ergo Civitate, qui Revelationem supernaturalem non habent in contrarium, Legibus ejus, qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem, in omnibus actionibus externis circa Religionem obedire obligantur. In externis (inquam) actionibus; quia cogitationes & fides hominum interna, ab humanis rectoribus cognosci non possunt; neque voluntariae sunt; neque Legum sed potentiae tantum divinae effectus sunt; & proinde sub obligatione cadere non possunt.

Atque hinc oritur notandum Secundum, Abrahamo licitum fuisse, si subditorum suorum aliquis Visionem vel Spiritum vel Revelationem Divinam contumaciae suae, vel novis Doctrinis quas Abrahamus vetuerat praetenderet, hujusmodi homini iisque qui illi adhaerebant, poenas infligere; & per consequens Summis Imperantibus illos punire qui Legibus Civitatis opponunt Spiritum suum Privatum, etiam nunc licere. Habent enim in Civitate eandem Authoritatem nunc Summi Imperantes, quam tunc habuit in sua familia Abrahamus.

Deducitur inde tertiò, quod sicut solus Abrahamus in Familia sua, ita is solus, qui Summam habet in Civitate Christiana potestatem, scire supponatur, quid sit, quod Deus loquutus est; id est solus Divini Verbi interpres existimandus est.

Idem Pactum renovatum erat cum Isaaco, & deinde cum Iacobo.[c] Postremò, cum Mose & Israelitis ad montem Sinai, ubi facti sunt Israelitae in Regnum Dei peculiare, rexitque eos sub Deo (pro suo tempore) Moses, cui succedere debuerunt Summi Sacerdotes, nempe ut esset Regnum Sacerdotale in perpetuum.

[17] should be supposed to know what it is that God has said; that is, he alone is to be considered as the interpreter of the divine word.
[18] . Finally, with Moses and the Israelites at Mount Sinai, where the Israelites were made a peculiar kingdom of God; and they were ruled under God by Moses (for his own lifetime), to whom the High Priests were due to succeed, so that it would be

[b] Cf. Ps. 44: 21; Jer. 17: 10. [c] Gen. 26: 24; 28: 13–15.

By this constitution, a [19]Kingdome is[19] acquired to God. But seeing Moses had no [20]authority to govern the Israelites, as a successor to the right of Abraham, because he could not claim it by inheritance; it appeareth not as yet, that the people were[20] obliged to take him for Gods Lieutenant, longer than they beleeved that God spake unto him. And [21]therefore his authority (notwithstanding the Covenant they made with God)[21] depended yet merely upon the opinion they had of his Sanctity, and of the reality of his Conferences[e] with God, and the verity of his Miracles; which opinion coming to change, [22]they were no more obliged to take any thing for the law of God, which he propounded to them[22] in Gods name. We are therefore to consider, what other ground there was, of their obligation to obey him. [23]For it could not be the commandement of God that could oblige them; because God spake not to them immediately,[23] but by the mediation of Moses himself:

John 5. 31. And our Saviour saith of himself, If I bear witnesse of my self, my witnesse is not true; [24]much lesse if Moses bear witnesse of himselfe, (especially in a claim of Kingly power over Gods people) ought his testimony to be received. His[24] authority therefore, as the authority of all other Princes, must be grounded on the Consent of the People, [25]and their Promise[25] to obey him. And so it was: For the people (Exod. 20. 18.)[f] when they saw the [26]Thunderings, [251] and the Lightnings,[26] and the noyse of the Trumpet, and the mountaine smoaking, [27]removed, and[27] stood a far off. And they said unto Moses, speak thou with us, and we will hear, but let not God speak with us lest we die. Here was their promise of obedience; and by this it was they obliged themselves to obey whatsoever he should deliver unto them for the Commandement of God.

[19] peculiar kingdom of the Israelites was [20] right from Abraham to govern the Israelites, so that the people could not be [21] the authority of Moses (even if he had covenanted with God on their behalf)
[22] there was no apparent reason why they should be obliged to obey as divine law whatever he might propound [23] God did not command them to obey; nor did he speak to them,
[24] . Moses's [25] promising [26] voice, and the flames, [Vulg (approx)]

Per hanc constitutionem, Regnum Israelitarum acquisitum est Deo peculiare. Quoniam autem Israelitis Imperandi, Moses jus ab Abrahamo nullum habuit, unde obligari potuit populus, ut illum pro Vice-gerente Dei diutius haberent, quam colloquiis inter illum & Deum fidem haberent,[d] Authoritas autem Mosis (etsi cum Deo pro illis Pactus esset) dependeret à sola, quam habebant de sanctitate ejus, & de realitate colloquiorum ejus cum Deo, & de veritate Miraculorum, quae operatus est, existimatione: Quae existimatio si mutari contingeret, causa nulla apparebat, propter quam, quicquam ab illo in nomine Dei proponeretur pro Lege Divina obedire obligarentur, Fundamentum [221] obligationis populi Israelitici ad obediendum Mosi, aliud quaerendum est. Non enim ut obedirent jussit Deus: nec enim illos alloquutus est, nisi mediante Mose ipso. Dicit autem Christus (Ioh. 5. 31.) Si testimonium dico de meipso, testimonium meum non est verum. Authoritas ergo Mosis, sicut Authoritas caeterorum Principum omnium, fundari debuit, in Consensu populi promittentis obedientiam. Atque ita erat. Populus enim (Exod. 20. 18.)[f] Videbat vocem & lampades, & sonitum buccinae, montemque fumantem, & perterriti ac pavore concussi, steterunt procul, dicentes Mosi, loquere tu nobis, & audiemus, non loquatur nobis Dominus, ne forte moriamur. Moses was (under God) Soveraign of the Jews, all his own time, though Aaron had the Priesthood.

And notwithstanding the Covenant constituteth a Sacerdotall Kingdome, that is to say, a Kingdome hereditary to Aaron; yet [28]that is to be understood of the succession, after Moses should bee dead. For whosoever ordereth, and establisheth the Policy,[g] as first founder of a Common-wealth (be it Monarchy, Aristocracy, or Democracy)[28] must needs have Soveraign Power [29]over the people[29] all the while he is doing of it. And that Moses [30]had that power all his own time,[30] is evidently affirmed in the Scripture. °First, in the text last before cited,° because the people promised obedience, not to Aaron but to him. Secondly, (Exod. 24. 1, 2.) And God said unto Moses, Come up unto the Lord, thou, and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy °of the° Elders of Israel[31]. And Moses alone shall come [32]neer[32] the Lord, but they shall not come nigh, neither shall the people goe up with him. By which it is plain, that Moses [33]who was alone called up to God, (and not Aaron, nor the other Priests, nor the Seventy Elders, nor the People who were forbidden to come up) was alone he, that represented to the Israelites the Person of God; that is to say,[33] was their sole Soveraign under God. And °though afterwards it be said° (verse 9.)[h] Then went up Moses, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the Elders of Israel, and they saw the God of Israel, and there was under his feet, as it were a °paved° work of a saphire stone, [34]&c.[34] yet this was not till after Moses had been with God before, and had brought to the people the words [35]which God had said to him. He onely went for the businesse of the people; the others, as the Nobles of his retinue, were admitted for honour to that speciall grace, which was not allowed to the people; which was, (as in the verse after appeareth) to see God and live. God laid not his hand upon them, they saw God, and did eat and drink (that is, did live), but did not carry any commandement from him to the people.[35] Again, it is every where said, The Lord spake unto Moses, [36]as in all other occasions of Government; so also in the ordering of[36] the Ceremonies of Religion, contained in the 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, and 31 Chapters °of Exodus,° and throughout Leviticus: °to Aaron seldome.° The Calfe that Aaron made, Moses threw into the fire.[i] Lastly, the question of the Authority of [g] = polity, form of government (OED, 'policy', n.[1], 2). [h] Correctly: vv. 9–10. [i] Exod. 32: 20.

Aaron, by occasion of his and Miriams mutiny against Moses, was (Numbers 12.) judged by God himself for Moses. So also in the question between Moses, and the [37]People,[37] who had the Right of Governing °the People,° when Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, and two hundred and fifty Princes of the [38]Assembly gathered themselves together (Numb. 16. 3.) against Moses, and against Aaron, and said unto them, Ye take too much upon you,[38] seeing all the congregation are Holy, °every one of them,° and the Lord is amongst them, why lift up your selves above the congregation of the Lord? God caused the Earth to swallow Corah, Dathan, and Abiram with [252] their wives and children alive, and consumed those two hundred and fifty Princes with fire. Therefore neither Aaron, nor the People, nor any Aristocracy of the chief Princes of the People, but Moses alone had [39]next under God the Soveraignty over the Israelites: And that not onely in causes[k] of Civill Policy,[l] but also of Religion: For Moses onely spake with God, and therefore onely could tell the People, what it was that God required at their hands. No man upon pain of death might be so presumptuous as to approach the Mountain[39] where God talked with Moses. Thou shalt set bounds (saith the Lord, Exod. 19. 12.) to the people round about, and say, Take heed to your selves that you goe not up into the Mount, or touch the border of it; whosoever toucheth the Mount shall surely be put to death. And again (verse 21.) Goe down, charge[m] the people, lest they break through unto the Lord to gaze[40]. Out of which we may conclude, that whosoever in a Christian Common-wealth holdeth the place of Moses, is the sole Messenger of God, and Interpreter of his Commandements. And according hereunto, no man ought in the interpretation of the Scripture to proceed further then the bounds which are set by [41]their severall Soveraigns.[41] For the Scriptures

Scripturae enim Sacrae, in quibus hodie loquitur Deus, since God now speaketh in them, are [42]the Mount Sinai; the bounds whereof are[42] the Laws of them that represent Gods Person on Earth. To look upon them, and therein to [43]behold the wondrous works of God, and learn to fear him[43] is allowed; but to interpret them; that is, to pry into [44]what God saith to him whom he appointeth to govern under him, and make themselves Judges whether he govern as God commandeth him, °or not,° is to transgresse the bounds God hath set us, °and to gaze upon God irreverently.°

All spirits were subordinate to the spirit of Moses.

There was no Prophet [45] in the time of Moses, nor pretender to the Spirit of God, but such as Moses had approved, and Authorized. For there were in his time but Seventy men, that are said to Prophecy [46]by the Spirit of God,[46] and these were all of Moses his election; [47]concerning whom[47] God said to Moses (Numb. 11. 16.) Gather to mee Seventy of the Elders of Israel, whom thou knowest to be the Elders of the People[48]. To these God imparted [49]his Spirit; but it was not a different Spirit from[49] that of Moses; for it is said (verse 25.) God came down in a cloud, and [50] took of the Spirit that was upon Moses, and gave it to the Seventy Elders. °But as I have shewn before (chap. 36.) by Spirit, is understood the Mind;° so that the sense of the place is [51]no other than this, that God endued them with a mind conformable, and subordinate to that of Moses, that they might Prophecy, that is to say, speak to the people in Gods name, in such manner, as to set forward (as Ministers of Moses, and by his authority) such doctrine as was agreeable to Moses his doctrine. For they were but Ministers; and when two of them Prophecyed in the Camp, it was thought a new and unlawfull thing; and as it is in the 27. and 28. verses of the same Chapter, they were accused of it, and Joshua advised Moses to forbid them, as not knowing that it was by Moses his Spirit that they Prophecyed. By which it is manifest, that no Subject ought to pretend to Prophecy, or to the Spirit, in opposition to the doctrine [253] established by him, whom God hath set in the place of Moses.[51]

[42] like Mount Sinai; to which bounds have been placed, namely, [43] learn to fear God, [44] ^and examine [45] ^in the camp of the Israelites [46] , but by the spirit of Moses, [47] for [48] ^, and officers over them [Vulg; AV] [49] a spirit conforming to [50] ^spake unto him, and [Vulg; AV]

[51] that these seventy men had the spirit of Moses himself, and were prophets subordinate to him in the administration of the kingdom of God. From this I conclude that in a Christian commonwealth, no citizen is allowed to prophesy, or to teach anything contrary to the doctrine established by the sovereign.

Illas aspicere, & inde discere Deum timere, permissum est; sed interpretari, id est curiosè inquirere, & scrutari, quid illis, quos Deus Rectores nostros fecit, dixerit, & Iudices nosmetipsos facere, utrum nos ita regant, sicut illos jussit Deus, terminos positos à Deo transcendere est.

Dum vixit Moses, nullus erat in Castris Israelitarum Propheta, aut Spiritus Divini ostentator, nisi quos Moses approbaverat, & quibus Authoritatem dederat. Septuaginta tantum prophetâsse tunc dicuntur, sed per Spiritum Mosis; & quos Moses elegerat. Nam Num. 11, 16, dicit Deus ad Mosem, Congrega mihi septuaginta viros de Senibus Israelis, quos tu nosti, quod Senes populi sint, ac Magistri. His autem Spiritum dedit Deus Spiritui Mosis conformem, ut constat ex vers. 25, Descenditque Dominus per nubem, & loquutus est ad eum, auferens de Spiritu, qui erat in Mose, & dans Septuaginta viris. Hujus loci ergo sensus est, Septuaginta illos viros Spiritum habuisse ipsius Mosis, illique Prophetas fuisse subordinatos, in Administratione Regni Dei. Colligo hinc in Civitate Christiana, prophetare, aut docere contra doctrinam à Summo Imperante stabilitam, Civi licere nemini.

After Moses the Soveraignty was in the High Priest.

Aaron being dead, °and after him also Moses,° the Kingdome, as being a Sacerdotall Kingdome, descended by vertue of the Covenant, to Aarons Son, Eleazar the High Priest: And God declared him °(next under himself)° for Soveraign, at the same time that he appointed Joshua for the Generall of their Army. For thus [52]God saith expressely (Numb. 27. 21.) concerning Joshua;[52] He shall stand before Eleazar the Priest, [53]who shall ask counsell for him, before[53] the Lord, at his word shall they goe out, and at his word they shall come in, both he, and all the Children of Israel with him: Therefore the Supreme Power of making War and Peace, was in the Priest. The Supreme Power of Judicature belonged also to the High Priest: For the Book of the Law was [54]in[54] their keeping;[p] and the Priests and Levites onely, were the subordinate Judges in causes Civill, as appears in Deut. 17. 8, 9, 10. And for °the manner of° Gods worship, there was never doubt made, but that [55]the High Priest till the time of Saul, had the Supreme Authority. Therefore[55] the Civill and Ecclesiasticall Power were both joined together in one and the same person, the High Priest; °and ought to bee so, in whosoever governeth by Divine Right; that is, by Authority immediate from God.°

Of the Soveraign power between the time of Joshua and of Saul.

After the death of Joshua, till the [56]time[56] of Saul, the time between is noted frequently in the Book of Judges, that there was in those dayes no King in Israel; and sometimes with this addition, that every man did that which was right in his own eyes.[q] °By which is to bee understood, that° where it is said, there was no King, is meant, there was no Soveraign Power in Israel. And so it [57] was, if we consider the °Act, and° Exercise of such power. For after the death of Joshua, & Eleazar, there arose [58]another generation[58] (Judges 2. 10.)[r] that knew not the Lord, nor the works which he had done for Israel, but did evill in the sight of the Lord, and served Baalim. And the Jews had that quality which St. Paul noteth, to look for a sign,[s] [59] not onely before they would submit them-

Mortuo Aarone, Regnum (ut quod erat Sacerdotale) virtute Pacti, [223] ad Eliazarum pervenit, filium Aaronis, Summum Sacerdotem. Atque illum Summam habere Potestatem declaravit Deus, eo tempore, quo Ioshuam Ducem fecit Exercituum. Dicit enim Dominus (Num. 27, 21.)[n] Tolle Ioshuam filium Nun, virum, in quo est Spiritus Dei, & pone manum tuam super eum. Qui stabit coram Eliazaro Sacerdote & omni multitudine, & dabis ei praecepta cunctis videntibus, & partem gloriae tuae, ut audiat eum omnis Synagoga filiorum Israelis. Pro hoc si quid agendum erit, Eliazar Sacerdos consulet Dominum. Ad verbum ejus egredietur & ingredietur ipse, & omnes filii Israel cum eo, & caetera multitudo. Belli ergo & Pacis in Sacerdote Potestas Summa erat. Etiam Iudiciorum Summa Potestas penes eundem erat, illi enim Libri Legis commissa est custodia;[p] Sacerdotes & Levitae soli in rebus civilibus Iudices subordinati erant, constat ex Deut. 17, 8, 9, 10. Quod autem ad cultum Divinum attinet, quin à Summo Sacerdote ordinandus esset, nunquam dubitatum est. Potestas ergò Civilis & Ecclesiastica conjuncta hactenus fuit in unâ & eadem personâ, Summo Sacerdote.

Post mortem Ioshuae usque ad Regnum Sauli, tempori intercedenti nota inditur passim in Libro Iudicum, quod illis diebus non erat Rex in Israel, addito quandoque quod Vnusquisque faciebat, quod rectum erat in oculis suis.[q] Quod dicitur, quod non erat Rex, idem est, ac si dictum esset, non erat in Israelitis Summa Potestas. Id quod, si pro exercitio Summae Potestatis accipiamus manifestum est. Nam post mortem Ioshuae & Eliazari (Iud. 2. 10.)[r] *Surrexerunt alii qui non noverunt Dominum, & opera quae fecerat cum Israel. selves °to the government of Moses,° but also after they had obliged themselves [60]by their submission.[60] Whereas Signs, and Miracles had for End to procure Faith, not to keep °men from violating it, when they have once given° it; for to that men are obliged by the law of Nature. But if we consider not the Exercise, but the Right of [61]Governing,[61] the Soveraign power was still in the High Priest. Therefore whatsoever obedience was yeelded to any of the Judges (who were men chosen by God extraordinarily, to save his [62]rebellious subjects[62] out of the hands of the enemy,) it cannot bee drawn into argument against the [63]Right the High Priest had to the Soveraign Power,[63] in all matters, both of Policy[t] and Religion. And neither the Judges, nor Samuel himselfe had [64]an ordinary, but extraordinary calling to the Government;[64] and were obeyed by the [65]Israelites,[65] not out of duty, but out of reverence to their favour with God, appearing in their wisdome, courage, or felicity. Hitherto therefore the [66]Right of Regulating both the Policy, and the Religion,[66] were inseparable. [254]

Of the Rights of the Kings of Israel.

To the Judges, succeeded Kings: And whereas before, all authority, both in Religion, and Policy,[u] was in the High Priest; so now it [67]was[67] all in the King. For the [68]Soveraignty over the people, which was before, not onely by vertue of the Divine Power, but also by a particular pact of the Israelites in God, and next under him, in the High Priest, as his Vicegerent[v] on earth, was cast off by the People, with the consent of God himselfe. For when they[68] said to Samuel (1 Sam. 8. 5.) make us a King to judge us, like all the Nations, [69]they signified that they would no more bee governed by the commands that should bee laid upon them by the Priest, in the name of God; but by one that should command them in the same manner that all other nations were commanded; and consequently in deposing the High Priest of Royall authority, they deposed that peculiar Government of God. And yet God consented to it, saying[69] to Samuel (verse 7.) Hearken unto the voice of the People, in all that they shall say unto thee; for they have not rejected thee, but they have rejected mee, that I should not reign over them. [70]Having therefore rejected God, in whose Right the[70] Priests governed, there was no authority left to the Priests, [71] but such as the King was pleased to allow them; which was more, or lesse, according as the Kings were good, or evill. And for the [72]Government of Civill affaires,[72] it is manifest, it was all in the hands of the King. For in the same Chapter, verse 20. [73]They say they will be like all the Nations; that their King shall be their Judge, and goe before them, and fight their battells; that is, he shall have the whole authority, both in[73] Peace and War. In which is contained also the ordering of [74]Religion: for there was no other Word of God in that time, by which to regulate Religion, but[74] the Law of Moses, which was their Civill Law. Besides, we read (1 Kings 2. 27.) that Solomon thrust out Abiathar [75]from being Priest before the Lord: He had therefore authority over the High Priest, as over any other Subject;[75] which is a great mark of Supremacy in Religion. And we read also (1 Kings 8.) that [76]hee[76] dedicated the Temple; that he blessed the People; and °that he himselfe in person° made that excellent prayer, used in the Consecrations of all Churches, [77]and houses of Prayer;[77] [w] which is another great mark of Supremacy in Religion. Again, we read (2 Kings 22.) that when there was question concerning the Book of the Law found in the [78] Temple, the same was not decided by the High Priest but Josiah sent both him, and others °to enquire° concerning it, of Hulda, the Prophetesse; which is another mark of the [79] Supremacy in Religion. Lastly, wee read (1 Chron. 26. 30.) that David made Hashabiah and his brethren, Hebronites, Officers among them of Israel Westward, in all businesse of the Lord, and in the service of the King. Likewise (verse 32.) that hee made other Hebronites, rulers over the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the halfe tribe of Manasseh (these were the [80]rest of Israel[80] that dwelt beyond Jordan) for every matter pertaining to God, and affairs of the King. Is not this full Power, both temporall and spirituall, as they call it, that would divide it? To conclude; from the first institution of Gods [255] Kingdome, to the Captivity, the Supremacy [81]of Religion, was[81] in the same hand with that of the Civill Soveraignty; and the Priests office after the election of Saul[82], was not Magisteriall, but Ministeriall.

The practice of Supremacy in Religion, was not in the time of the Kings, according to the Right thereof.

[83]Notwithstanding the government both in Policy[x] and Religion, were joined, first in the High Priests, and afterwards in the Kings,[83] so far forth as concerned the Right; yet it [84]appeareth by the same Holy History, that the people understood it not; but there being amongst them a great part, and probably the greatest part, that no longer than they saw great miracles, or (which is equivalent to a miracle) great abilities, or great felicity in the enterprises of their Governours, gave sufficient credit, either to the fame of Moses, or to the Colloquies between God and the Priests; they took occasion as oft as their Governours displeased them, by blaming sometimes the Policy, sometimes the Religion, to change the Government, or revolt from their Obedience at their pleasure: And from thence proceeded from time to time the civill troubles, divisions, and calamities of the Nation.[84] As for example, after the death of Eleazar and Joshua, the [85]next generation which had not seen the wonders of God, but were left to their own weak reason, not knowing themselves[85] obliged by the Covenant of a Sacerdotall Kingdome, regarded [86]no more the Commandement of the Priest, nor any law[86] of Moses, but did every man that which was right in his own eyes; and obeyed °in Civill affairs,° such men, as from time to time they thought able to deliver them from the neighbour Nations that oppressed them; and consulted [87]not with God (as they ought to doe,)[87] but with such men, or women, as [88]they guessed to bee Prophets by their[88] Praedictions of things to come; and [89]though they had an Idol in their Chappel, yet if they had a Levite for their Chaplain, they made account they worshipped the God of Israel.[89] [y]

[83] Now although we have shown that the civil and ecclesiastical sovereignty were, up to that time, always joined together,

[84] does not follow either from Holy Scripture or from natural reason that the people understood that right. For the common people do not use reason except in their private affairs; and usually they remain obedient no longer than they see miracles, or (what is almost equivalent to a miracle) extraordinary potency in their governors, or extraordinary success in their enterprises. Therefore the Jews, after Moses and Joshua were dead, did not give great credit either to their fame or to the discussions of their priests with God; but blaming sometimes the polity, and sometimes the religion, refused to obey their governors. And thence proceeded the tumults, seditions, and calamities which in the end ruined the nation of the Israelites.

Quamquam autem Potestatem Summam Civilem & Ecclesiasticam hactenus semper conjunctas esse, quoad Ius, manifestum fecimus; non tamen sequitur neque ex Scriptura Sacra, neque ex ratione Naturali, Ius illud intellexisse populum. Vulgus enim, non nisi in rebus suis privatis ratione utitur; nec diutius obedire solet, quam aut miracula; aut (quod Miraculo ferè par est) in Rectoribus suis vim egregiam, aut in rebus gestis felicitatem extraordinariam aspiciunt. Iudaei ergo, postquam Moses & Ioshua mortui essent, neque famam, neque cum Deo colloquia Sacerdotum, magni aestimaverunt; sed quandoque Politiam, quandoque Religionem criminantes, Rectoribus suis obedientiam negaverunt. Atque inde turbae, seditiones, & calamitates profectae sunt, quae Israelitarum Gentem tandem everterunt. Mortuis enim Eliazaro, & Ioshua, Iudaei, qui Miracula non viderant, neque se Sacerdotalis Regni Pacto obligatos esse intelligentes, Imperium Sacerdotis, & Leges Mosaicas parvi pendentes, fecerunt unusquisque, quod rectum videbatur sibi, illisque obediverunt, quos ipsi idoneos esse putaverunt qui se quoties à vicinis gentibus opprimerentur, liberarent. Itaque non ampliùs Deum consuluerunt, sed virum vel foeminam aliquam futurorum praedictorem, & huic

And afterwards when they demanded a King, after the manner of the nations; yet it was not with a design to depart from [90]the[90] worship of God [o]their King;[o] but despairing of the justice of the sons of Samuel, they would have a King to judg them in Civill actions;[z] but not that they would [91]allow their King to change the Religion which they thought was recommended to them by Moses.[91] So that they alwaies kept in store a pretext, either of Justice, or Religion, to discharge them selves of [92]their obedience, whensoever they had hope to prevaile.[92] Samuel was displeased with the people, for that they desired a King, [93](for God was their King already, and Samuel had but an authority under him);[93] yet did Samuel, when Saul observed not his counsell, in destroying Agag as God had commanded, anoint another King, namely, David, to take the [94]succession[94] from his heirs.[aa] Rehoboam was no Idolater; but when the people thought [95]him an Oppressor; that Civil pretence carried from him ten Tribes to Jeroboam an Idolater.[95] [ab] And generally through the whole History of the Kings, as well of Judah, as of Israel, [96]there were Prophets that alwaies controlled[ac] the Kings, for transgressing the Religion;
2 Chro. 19. 2. and sometimes also for Errours of[96] State; as Jehosaphat was reproved by the Prophet Jehu, for aiding [256] the King of Israel against the Syrians; and Hezekiah, by Isaiah, for shewing [97]his[97] treasures to the Ambassadors of Babylon.[ad] By all which it appeareth, that though the [98]power[98] both of State and Religion were in the Kings; yet [99] none of them were [100]uncontrolled[ae] in the use of it, but such as were gracious[af] for their own naturall abilities, or felicities. So that from the practise of those times, there can no argument be drawn, that the Right of Supremacy in Religion was not in the Kings, unlesse we place it in the Prophets; and conclude, that because Hezekiah praying to the Lord before the Cherubins, was not answered from thence, nor then, but afterwards by the Prophet Isaiah,[ag] therefore Isaiah was supreme Head of the Church; or because Iosiah consulted Hulda the Prophetesse, concerning the Book of the Law,[ah] that therefore neither he, nor the High Priest, but Hulda the Prophetesse had the Supreme authority in matter of Religion; which I thinke is not the opinion of any Doctor.[100]

[96] prophets constantly arose who rebuked the kings for the bad government, sometimes of religion, and sometimes of the civil [97] the royal [98] right [99] ^ almost [100] able to exercise it without criticisms by the people. Praise was given only to the lives of those kings who had terrifying potency or marvellous success. Therefore, since the right of kings is evident, and since the people, and sometimes even the prophets themselves, do not understand it, it is wrong to attack the rights of kings on the basis of examples drawn from the ignorance of the people or from the teaching of the prophets.

obedientiam & honorem praestiterunt, ut Prophetae à Deo. Etiam posteà, cum Regem sibi dari, more Gentium, postularent, id tamen non eo consilio fecerunt, ut cultum Dei pristinum desererent, sed quia Iustitiam à filiis Samuelis desperantes, voluerunt Iudicia Civilia à Rege administrari,[z] non quod ceremonias Leviticas abolitas vellent. Itaque praetextum semper aliquem sibi reservârunt, vel à Iustitia vel à Religione, quo se obedientia Rectoribus suis debita expedirent. Succensuit populo Samuel quod Regem (rejecto Deo) postularent; Idem, quando Saulus consilium suum in occidendo Agag, juxta mandatum Dei neglexerat, alium Regem unxit, nempe Davidem, qui Sauli Haeredes Regno privaret.[aa] Rehoboam Idololatra quidem non erat, sed populus, quia videbatur sibi regnare duriusculè, ab eo defecit.[ab] Per totam denique historiam Regum Iudaeae & Israelis, Prophetae surrexerunt indies, qui Reges criminati sunt, aliquando quod religionem, aliquando quod statum Civilem malè administrarent. Sic Rex Iehosaphat reprehensus est à Prophe-ta Iehu, quod Regem Israelis adjuvasset contra Syrios, & Rex Hezekias ab Isaiah, quod thesaurum Regium ostendisset Legatis Babilonicis.[ad] Constat ergò, etsi utrumque Ius rerum Civilium & Divinarum, esset in Regibus; neminem tamen ferè Regum illorum Ius suum sine reprehensionibus [226] populi potuisse exercere. After the Captivity the Iews had no setled Common-wealth.

During the Captivity, the Iews had no Common-wealth at all: And after their return, though they renewed their Covenant with God,[ai] yet there was no promise made of obedience, neither to Esdras, nor to any other: And presently after[aj] they became subjects to the Greeks[ak] (from whose [101]Customes, and Daemonology, and from[101] the doctrine of the Cabalists,[al] their Religion became much corrupted): In such sort as nothing can be gathered from their confusion, both in State and Religion, concerning the Supremacy in either. And therefore so far forth as concerneth the Old Testament, we may conclude, that [102]whosoever had the Soveraignty of the Common-wealth amongst the Jews, the same had also the Supreme Authority in matter of Gods externall worship; and represented Gods Person; that is the person of God the Father; though he were not called by the name of Father, till such time as he sent into the world his Son Jesus Christ, to redeem mankind from their sins, and bring them into his Everlasting Kingdome, to be saved for evermore. Of which we are to speak in the Chapter following.[102]

CHAP. XLI.

Of the OFFICE of our BLESSED SAVIOUR.

Three parts of the Office of Christ.

We find in Holy Scripture three parts of the Office of [1]the Messiah:[1] The first of a Redeemer, or Saviour: The second of a Pastor, Counsellor, °or Teacher,° that is, of a Prophet sent from God, to convert [2]such as God hath elected to Salvation:[2] The third of a King, an eternall King, but under his Father, as Moses and the High Priests were in their severall times. And to these three parts are correspondent three times. For our Redemption he wrought at his first coming, by the Sacrifice, °wherein he offered up himself° for our sinnes upon the Crosse: our Conversion he wrought partly [3]then[3] in his own Person; and partly worketh now [4]by his Ministers; °and will continue to work till his coming again.° And after his coming again, shall begin that his °glorious° Reign over his elect, which is to last eternally.

His Office as a Redeemer.

To the Office of a Redeemer, that is, of one that payeth the [5]Ransome of Sin, (which Ransome is Death,)[5] it appertaineth, that he was Sacrificed, and thereby bare °upon his own head,° and carryed away from us our iniquities, °in such sort as God had required.° Not that the death of one man, though [6]without sinne,[6] can satisfie for the offences of all men, in the rigour of Justice, but [7]in the Mercy of God, that ordained such Sacrifices for sin, as he was pleased in his mercy to accept.[7] In the Old Law (as we may read, Leviticus the 16.) the Lord required, that there should every year once, bee made an Atonement for the Sins of all Israel, both Priests, and others; for the doing whereof, Aaron °alone° was to sacrifice for himself and the Priests a young Bullock; and °for the rest of the people,° he was to receive from [8]them[8] two young Goates, of which he was to sacrifice one[9]; but as for the other, which was the Scape Goat, he was to [10] lay his hands on the head thereof, and by a confession of the iniquities of the people, to lay them all on that head, and then by some opportune[a] man, to [11]cause the Goat to be led[11] into the wildernesse, and there to escape, and carry away with him the iniquities of the people. As the Sacrifice of the one Goat was a sufficient [12](because an acceptable) price[12] for the Ransome of all Israel; so the death of [13]the Messiah,[13] is a sufficient price, for the Sins of all mankind, because there was no

CAPVT XLI.

De Servatoris nostri Benedicti Officio.

Officii Servatoris nostri reperimus in Scripturis Sacris tres Partes; Primam Redemptoris, sive Servatoris: Secundam Pastoris, sive Consiliarii, id est Missi à Deo, ad Conversionem Electorum Prophetae: Tertiam Regis, Aeterni Regis; sed sicut Moses, & temporibus suis Summi Sacerdotes, sub Patre suo. Atque his tribus Partibus respondent tria Tempora. Nam in primo ejus adventu, per sui ipsius propter peccata nostra Oblationem in Cruce nos Redemit. Conversionem nostram operatus est, partim ipse, dum erat in terris, docendo; partim operatur nunc usque per Ministros suos: Post Adventum ejus secundum regnabit super Electos suos, & Regnum ejus durabit in aeternum.

Ad Officium Redemptoris, id est, illius, qui Redemptionis pretium solvit, pertinuit, ut Victima fieret, & iniquitates nostras ferret auferretque. Quod tamen ita intelligendum est, non ut pro peccatis omnium hominum unius hominis mors, quanquam justissimi, secundum Iustitiae strictas regulas posset satisfacere; sed quia quod Deus summè misericors in pretium Redemptionis Lege postulaverat, illud Christus praestitit. In Lege Veteri (ut legimus Levit. 16.) jussit Deus, pro peccatis Israelis, tum Sacerdotum, tum populi, quotannis fieri reconciliationem hoc modo, Aaron pro se & Sacerdotibus sacrificare [227] debebat Vitulum; acceptis autem à populo duobus Hircis alterum pro populo sacrificare, alterum emittere, qui vocabatur Hircus Emissarius. Super caput hujus antequam emittendus esset, imposuit manus suas Sacerdos Summus, & per Confessionem peccatorum Populi, peccata illa omnia in caput Hirci imposuit, & deinde per hominem aliquem opportunum, Hircum emittebat in desertum, ut peccata populi fugiens absportaret. Sicut autem Sacrificium alterius Hirci pretium Redemptionis Israel sufficiens erat, (quia majus non postulabatur) ita quoque mors Christi pro peccatis totius humore required[14]. Our Saviour Christs sufferings seem [15]to be here[15] figured, as cleerly, as in the oblation of Isaac,[b] or in any other type[c] of him in the Old Testament: He was both the sacrificed Goat, and the Scape Goat; Hee was [16]oppressed, and he was afflicted[16] (Esay[d] 53. 7.); he opened not his mouth; he [17]is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep is dumbe [262] before the shearer, so opened he not[17] his mouth: Here he is the sacrificed Goat. [18] He hath born our Griefs, (ver. 4.) and carried our sorrows: And again, (ver. 6.) the Lord hath laid upon him the iniquities of us all: And so he is the Scape Goat. [19] He was cut off from the land of the living (ver. 8.) for the transgression of my People[20]: There again he is the sacrificed Goat. And again, (ver. 11.) [21]he shall bear their sins:[21] Hee is the Scape Goat. Thus is the [22] Lamb of God equivalent to both those Goates; sacrificed, [23]in that he dyed; and escaping,[23] in his Resurrection; being raised opportunely by his Father, and removed from the [24]habitation of men[24] in his Ascension.

Christs Kingdome not of this world.

For as much therefore, as he that redeemeth, hath no title to the thing redeemed, before the °Redemption, and° Ransome paid; °and this Ransome was the Death of the Redeemer;° it is manifest, that our Saviour °(as man)° was not King of those that he Redeemed, before hee suffered death; °that is, during that time hee conversed[f] bodily on the Earth. I say, he was not then King in present, by vertue of the Pact, which the faithfull make with him in Baptisme:° Neverthelesse, by the renewing of their Pact with God in Baptisme, [25]they[25] were obliged to obey him for King, (under his Father) whensoever he should be pleased to [26]take the Kingdome upon him.[26] According whereunto, our Saviour himself expressely saith, (Iohn 18. 36.) My Kingdome is not of this world. [27]Now seeing the Scripture maketh mention but of two worlds; this that is now, and shall remain to the day of Judgment, (which is therefore also called, the last day;) and that which shall bee after the day of Judgement, when[27] there shall bee a new Heaven, and a new Earth;[g] [28] the Kingdome of Christ is not to begin till the °generall° Resurrection. And that Atque Servatoris nostri Passio non minùs videtur his ceremoniis perspicuè praefigurata, quàm in Oblatione Isaaci,[b] aut, quovis alio ejus typo in Testamento Vetere. Erat enim Christus non modo Victima, sed etiam Emissarius. Dicit Isaias 53. 7, Oblatus est, quia ipse voluit, & non aperuit os suum: sicut ovis ad occisionem ducetur, & quasi agnus coram tondente obmutescet, & non aperiet os suum. En Hircum Sacrificatum. Idem, Propheta (dicam an Euangelista) vers. 4, Languores nostros ipse tulit, & dolores nostros ipse portavit. Et vers. 6, Posuit Dominus in eo iniquitatem omnium nostrum. Ecce Emissarium. Deinde vers. 8, Abscissus est de terra viventium: propter scelus populi mei percussi eum. Hic rursùs est Hircus sacrificatus. Deinde vers. 11.[e] Et ipse peccata multorum tulit. Vbi rursus Emissarius. Utrumque ergo Hircum unus valet Agnus Dei, sacrificatus in Cruce; mortem in resurrectione ejus superans, à Patre suo opportunè suscitatus; & à terra viventium remotus in Ascensione.

Quoniam autem Redemptor Ius in Redemptum, antequam pretium solutum sit, nullum habeat, manifestum est, Servatorem nostrum ante mortem suam, Redemptorum Regem non fuisse. Veruntamen per Pactum cum Deo in Baptismo renovatum, obligati sunt, quicunque baptizantur, Christo obedire, pro Rege (sub Patre ejus) tunc, quandocunque illi placuerit Officium Regis exercere. Itaque Servator noster ipse dissertis verbis Ioh. 18. 36: Regnum meum (inquit) non est hujus mundi. Quoniam ergo post hunc mundum, mundus futurus ille est, in quo Terra nova, & Coeli erunt novi,[g] id est, post Resurrectionem, manifestum est, Regnum Christi, ante Resurrectionem incepturum non esse. is [29]it which[29] our Saviour saith, (Mat. 16. 27.) The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his Angels; and then he shall reward every man according to his works. To reward every man according to his works, is to [30]execute the Office of a King; and this is not to be[30] till he come in the glory of his Father, [31]with his Angells. When our Saviour[31] saith, (Mat. 23. 2.)[h] The Scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses seat; All therefore whatsoever they bid you doe, that observe and doe; hee declareth plainly, that hee ascribeth [32]Kingly[32] Power, for that time, not to himselfe, but to them. And so hee doth also, where he saith, (Luke 12. 14.) Who made mee a Iudge, or Divider[i] over you? And (Iohn 12. 47.) I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. And yet [33]our Saviour[33] came into this world that hee might bee a King, and a Judge [34] in the world to come: For hee was the Messiah, that is, the °Christ, that is, the° Anointed Priest, and the Soveraign Prophet of God; [35]that is to say, he was to[35] have all the power that was in Moses the Prophet, in the High Priests °that succeeded Moses,° and in the Kings that succeeded the Priests. And St. Iohn saies expressely (chap. 5. ver. 22.) The Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son. And this is not repugnant to that other place, I came not to judge the world: for [263] this is spoken of the world present, the other of the world to come; as also where it is said, [36]that at the second coming of[36] Christ, (Mat. 19. 28.) Yee that have followed me in the Regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his Glory, yee shall also sit on twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

The End of Christs comming was to renew the Covenant of the Kingdome of God, and to perswade the Elect to imbrace it, which was the second part of his Office.

If then Christ whilest hee was on Earth, had no Kingdome in this world, to what end [37] was his first coming? It was to restore unto God, by a new Covenant, the Kingdom, which [38]being his by the Old Covenant, had been cast off by the rebellion of the Israelites[38] in the election of Saul. Which to doe, he was to [39]preach unto them,[39] that he was the Messiah, °that is, the King° promised to them by the Prophets; and to offer himselfe in sacrifice for the sinnes of [40]them that should by faith submit themselves thereto; and in case the nation generally[40] should refuse him, to call to his obedience such as should beleeve in him amongst the Gentiles. So that there are two parts of (Matth. 16. 27.) Filius hominis veniet in gloria Patris sui, cum Angelis suis: & tunc retribuet unicuique secundum opera sua. Iam retribuere unicuique secundum opera sua, idem est, quod Regnum administrare; & propterea Christus Regnum exerciturus non est, antequam [228] veniat in gloria Patris, nempe post Resurrectionem universalem. Quando Christus dicit (Matth. 23. 2.)[h] Scribae & Pharisaei sedent in Cathedra Mosis. Omnia ergo quaecunque facere jubent, ea observate & facite. Nonne apertè pro eo tempore, non sibi Summam Potestatem, sed illis attribuit? Sic etiam facit (Luc. 12. 14.) Quis me constituit Iudicem aut Divisorem super vos? Item (Ioh. 12. 47.) Non veni ad judicandum, sed ad salvandum mundum. Attamen in hunc mundum venit Christus, ut regnaret, & judicaret, sed mundum futurum. Cum enim esset Messiah, id est Unctus Sacerdos, & Propheta Dei supremus, potestatem habere omnem oportebat illum, quam habuerat aut Moses Propheta, aut Summi Sacerdotes, aut qui Summis Sacerdotibus successerunt Reges. Item expressè dicit Sanctus Iohannes (Cap. 5. 22.) Pater judicat neminem, sed judicium omne commisit Filio. Neque tamen repugnat hoc cum textu illo: non veni ad judicandum mundum. Nam textus hic de mundo praesente, alter de mundo venturo loquitur; sicut etiam textus ille (Matth. 19. 28.) ubi Christus dicit Vos qui sequuti estis me in regeneratione, cum sederit Filius hominis in sede Majestatis suae, sedebitis & vos super sedes duodecim, judicantes duodecim tribus Israel.

Si Christus ergo, quando in terra versabatur, Regnum in hoc mundo non haberet, quae causa erat (rogabit aliquis) adventus primi? Venisse, respondeo, ut Deo Patri per Pactum novum, restitueret Regnum, quod à populo in Electione Sauli rejectum fuerat. Quod ut faceret, oportebat illum manifestum facere praedicando & docendo, quod ipse Messias erat à Prophetis promissus; & pro peccatis hominum Victimam se offerre, & siquidem à populo Iudaeo non reciperetur, vocare ad obedientiam ex gentibus, omnes qui in eum crederent. our Saviours Office during his aboad[j] upon the Earth: One to Proclaim himself the Christ; and another by Teaching, and by working of Miracles, to perswade, and prepare men to live so, as to be worthy of the Immortality Beleevers were to enjoy, at [41]such time as he should come in majesty, to take possession of his Fathers Kingdome.[41] And therefore it is, that the time of his preaching, is °often° by himself called the Regeneration;[k] which is not [42]properly a Kingdome, and thereby a warrant to deny obedience to the Magistrates that then were,[42] (for hee commanded to obey those that sate then in Moses chaire, and to pay tribute to Caesar); [43]but onely an earnest[l] of the Kingdome of God that was to come, to those to whom God had given the grace to be his disciples, and to beleeve in him; For which cause the Godly are said to bee already in the Kingdome of Grace,[m] as naturalized in that heavenly Kingdome.[43]

The preaching of Christ not contrary to the then law of the Iews, nor of Caesar.

Hitherto therefore there is nothing done, or taught by Christ, that tendeth to the diminution of the Civill Right of the Jewes, or of Caesar. For as touching the [44]Common-wealth which then was amongst the Jews, both they that bare rule amongst them, and they that were governed, did all expect the Messiah, and[44] Kingdome of God; which they [45]could[45] not have done if their Laws had forbidden him (when he came) to manifest, °and declare° himself. Seeing therefore he did nothing, but by Preaching, and Miracles go about to prove himselfe to be that Messiah, hee did therein nothing against their laws. The Kingdome hee claimed was to bee in another world: He taught all men to obey in the mean time them that sate in Moses seat: He [46]allowed them to[46] give Caesar his tribute, and refused to take upon himselfe to be a Judg. How then could his words, or actions bee seditious, or tend to the overthrow of their °then° Civill Government? But God having determined his sacrifice, for the reduction[n] of his elect to their former °covenanted° obedience, for the means, whereby he would bring the same to effect, made use of [47]their[47] malice, and ingratitude. Nor [48] [264] was it contrary to the laws of Caesar. For though Pilate himself (to gratifie the Jews) delivered him to be crucified; yet before he did so, he pronounced openly, that he found no fault in him:[p] °And put for title of his condemnation, not as the Jews required, that he pretended to bee King; but simply, That hee was King of the Iews; and notwithstanding their clamour, refused to alter it; saying, What I have written, I have written.°[q]

At that time the people were not actually subjects of the kingdom of God; those who believed had a pledge of their entry into the future kingdom of God, and for that reason that state is sometimes called the 'kingdom of grace' – that is, the right to, not the possession of, the heavenly commonwealth.

Atque ob hanc causam est, quod tempus praedicationis ejus, ab ipso vocatur Regeneratio.[k] Regeneratio autem Regnum non est, neque ergo causa inde adduci potest, quà minus Cives in quacunque Civitate Legibus Civilibus obedire tenerentur. Quomodo igitur aut verba aut actiones ejus potuerunt esse seditiosae, aut tendere ad regiminis Civilis subversionem? Sed Deus, qui illum propter reductionem Electorum ad obedientiam suam pristinam, ad Sacrificium destinaverat, ad eum finem malitiâ & ingratitudine hominum infidelium usus est. The third part of his Office was to be King (under his Father) of the Elect.

As for [49]the third part of his Office, which was to be King,[49] I have already shewn that his Kingdome was not to begin till the [50]Resurrection.[50] But then he shall be King, not onely as God, [51]in which sense he is King already, and ever shall be, of all the Earth, in vertue of his omnipotence; but also peculiarly of his own Elect, by vertue of the pact they make with him in their[51] Baptisme. And therefore it is, that our Saviour saith (Mat. 19. 28.) that his Apostles should sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel, When the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory: °whereby he signified that he should reign then in his humane nature;° and (Mat. 16. 27.) The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his Angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works. The same we may read, Marke 13. 26. and 14. 62. and more expressely °for the time,° Luke 22. 29, 30. I appoint unto you a Kingdome, as my Father hath appointed to mee, that you may eat and drink at my table in my Kingdome, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. By which it is manifest, that the Kingdome of Christ appointed to him by his Father, is not to be before the Son of Man shall come in Glory, and make his Apostles Judges of the twelve tribes of Israel. But a man may here ask, seeing there is no marriage in the Kingdome of Heaven,[r] whether men shall then eat, and drink; what eating [52]therefore is meant in this place? This is expounded by our Saviour (Iohn 6. 27.) where he saith, Labour not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give you. So that by eating [53] at Christs table, is meant [54]the eating of the Tree of Life; that is to say, the enjoying of Immortality,[54] in the Kingdome of the Son of Man. By which places, °and many more,° it is evident, that [55]our Saviours Kingdome is to bee exercised by him[55] in his humane nature.

Christs authority in the Kingdome of God subordinate to that of his Father.

Again, he is to be King then, no otherwise than [56]as subordinate, or Vicegerent[s] of God the[56] Father, as Moses was in the wildernesse; and as the High Priests were before the reign of Saul: and as the Kings were after it. °For it is one of the Prophecies concerning Christ, that he should be like (in Office) to Moses:° I will raise them up a Prophet (saith the Lord, [57] Deut. 18. 18.) from amongst their Brethren like unto thee, and will put my words into his mouth, and this similitude with Moses, is also apparent in the actions of our Saviour himself, °whilest he was conversant[t] on Earth.° For as Moses chose twelve Princes of the tribes, to govern under him; so did our Saviour choose twelve Apostles, who shall sit on twelve [265] thrones, and judge the twelve tribes of Israel:[u] And as Moses authorized Seventy Elders, to °receive the Spirit of Quod attinet ad Officium ejus Regium, ostensum ante est Regnum ejus incepturum non esse ante diem Iudicii. Tunc vero Rex erit, non tantum ut Deus, sed etiam ut Homo, virtute Pacti novi, quod in Baptismo factum est; & propterea dicit Servator noster (Mat. 19, 28.) quod Apostoli ejus sedebunt super duodecim Thronos, & judicabunt duodecim tribus Israelis, tunc, cum Filius hominis sedebit in Throno gloriae suae; & (Matth. 16, 27.) Filius hominis veniet in gloria Patris sui, cum Angelis; & tunc retribuet unicuique secundum opera sua. Idem legimus Marc. 13, 26, & 14, 62, & expressius Luc. 22, 29, 30. Et ego dispono vobis sicut disposuit mihi Pater meus Regnum, ut edatis & bibatis super mensam meam, in Regno meo, & sedeatis super Thronos judicantes duodecim tribus Israelis. Unde manifestum est, Regnum quod Christo disposuit Pater, non futurum esse antequam Filius hominis veniat in gloria, Apostolosque suos judicare faciat duodecim tribus Israelis. Sed quaeri hic potest, cum in Regno coelesti nulla futura sint Matrimonia,[r] utrum homines edent & bibent; & quid per edere & bibere hoc loco intelligendum est. Explicat hoc (Ioh. 6, 27.) Servator noster, Operamini non cibum qui perit, sed qui permanet in vitam aeternam, quam Filius hominis dabit vobis. Itaque per edere, & bibere super mensam Christi, intelligitur vita aeterna, sive arbor vitae, quae praebebitur in Regno Filii hominis. Atque haec loca sufficiunt ad probandum Regnum Christi administrandum esse ab eo, [230] in naturâ suâ humanâ post Resurrectionem. Etiam tunc, non aliter Rex erit, quam sub Patre suo, sicut Moses in deserto, & ut Sacerdotes Summi ante Regnum Sauli, & sicut Reges post illum. Similitudo autem haec cum Mose, apparet etiam in Servatoris nostri actionibus. Sicut enim Moses elegit duodecim Principes tribuum, qui sub se regerent; ita Servator duodecim elegit Apostolos, qui sedebunt super duodecim thronos, & judicabunt duodecim tribus Israelis.[u] Et sicut Moses Authoritatem dedit Septua-

God, and to° Prophecy to the people, °that is, (as I have said before,)[v] to speak unto them in the name of God;° so our Saviour also ordained seventy Disciples, to preach °his Kingdome, and Salvation to all Nations.°[w] And as when a complaint was made to Moses, against those [58] of the Seventy that prophecyed in the camp °of Israel,° he justified them in it, °as being subservient therein to his government;°[x] so also our Saviour, when St. John complained to him of [59]a certain man[59] that cast out Devills in his name, justified [60]him therein,[60] saying, (Luke 9. 50.) Forbid °him° not, for hee that is not against us, is on our part.

Again, our Saviour resembled Moses [61] in the institution of Sacraments, both of Admission into the Kingdome of God, and of Commemoration [62]of his deliverance of his Elect from their miserable condition. As the Children[62] of Israel had for Sacrament of their Reception into the Kingdome of God, °before the time of Moses,° the rite of Circumcision, [63]which rite having been omitted in the Wildernesse, was again restored as soon as they came into the land of Promise;[y] so also the Jews, before the coming of our Saviour, had a rite of Baptizing, that is, of washing with water all those that being Gentiles, embraced the God of Israel. This rite[63] St. John the Baptist used in the reception of all them that gave their names to [64]the Christ, whom hee preached to bee already come into the world;[z] and our Saviour instituted the same for a Sacrament to be taken by all that beleeved in him.[64] [aa] From what cause the rite of Baptisme first proceeded, is not expressed °formally° in the Scripture; but it may be probably thought to be an imitation of the law of Moses, concerning Leprousie; wherein the Leprous man was commanded to be kept out of the campe of Israel for a certain time; after which time being judged by the Priest to be clean, hee was admitted [65] into the campe after a solemne Washing.[ab] And this may therefore bee a type[ac] of the Washing in Baptisme; wherein such men as are cleansed of the Leprousie of Sin by Faith, are received into the Church °with the solemnity of Baptisme.° There is another conjecture drawn from the Ceremonies of the Gentiles, in a certain case that [66] rarely happens; and that is, when a man that was thought dead, chanced to recover, other men [67]made scruple[67] to converse[ad] with him, as they would doe to converse with a Ghost, unlesse hee were received again into the number of men, by Washing, as Children new born were washed from the unclean-

Etiam in Institutione Sacramentorum, tum Admissionis in Regnum Dei, tum Commemorationis, Servator noster Mosem & Abrahamum imitatus est. Sicut enim populus Israeliticus habuit pro Sacramento Admissionis in Regnum Dei ritum Circumcisionis, ita habent Christiani ritum Baptismi; quo usus est primo Iohannes Baptista in receptione eorum omnium, qui nomina dederunt Christo.[z] Eodem ritu, Servatoris nostri jussu[aa] usi sunt Apostoli & Ministri Christi omnes usque hodie. Quam habuit ritus Baptizationis originem primam, in Scripturis Sacris non declaratur. Sed imitationem fuisse legis Mosaicae circa Leprosos, conjectura est non improbabilis. Leprosos enim extrà castra Israelis custodiri jubebat Lex, donec à Sacerdote pronuntiarentur mundi, & tunc solenniter lavati in castra denuò recipiebantur.[ab] Potest ergo esse, ut typus hic fuerit lavacri Baptismalis; in quo, qui per fidem à peccati Lepra mundati erant, recipiebantur in Ecclesiam. Est etiam conjectura ducta à ceremoniis Ethnicorum, sed in casu quodam rarissimè contingente. nesse of their nativity, which was [68] a kind of new birth.[ae] This ceremony [69]of the Greeks, in the time that Judaea was[69] under the Dominion of Alexander, and °the Greeks° his successors,[af] °may probably enough have crept into the Religion of the Jews.° But seeing it is not likely our Saviour would [70]countenance[70] a Heathen rite, it [71]is most likely it proceeded from the Legall Ceremony of Washing after Leprosie.[71] And for the other Sacrament, [266] of eating the Paschall Lambe, it is manifestly imitated in the Sacrament of the Lords Supper; in which the Breaking of the [72] Bread, and the pouring out of the Wine, do keep in memory our deliverance from the [73]Misery of Sin, by Christs Passion,[73] as the eating of the Paschall Lambe, kept in memory the deliverance of the [74]Jewes[74] out of the Bondage of Egypt.[ag] Seeing therefore the authority of Moses was but subordinate, and hee but a Lieutenant to God; it followeth, that Christ, whose authority, as man, was to bee like that of Moses, was [75]no more but subordinate to the authority of[75] his Father. The same is °more expressely° signified, by that that hee teacheth us to pray, Our Father, Let thy Kingdome come; and, For thine is the Kingdome, the Power, and the Glory;[ah] and by that it is said, that Hee shall come in the Glory of his Father;[ai] and by that which St. Paul saith, (1 Cor. 15. 24.) then commeth the end, when hee shall have delivered up the Kingdome to God, even the Father; and by many other °most expresse° places.

One and the same God is the Person represented by Moses, and by Christ.

°Our Saviour therefore, both in Teaching, and Reigning, representeth (as Moses did) the Person of God; which God from that time forward, but not before, is called the Father; and being still one and the same substance, is one Person as represented by Moses, and another Person as represented by his Sonne the Christ. For Person being a relative to a Representer, it is consequent to plurality of Representers, that there bee a plurality of Persons, though of one and the same Substance.°

CHAP. XLII.

Of POWER ECCLESIASTICALL.

For the understanding of POWER ECCLESIASTICALL, what, and in whom it is, we are to distinguish the time from the Ascension of our Saviour, into two parts; one before [1]the Conversion of Kings, and men endued with Soveraign Civill Power; the other after their Conversion. For it was long after the Ascension, before any King, or Civill Soveraign[1] embraced, and publiquely allowed the teaching of Christian Religion.[a]

Of the Holy Spirit that fel on the Apostles.

And for the [2]time between,[2] it is manifest, that [3] the Power Ecclesiasticall, was in the Apostles; and after them in such as were by them ordained [4]to Preach[4] the Gospell, °and° to convert men to Christianity, and to [5]direct[5] them that were converted in the way of Salvation; and after these the Power was delivered again to others by these ordained, and this was done by Imposition of hands °upon such as were ordained;° by which was signified [6]the giving of the Holy Spirit, or Spirit of God, to those whom they ordained Ministers of God, to advance his[6] Kingdome. So that Imposition of hands, was nothing else but the Seal of [7]their Commission[7] to Preach Christ, and teach his Doctrine; and [8]the giving of the Holy Ghost by that ceremony of Imposition of hands, was an imitation of that which Moses did. For Moses used the same ceremony to his Minister Joshua,[8] as wee read Deuteronomy 34. ver. 9. And Ioshua the Son of Nun was full of the Spirit of Wisdome; for Moses had laid his hands upon him. Our Saviour therefore between his Resurrection, and Ascension, gave his Spirit to the Apostles; first, by Breathing on them, and saying, °(Iohn 20. 22.)° Receive yee the Holy Spirit; and after his Ascension °(Acts 2. 2, 3.)° by sending down upon them, a mighty wind, and Cloven tongues [9]of[9] fire; and not by Imposition of hands; as neither did God lay his hands on Moses: and his Apostles afterward, transmitted the same Spirit by Imposition

CAPVT XLII.

De Potestate Ecclesiastica.

Vt intelligatur Potestas Ecclesiastica, quid sit, & quorum hominum, tempora nobis distinguenda sunt ab Ascensione Christi, in partes duas; alteram antè, alteram pòst, quam Reges ulli, vel Coetus Summa Potestate praediti, Christi fidem amplexi essent. Spatium enim erat plùs, quam trecentorum annorum, à Christi assumptione, ad Regem, qui primus Christianam fidem amplexus, & publice doceri passus est.

De priori tempore in confesso est, Potestatem Ecclesiasticam totam fuisse in Apostolis; & ab his transiisse ad eos qui ab Apostolis, ad homines ad Christi fidem perducendos, perductosque in via Salutis retinendos Ministri Euangelii constituti fuerant. Quibus successere alii ab his itidem instituti, per manuum impositionem; quo ritu significare voluerunt Spiritus Sancti donum, in Ministros illos, ad Regnum Coeleste promovendum, collatum esse. Manuum autem Impositio, nil aliud erat, praeter commissae illis Potestatis praedicandi Christum, doctrinamque ejus docendi Sigillum; & imitatio quaedam Mosis. Hic enim Impositione manuum usus est; cum Ministrum suum Ioshuam Ducem exercituum Dei constitueret, ut legere est Deut. 34. 9. Ac Ioshua Filius Nun plenus erat Spiritus Sapientiae; nam Moses manus super illum [232] imposuerat. Servator autem noster inter resurrectionem suam, & assumptionem, Spiritum suum contulit in Apostolos, primùm spirando in eos, dicendoque Accipite Spiritum Sanctum; & postea, cum jam assumptus esset in Coelum, immittendo in illos Flatum violentem, & dispertitas linguas instar ignis: sed manus illis non imposuit, sicut nec Mosi Deus. Dum ergo nulla of hands, as Moses did to Joshua. So that it is manifest [10]hereby, in whom the Power Ecclesiasticall continually remained, in those first times, where [10] there was not any Christian Common-wealth; namely, [11]in them [11] that received the same from the Apostles, by successive laying on of hands. [12]

Of the Trinity.

[c]Here wee have the Person of God born now the third time. For as Moses, and the High Priests, were Gods Representative in the Old Testament; and our Saviour himselfe as Man, during his abode on earth: So the Holy Ghost, that is to say, the Apostles, and their successors, in the Office of Preaching, and Teaching, [268] that had received the Holy Spirit, have Represented him ever since. But a Person, (as I have shewn before, chapt. 13.)[b] is he that is Represented, as often as hee is Represented; and therefore God, who has been Represented (that is, Personated) thrice, may properly enough be said to be three Persons; though neither the word Person, nor Trinity be ascribed to him in the Bible. St. Iohn indeed (1 Epist. 5. 7.) saith, There be three that bear witnesse in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit; and these Three are One: But this disagreeth not, but accordeth fitly with three Persons in the proper signification of Persons; which is, that which is Represented by another. For so God the Father, as Represented by Moses, is one Person; and as Represented by his Sonne, another Person; and as Represented by the Apostles, and by the Doctors that taught by authority from them derived, is a third Person; and yet every Person here, is the Person of one and the same God. But a man may here ask, what it was whereof these three bare witnesse. St. Iohn therefore tells us (verse 11.) that they bear witnesse, that God hath given us eternall life in his Son. Again, if it should bee asked, wherein that testimony appeareth, the Answer is easie; for he hath testified the same by the miracles he wrought, first by Moses; secondly, by his Son himself; and lastly by his Apostles, that had received the Holy Spirit; all which in their times Represented the Person of God; and either prophecyed, or preached Jesus Christ. And as for the Apostles, it was the character of the Apostleship, in the twelve first and great Apostles, to bear Witnesse of his Resurrection; as appeareth expressely (Acts 1. ver. 21, 22.) where St. Peter, when a new Apostle was to be chosen in the place of Judas Iscariot, useth these words, Of these men which have companied with us all the time that the Lord Iesus went in and out amongst us, beginning at the Baptisme of Iohn, unto that same day that hee was taken up from us, must one bee ordained to be a Witnesse with us of his Resurrection: which words interpret the bearing of Witnesse, mentioned by St. John. There is in the same place mentioned another Trinity of Witnesses in Earth. For (ver. 8.)[c] he saith, there are three that [12] ^And so that these men should be suitable for having so much power, the Holy Spirit (which is also called the 'Paraclete') was at the same time conferred on them.

bear Witnesse in Earth, the Spirit, and the Water, and the Bloud; and these three agree in one: that is to say, the graces of Gods Spirit, and the two Sacraments, Baptisme, and the Lords Supper, which all agree in one Testimony, to assure the consciences of beleevers, of eternal life; of which Testimony he saith (verse 10.) He that beleeveth on the Son of God hath the Witnesse in himself. In this Trinity on Earth, the Unity is not of the thing; for the Spirit, the Water, and the Bloud, are not the same substance, though they give the same testimony: But in the Trinity of Heaven, the Persons are the persons of one and the same God, though Represented in three different times and occasions. To conclude, the doctrine of the Trinity, as far as can be gathered directly from the Scripture, is in substance this; that God who is alwaies One and the same, was the Person Represented [269] by Moses; the Person Represented by his Son Incarnate; and the Person Represented by the Apostles. As Represented by the Apostles, the Holy Spirit by which they spake, is God; As Represented by his Son (that was God and Man), the Son is that God; As represented by Moses, and the High Priests, the Father, that is to say, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is that God: From whence we may gather the reason why those names Father, Son, and Holy Spirit in the signification of the Godhead, are never used in the Old Testament: For they are Persons, that is, they have their names from Representing; which could not be, till divers men had Represented Gods Person in ruling, or in directing under him.°

°Thus wee see how the Power Ecclesiasticall was left by our Saviour to the Apostles; and how they were (to the end they might the better exercise that Power,) endued with the Holy Spirit, which is therefore called sometime in the New Testament Paracletus which signifieth an Assister, or one called to for helpe, though it bee commonly translated a Comforter.[d] Let us now consider the Power it selfe, what it was, and over whom.°

The Power Ecclesiasticall is but the power to teach.

Cardinall Bellarmine in his third generall Controversie, hath handled a great many questions concerning the Ecclesiasticall Power of the Pope of Rome; and begins with this, Whether it [13]ought to be[13] Monarchicall, Aristocraticall, or Democraticall.[e] All which sorts of Power, are Soveraign, and [14]Coercive.[14] If now it should appear, that there is no Coercive Power left Cardinalis Bellarminus, in controversia sua generali tertia, quaestiones multas tractat circa Potestatem Ecclesiasticam Pontificis Romani. Quarum prima est, an Potestas illa Monarchica sit, an Aristocratica, an Democratica:[e] quae Potestatum species, singulae summae sunt, continentque Potestatem Coërcivam. [d] (This sentence has its approximate equivalent in the Latin, which, because of the intervening omission, was given above, in n. 12.) John 14: 16 and 15: 26 refer to the coming of the Paraclete or παράκλητος, meaning 'helper' (originally: 'one called to help'), and translated 'Comforter' in the Geneva and Bishops' Bibles, and in AV.

[e] Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 3, 'De summo pontifice', bk. 1, ch. 5: i, pp. 623–4. Roberto Bellarmino (1542–1621) was a leading Jesuit theologian; this work (based on courses he had given at the Collegio Romano in the 1570s and 1580s) became the standard handbook of anti-Protestant argument in the Roman Catholic Church. He was made a cardinal in 1599.

them by our Saviour; but onely a Power to proclaim the [15]Kingdom[15] of Christ, and to perswade men to submit themselves [16]thereunto;[16] and by precepts and good counsell, to teach them that have submitted, what they are to do, that they may be received into the Kingdom of God when it comes; and that the Apostles, and other Ministers of the Gospel[17], are our Schoolemasters, and not our Commanders, and their Precepts not Laws, but [18]wholesome[18] Counsells; then were all that dispute [19] in vain.

An argument thereof, from the Power of Christ himself:

I have shewn already (in the last Chapter,) that the Kingdome of Christ is not of this world: therefore neither can his Ministers (unlesse they be Kings,) [20] require obedience in his name. For if [21]the Supreme King, have not his Regall Power in this world; by what authority can obedience be required to his Officers?[21] As my Father sent me, so (saith our Saviour) I send you.[f] But our Saviour was sent to [22]perswade the Jews to return to, and to invite the Gentiles, to receive the Kingdome of his Father,[22] and not to reign in Majesty, °no not, as his Fathers Lieutenant,° till the day of Judgment.

From the name of Regeneration:

The time between the Ascension[23], and the generall Resurrection, is called, not a Reigning, but a Regeneration; that is, a Preparation [24] of men for the second and glorious coming of Christ, at the day of Judgment; as appeareth by the words of our Saviour, Mat. 19. 28. You that have followed me in the Regeneration, when the [270] Son of man shall sit in the throne °of his glory,° you shall also sit upon twelve Thrones; And of St. Paul (Ephes. 6. 15.) [25] Having your feet shod with the Preparation of the Gospell °of Peace.°

From the comparison of it, with Fishing, Leaven, Seed.

And is compared by [26]our Saviour,[26] to Fishing; that is, to winning men to obedience, not by Coercion, and Punishing; but by Perswasion: °and therefore he said not to his Apostles, hee would make them so many Nimrods, Hunters of men; but Fishers of men.[g] It is compared also to Leaven; to Sowing of Seed, and to the Multiplication of a grain of Mustard-seed;[h] by all which Compulsion is excluded; and consequently there can in that time be no actual Reigning.° The work of Christs Ministers, is Evangelization; that is, a Proclamation of Christ, and a preparation [27] for his second comming; [28] the Evangelization of John Baptist, was a preparation to his first coming.

relictam esse nullam, sed Potestatem tantum praedicandi Christum Regem; persuadendique ut Regno ejus homines submittere se vellent; praeceptisque & Consilio recto, docendi eos, qui submitterent quid facerent, ut in Regnum Dei futurum reciperentur; Et Apostolos aliosque ab illis Euangelii Ministros Imperatores nobis non esse, nec eorum Praecepta Leges esse; sed Ludimagistros illos esse quorum Praecepta Monita tantùm sunt; haec Bellarmini disputatio tota periit.

Ostensum autem est Capite proximè superiore, Regnum Christi non esse ex hoc mundo; neque ergo Ministri ejus (nisi Reges sint) obedientiam praestari sibi in nomine ejus postulare jure possunt. Nam si, is, cujus jure postulant jus Regium, in hoc mundo Regnum non habuit, quo jure imperium habebunt Ministri ejus? Sicut Pater (dicit Christus) misit me, ita ego mitto vos. Sed Christus missus est ad Iudaeos revocandos ad Regnum Dei, & vocandas Gentes; non autem ut regnaret in Majestate, ante diem Iudicii.

Tempus autem inter Assumptionem Christi & Resurrectionem universalem, nusquam vocatur Regnum, sed Regeneratio, id est Praeparatio & Aptatio hominum ad adventum Christi secundum, cum gloria; nempe ad diem Iudicii, ut apparet ex verbis Christi Matth. 19. 28. Vos qui sequuti me estis in Regeneratione, Cum sederit filius hominis in throno, vos quoque sedebitis super duodecim thronos. Et ex verbis Sancti Pauli, State ergo succincti lumbos vestros in veritate, & induti loricam Iustitiae, & calceati pedes in Praeparationem Euangelii.

Etiam officium Ministrorum Piscationi, id est hominum ad obedientiam, [233] non per coactionem & poenas, sed per consilium conductioni, non venationi comparat. Ministrorum Christi opus Euangelizatio est, id est, praedicatio Christi, hominumque ad secundum ejus adventum praeparatio; sicut Euangelizatio Iohannis Baptistae erat Praeparatio hominum ad adventum ejus primum.

From the nature of Faith:

Again, the Office of Christs Ministers in this world, [29]is to make men Beleeve, and have Faith in Christ: But Faith hath no relation to, nor dependence at all upon Compulsion, or Commandement; but onely upon certainty, or probability of[29] Arguments drawn from Reason, or from something men beleeve already. Therefore the Ministers of Christ in this world, have no Power by that title, to Punish any man for not Beleeving, or for Contradicting what they say; they have I say no [30] Power by that title of Christs Ministers, to Punish such: but if they [31] have Soveraign Civill Power, °by politick institution,° then they may indeed lawfully Punish any Contradiction to their [32]laws whatsoever:[32] And St. Paul, of himselfe and others the then Preachers of the Gospell, saith °in expresse words,° Wee have no Dominion over your Faith, but are Helpers of your Ioy.

2 Cor. 1. 24.

From the Authority Christ hath left to Civill Princes.

Another Argument, that the Ministers of Christ in this present world have no right of Commanding, may be drawn from the lawfull Authority which Christ hath left to all Princes, as well Christians, as Infidels. St. Paul saith (Col. 3. 20.) Children obey your Parents in all things; for this is well pleasing to the Lord. And ver. 22. Servants obey °in all things° your Masters according to the flesh, not with eye-service, as men-pleasers, but in [33]singlenesse[33] of heart, as fearing the Lord: This is spoken to them whose Masters were Infidells; and yet they are bidden to obey them in all things. And again, concerning obedience [34] to Princes, (Rom. 13. [35]the first 6. verses) exhorting to be subject to the Higher Powers, he saith, that all Power is ordained of God; and that we ought to[35] be subject to them, not onely for °fear of incurring their° wrath, but also for conscience sake.] And St. Peter, (1 Epist. chap. 2. ver. 13, 14, 15.) Submit your selves to every Ordinance of Man, for the Lords sake, whether it bee to the King, as Supreme, or unto Governours, as to them that be sent by him for the punishment of evill doers, and for the praise of them that doe well; for so is the will of God. And again St. Paul (Tit. 3. 1.) Put men in mind to be subject to Principalities, and Powers, and to obey [36]Magistrates.[36] These Princes, and Powers, whereof St. Peter, and St. Paul here speak, were all Infidels: [37]much [271] more therefore we are to obey those Christians, whom God hath ordained to have Soveraign Power over us. How then can wee be[37] obliged to obey any Minister of Christ, if he should command [38] us to doe any thing contrary to the Command of the King, or other Soveraign [39]Representant of the Common-wealth, whereof we are members, and by whom we look to be protected?[39] It is therefore manifest, that Christ hath not left to his Ministers in this world, unlesse they be also endued with Civill Authority, any authority to Command [40]other men.[40]

Porrò Ministrorum Christi officium in hoc mundo erat, ut homines credere in Christum persuaderent. Credere autem cogi nemo potest, neque jussu neque vi, sed Ratione tantum, argumentisque ductis vel à Ratione vel ab aliqua re, quam jam antè crediderint. Ministri ergo Christi in hoc mundo, eo nomine, quod illorum Doctrinae non sit creditum, vel quod sit contradictum, Potestatem non habent quemquam puniendi. Eo nomine (inquam) quod Ministri Christi sunt, Potestatem Coërcivam nullam habent. Veruntamen si quis Potestatem Civilem summam habeat, sitque idem Minister Christi, punire illos, qui Doctrinae suae Legibus explicatae contradicunt, jure ille poterit. Etiam Sanctus Paulus de seipso caeterisque sui temporis Praedicatoribus (2 Cor. 1. 24.) Non habemus (inquit) dominium in fidem vestram, sed gaudii vestri adjutores sumus.

Quod Ministri Christi in hoc mundo jus imperandi non habeant, deduci potest argumentum etiam ab Authoritate legitimâ, quam reliquit Christus Principibus omnibus, tum Christianis, tum Ethnicis. Collos. 3. 20. dicit Sanctus Paulus: Filii, obedite parentibus per omnia, hoc enim placitum est Domino: & vers. 22, Servi, obedite Dominis carnalibus, non ad oculum servientes, quasi hominibus placentes, sed in simplicitate cordis timentes Deum. Dicta autem haec sunt ad eos, quorum Domini erant Ethnici; jubentur tamen obedire in omnibus. Rursùs de obedientia Principibus debita dicit Rom. 13. 6.[i] Dei enim Minister est Princeps, vindex in iram ei, qui malum agit. Ideoque necessitate subditi estote; non solùm propter iram, sed etiam propter Conscientiam. Et Sanctus Petrus Epist. 1, cap. 2, vers. 13, 14, 15. Subjecti estote omni humanae constitutioni propter Deum, sive Regi, quasi praecellenti, sive Ducibus tanquam ab eo missis ad vindictam malefactorum, laudem vero bonorum, quia sic est voluntas Dei, &c. Tit. 3. 1. Admone illos Principibus & Potestatibus subditos esse, & dicto obedire. Principes autem & Potestates, de quibus Petrus & Paulus hic loquuntur, omnes erant Ethnici. Quanto ergo magis Christiani Principibus suis Christianis obedire debent? Quo jure Ministro Christi si quid facere contra mandata Regis aliusve summae Potestatis juberet vel doceret, illi obedire obligamur? Perspicuum ergo est, Christum Ministris suis, in hoc mundo, nisi etiam Authoritate Civili praediti sint, jus Civibus imperandi nullum concessisse. [234]

[29] was to persuade men to believe in Christ. People can be compelled to believe neither by force nor by a command, but only by reason, and by [30] ^ coercive [31] ^ are ministers of Christ and also [32] doctrine as set out in laws. Wherefore ye must needs* [Vulg; AV] [36] what is commanded. [Vulg] [37] how much more, therefore, should Christians obey their Christian princes? By what right are we [38] ^ or teach [39] power? [40] citizens.

What Christians may do to avoid persecution.

But what (may some object) if a King, or a Senate, or other Soveraign [41]Person[41] forbid us to beleeve in Christ? To this I answer, that such forbidding is of no effect; because Beleef, and Unbeleef never follow mens Commands[42]. Faith is a gift of God, which Man can neither give, nor take away by promise of rewards, or menaces of [43]torture.[43] And if it be further asked, What if wee bee commanded by our lawfull Prince, to say °with our tongue,° wee beleeve not; must we obey such command? [44]Profession with the tongue[44] is but an externall thing, and [45]no more then any other gesture whereby we signifie our obedience; and wherein[45] a Christian, holding °firmely° in his heart the Faith of Christ, hath the same liberty which the Prophet Elisha allowed to Naaman the Syrian. Naaman was converted in his heart to the God of Israel; For hee saith (2 Kings 5. 17.)[k] Thy servant will henceforth offer neither burnt offering, nor sacrifice unto other Gods but unto the Lord. In this thing [46]the Lord pardon[46] thy servant, that when my Master goeth into the house of Rimmon to worship there, and he leaneth on my hand; [47]and I bow my selfe in the house of Rimmon; when I bow my selfe in the house of Rimmon,[47] the Lord pardon thy servant in this thing. This the Prophet approved, and bid him Goe in peace. Here Naaman beleeved in [48] his heart; but by [49]bowing before the Idol Rimmon, he denyed the true God in effect, as much as if he had done it with his lips.[49] But then what shall we answer to our Saviours saying, Whosoever denyeth me before men, I will deny him before my Father which is in Heaven?[l] This we may say, that whatsoever a Subject, as Naaman was, is compelled to [50]in obedience to his Soveraign,[50] and doth it not in order to[m] his own mind, but in order to [51] the laws of his country, that action is not his, [52]but his Soveraigns; nor is it he that in this case denyeth Christ before men, but his Governour, and the law of his countrey.[52] If any man shall accuse this doctrine, as repugnant to true,

Of Martyrs. But what then shall we say of all those Martyrs we read of in the [60]History of the Church,[60] that they have needlessely cast away their lives? The former sort, if they have been put to death, for bearing witnesse to this point, that Jesus Christ is risen from the dead, were true Martyrs; For a Martyr [63] is, (to give the true definition of the word) a Witnesse of the Resurrection of Jesus the Messiah; which none can be but those that conversed[s] with him on earth, [64]and[64] saw him after he was risen: For a Witnesse must have seen what he testifieth, or else his testimony is not good. And that none but such, can properly be called Martyrs of Christ, is manifest out of the words of St. Peter, Act. 1. 21, 22. Wherefore of these men which have companyed with us all the time that the Lord Iesus went in and out amongst us, beginning from the Baptisme of Iohn unto that same day hee was taken up from us, must one be [65]ordained to be a Martyr (that is a Witnesse)[65] with us of his Resurrection: Where [66]we may observe,[66] that he

Either a word such as 'debitam' ('due to') – supplied here – has gone missing; or 'Principibus suis' ('to their princes') and 'Regibus suis legitimis' ('to their lawful kings') are duplicates, one of which should be omitted (thereby yielding the translation 'the liberty to deny their princes obedience' or 'the liberty to deny their lawful kings obedience'). which is to bee a Witnesse of the °truth of the° Resurrection of Christ, [67]that is to say, of the truth of this fundamentall article of Christian Religion, that Jesus was the Christ, must be some Disciple that conversed with him, and saw him before, and after his Resurrection; and consequently must be one of his originall Disciples:[67] whereas they which were not so, can Witnesse no more, but that their antecessors said it, °and are therefore but Witnesses of other mens testimony;° and are but second Martyrs, or Martyrs of [68]Christs Witnesses.[68]

He, that to maintain every doctrine which he himself draweth out of the History of our Saviours life, and of the Acts, or Epistles of the Apostles; or [69]which he beleeveth upon the authority of a private man, wil oppose the Laws and Authority of the Civill State, is very far from[69] being a Martyr of Christ, or a Martyr of his Martyrs. 'Tis one Article onely, which to die for, meriteth so honorable a name; and that Article is this, that Iesus is the Christ; that is to say, He that [70] hath redeemed us, and shall come again to give us [71]salvation, and eternall life in his glorious[71] Kingdome. To die for every tenet that serveth the ambition, or profit of the Clergy, is not required; nor is it the Death °of the Witnesse,° but the Testimony it self that makes the Martyr[72]: for the word signifieth nothing [73]else, but the man that beareth Witnesse, whether he be put to death for his testimony, or not.[73]

Also he that is not sent to preach this fundamentall article, but [273] taketh it upon him of his [74]private authority,[74] though he be a Witnesse, °and consequently a Martyr,° either primary of Christ, or °secundary° of his Apostles, Disciples, or their Successors; yet is he not obliged to suffer death for that cause; because [75]being not called thereto, tis not required at his hands; nor ought hee to[75] complain, if he loseth the reward he expecteth °from those that never set him on work.° None therefore can be a Martyr, neither of the first, nor second degree, that have not a [76]warrant to preach Christ come in the flesh; that is to say, none, but such as[76] are sent to the conversion of Infidels. For [77]no man is a Witnesse to him that already beleeveth, and therefore needs no Witnesse; but[77] to them that deny, or doubt, or have not heard it. Christ sent his Apostles, and his [78]Seventy Disciples, with authority to preach; he sent not all that beleeved: And he sent them[78] to unbeleevers; I send you (saith he) as sheep [79]amongst[79] wolves;[u] not °as sheep° to other sheep.

Argument from the points of their Commission, To Preach;

[80]Lastly, the points of their Commission, as they are expressely[80] set down in the Gospel, contain none of them any [81]authority over the Congregation.[81]

We have first (Mat. 10.) that the °twelve° Apostles were sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and [82]commanded to Preach,[82] that the Kingdome of God was at hand.[v] Now Preaching [83]in the originall, is that act, which a Crier, Herald, or other Officer useth to doe publiquely[83] in Proclaiming of a King.[w] But a Crier hath not right to Command any man. And (Luke 10. 2.) the seventy Disciples are sent out, as Labourers, not as Lords [84]of[84] the Harvest; and are bidden (verse 9.) to say, The Kingdome of God is come nigh °unto you; and by Kingdom here is meant, not the Kingdome of Grace, but the Kingdome of Glory; for they are bidden to denounce[x] it (ver. 11.)[y] to those Cities which shall not receive them, as a threatning, that it shall be more tolerable in that day for Sodome, than for such a City.° And (Mat. 20. 28.)[z] our Saviour telleth his Disciples, that [85]sought[85] Priority of place, their Office was to minister, even as [86]the Son of man[86] came, not to be ministred unto, but to minister. Preachers therefore have not Magisteriall, but Ministeriall power: Bee not called Masters, (saith our Saviour, Mat. 23. 10.) for one is your Master, °even Christ.°

And Teach;

Another point of their Commission, is, to Teach all nations; °as it is in Mat. 28. 19. or as in St. Mark 16. 15. Goe into all the world, and Preach the Gospel to every creature.° Teaching therefore, and Preaching [87]is the same thing.[87] For they that [88] Proclaim the comming of a King, [89]must withall make known by what right he commeth, if they mean men shall submit themselves unto him:[89] As St. Paul did to the Jews of Thessalonica, when three Sabbath dayes he reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, [90]opening,[aa] and alledging[ab] that Christ must needs have suffered,[90] and risen again from the dead, and that this Iesus is Christ.[ac] But to teach out of the Old Testament that Jesus was Christ, °(that is to say, King,)° and risen from the dead, is not to say, that men are bound after they beleeve it, to obey those that tell them so, against the laws, [91]and commands of their Soveraigns; but that they shall doe [274] wisely, to expect the coming of Christ hereafter, in Patience, and Faith, with Obedience to their present Magistrates.[91]

Videamus jam Ministrorum Christi Mandata, ut reperiuntur in Euangelio, an jus aliquod contineant in populum Imperandi.

Legimus primo (Matth. 10.) missos esse Apostolos ad Oves quae perierunt domus Israel; quid autem praedicaturos? Regnum Dei appropinquat.[v] Praedicare autem actus Preconis est, Regem aliquem proclamantis.[w] Neque jus Imperandi in quemquam habet Praeco. Et (Luc. 10, 2.) Septuaginta Discipuli, ut Operarii, non ut Domini ad messem emissi sunt, & jussi praedicare appropinquat Regnum Dei, & (Matth. 20. 28.)[z] Discipulos suos, qui inter se de dignitate contendebant, admonet Servator noster, officium eorum Ministeriale esse, sicut ipse venit, non ut sibi Ministraretur, sed ut Ministraret. Itaque Praedicatores Euangelii potestatem Magisterialem non habent, sed Ministerialem tantùm. Et (Matth. 23. 10.) Ne vocamini, dicit Christus, Magistri, unicus enim vobis est Magister.

Secundò, in Mandatis eorum est, docere omnes Nationes. Docere autem & Praedicare conjuncta sunt. Nam qui Regem praedicant sive proclamant, eodem tempore docent, quo jure Regnum habet. Vt S. Paulus fecit apud Iudaeos, qui erant in Thessalonica, nempe tribus Sabbatis, cum illis ex Scripturis disseruit explicans illas, & probans ex illis Christum mori oportuisse, & resurrexisse, & Iesum esse Christum.[ac] Sed docere ex veteri Testamento Iesum esse Christum, & à mortuis resuscitatum, non est docere illos, qui crederent, docentibus sibi obediendum esse, contra Civitatis suae Leges, & Mandata Regum, sed admonere eos, ut adventum Christi, cum Patientia & Fide & cum obedientia Legibus Civitatis debita, vellent expectare.

To Baptize;

[92]Another[92] point of their Commission[93], is to Baptize, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.[ad] What is Baptisme? Dipping into water. But what is it to Dip a man into the water in the name of any thing? The meaning of these words [94]of Baptisme is this. He that is Baptized, is Dipped or Washed, as a sign of becomming a new man, and a loyall subject to that God, whose Person was represented in old time by Moses, and the High Priests, when he reigned over the Jews; and to Jesus Christ, his Sonne, God, and Man, that hath redeemed us, and shall in his humane nature Represent his Fathers Person in his eternall Kingdome after the Resurrection; and to acknowledge the Doctrine of the Apostles, who assisted by the Spirit of the Father, and of the Son, were left for guides to bring us into that Kingdome, to be the onely, and assured way thereunto. This, being our promise in Baptisme; and[94] the Authority of Earthly Soveraigns being not to be put down till the day of Judgment; (for that is expressely affirmed by S. Paul 1 Cor. 15. 22, 23, 24, where he saith, As in Adam all die, so in Christ all shall be made alive. But every man in his owne order, Christ the first fruits, afterward they that are Christs, [95]at[95] his comming; Then commeth the end, when he shall have delivered up the Kingdom to God, even the Father, when he shall have [96]put down[96] all Rule, and all °Authority and° Power) it is manifest, that we do not in Baptisme constitute over us another authority, by which our externall actions are to bee governed in this life; but promise to take the doctrine of the Apostles for our direction in the way to life eternall.

And to Forgive, and Retain Sinnes.

[97]The[97] Power of Remission, and Retention of Sinnes, called also the Power of Loosing, and Binding,[af] and sometimes the Keyes of the Kingdome of Heaven,[ag] [98]is a consequence of[98] the Authority to Baptize, °or refuse to Baptize.° For Baptisme is the Sacrament of Allegeance, of them that are to be received into the Kingdome of God; °that is to say, into Eternall life; that is to say, to Remission of Sin:° For as Eternall life was lost by the Committing, so it is recovered by the Remitting of mens Sins. The end of Baptisme is Remission of Sins: and therefore St. Peter, when they that were converted by [99]his Sermon[99] on the day of Pentecost, asked what they were to doe[100], advised them to repent, and be Baptized in the name of Iesus, for the Remission of Sins.[ah] And therefore seeing to Baptize is to declare the Reception of Mandatum illis datum est à Christo tertium, Baptizare in nomine Patris, & Filii, & Spiritus Sancti.[ad] Quid autem est Baptizari? In aquam immergi. Sed in aquam in nomine aliquo immergi, quid est? Sensus verborum horum est, immergi fideles, ut signum Regenerationis; & quod qui sic immerguntur fideles se in Civitate Dei Cives [237] futuros esse promittunt,[ae] nempe in Civitate Dei Patris, Ecclesiae fundatoris; Dei Filii ejusdem Ecclesiae Redemptoris; Dei Spiritus, Ecclesiae ejusdem Sanctificatoris. Hoc est Pactum nostrum. Quoniam tamen Regum terrenorum Authoritas ante diem Iudicii deponenda non est (sic enim expressis verbis à S. Paulo affirmatur 1 Cor. 15. 22, 23, 24.) Sicut in Adamo omnes moriuntur, ita & in Christo omnes vivificabuntur. Vnusquisque autem in suo ordine; primitiae Christus, deinde ii, qui sunt Christi, qui in adventum ejus crediderunt. Deinde finis, cum tradiderit Regnum Deo & Patri, cum evacuaverit omnem Principatum & Potestatem. Manifestum est, in Baptismo nostro non constituere nos in nosmetipsos Authoritatem aliam, qua vitae nostrae actiones externae regendae sunt; sed promittimus tantum pro directione nostra in via Salutis aeternae, doctrinam sequi Apostolicam.

Quartò, in Mandatis, Potestatem habent peccata Remittendi & Retinendi, id est Ligandi & Solvendi;[af] quae Potestas dicitur etiam Regni coelestis Claves,[ag] cohaeretque cum Authoritate Baptizandi. Est enim Baptismus Fidelitatis, illis qui in Regnum Dei recipiendi sunt, Sacramentum. Sicut enim vita aeterna per peccati commissionem, amissa erat; ita per peccatorum remissionem recuperanda est. Finis ergo Baptismi est peccatorum Remissio. Itaque S. Petrus, illis qui die Pentecostes ab illo conversi erant, quid facerent ad vitam aeternam adipiscendam quaerentibus respondit, Poenitemini, & Baptizamini in nomine Iesu ad Remissionem peccatorum.[ah] Ex eo, quod Baptizare est de-

92 A third 93 ^ from Christ
94 is that the faithful are dipped as a sign of regeneration, and that those who are so dipped promise that they will be faithful citizens in the commonwealth of God – that is, in the commonwealth of God the Father, the founder of the Church; of God the Son, the redeemer of that Church; and of God the Spirit, the sanctifier of that Church. This is our covenant. However, men into Gods Kingdome; and to refuse to Baptize is to declare their Exclusion; it followeth, that the Power to [101]declare them Cast out, or Retained in it,[101] was given to the same Apostles, and their °Substitutes, and° Successors. And therefore after our Saviour had breathed upon them, saying, (Iohn 20. 22.) Receive the Holy Ghost, hee addeth in the next verse, Whose soever Sins ye Remit, they are Remitted unto them; and whose soever Sins ye Retain, they are Retained. By which words, is not granted an Authority to Forgive, or Retain Sins, simply and absolutely, as God Forgiveth or Retaineth them, who knoweth the [275] [102] Heart of man, and truth of his Penitence °and Conversion;° but conditionally, to the [103] Penitent: And this Forgivenesse, or Absolution, in case the absolved have but a feigned Repentance, is thereby without [104]other act, or[104] sentence of the Absolvent, made void, and hath no effect at all to Salvation, but on the contrary, to the Aggravation of his Sin. Therefore the Apostles, and their Successors, are to follow but the outward marks of Repentance; which appearing, they have no Authority to deny Absolution; and if they appeare not, they [105]have no authority to[105] Absolve. The same also is to be observed in Baptisme: for to a converted Jew, or [106]Gentile, the Apostles had not[106] the Power to deny Baptisme; nor to grant it to the Un-penitent. But seeing no man is able to discern the truth of another mans Repentance, further than by [107] externall marks, °taken from his words, and actions, which are subject to hypocrisie;° another question will arise, Who it is that is constituted Judge of those marks[108]. And this question is decided by our Saviour himself; If thy Brother (saith he) shal trespasse against thee, go and [109]tell him his fault[109] between thee, and him alone; if he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy Brother. But if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one, or two more[110]. And if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it unto the Church; but if he neglect to hear the Church, let him be unto thee as an Heathen man, and a Publican. By which it is manifest, that the Judgment concerning the truth of Repentance, belonged not to any one Man, but to the Church, that is, to the Assembly of the Faithfull, or to them that [111]have authority to bee their Representant.[111] But beclarare receptum esse Baptizatum in Regnum Dei, & Baptismum negare, est declarare è Regno Dei exclusionem, sequitur Potestatem Receptionis & Exclusionis datam esse Apostolis & Successoribus suis. Itaque Servator noster postquam in illos spirâsset, addidit (Ioh. 20, 22.) Accipite Spiritum Sanctum, & versu proximo: Quorumcunque peccata remiseritis, remittuntur illis, & quorumcunque peccata retinueritis, retinentur. Quibus verbis conceditur Authoritas peccata remittendi & retinendi, non simpliciter & absolutè, sicut peccata remittit & retinet, qui cordis humani intima, & poenitentiae sinceritatem videt Deus; sed conditionaliter, nempe si verè poenituerint.

Atque haec Absolutio illis, qui poenitentiam Simulant, sine omni Absolventis sententia, irrita est, neque ad salutem omnino valet, sed contra ad peccati Aggravationem. Apostoli ergo & eorum Successores poenitentiae notas exteriores tantum sequi debebant; & illis apparentibus, Potestatem non Absolvendi nullam habuerunt; non apparentibus absolvere non potuerunt. Idem etiam dicendum est de Baptismo: [238] Nam Iudaeo aut Graeco ad Fidem converso Baptismum negandi, Potestatem, ne Apostoli quidem habuerunt, nec poenitentem non Baptizandi. Quoniam autem poenitentia alterius, an sincera sit necne, homo nemo scire potest, nisi per conjecturam ex notis externis, altera orietur quaestio, notarum externarum poenitentiae quis Iudex constitutus est. Quaestionem autem hanc determinat Christus ipse dicens (Matth. 18, 15, 16, 17,) Si autem peccaverit in te frater tuus, vade, & corripe eum inter te, & ipsum solum: si te audierit, lucratus eris fratrem tuum; si autem te non audierit, adhibe tecum adhuc unum vel duos, ut in ore duorum vel trium testium stet omne verbum. Quod si non audierit eos, dic Ecclesiae; si autem Ecclesiam non audierit, sit tibi sicut Ethnicus & Publicanus. Constat hinc, Iudicium circa poenitentiae sinceritatem, non penes unum hominem, sed penes Ecclesiam fuisse, id est, penes Fidelium congregationem, vel penes illos qui congregationis gesserint Personam. sides the Judgment[112], there is necessary also the pronouncing of Sentence: And this belonged alwaies to the Apostle, or some Pastor °of the Church,° as Prolocutor[113];[ai] and of this our Saviour speaketh in the 18 verse, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven. And [114]conformable hereunto was the practise of St. Paul[114] (1 Cor. 5. 3, 4, & 5.) °where he saith,° For I verily, as absent in body, but present in spirit, have determined already, as though I were present, concerning him that hath so done this deed; In the name of our Lord Iesus Christ when ye are gathered together, and my spirit, with the power of our Lord Iesus Christ, To deliver such a one to Satan; that is to say, to cast him out of the Church, as a man whose Sins are not Forgiven. Paul here pronounceth the Sentence; but [115]the Assembly was first to hear the Cause, (for St. Paul was absent;) and by consequence to condemn him.[115] But in the same chapter (ver. 11, 12.) [116]the Judgment in such a case is more expressely attributed to the Assembly:[116] But now I have written unto you, not to keep company, if any man that is called a Brother be a Fornicator, [117]&c.[117] with such a one no not to eat. For what have I to do to judg them that are without? Do not ye judg them that are within? The Sentence [118]therefore by which a man was put out of the Church, was pronounced by the Apostle, or Pastor; but the Judgment concerning the merit of the cause, was in the Church; that is to say, (as the times were[118] before the conversion of Kings, and men that had Soveraign Authority in the Common-wealth,) °the Assembly of the Christians dwelling in the same City; [276] as in Corinth, in the Assembly of the Christians of Corinth.°

etiam Sententiae pronuntiatio necessaria erat; atque haec pronuntiatio Sententiae, Apostoli, vel Pastoris alicujus erat, ut congregationis Prolocutoris; & de illis dici intelligitur à Christo vers. 18, Quodcunque ligaveritis in terra, ligabitur in coelo; & quodcunque solvetis in terra, solvetur in caelo. Et (1 Cor. 5. 3, 4, 5,) dicit Sanctus Paulus, Ego quidem absens corpore, praesens autem spiritu, jam judicavi ut praesens, eum qui sic operatus est in nomine Domini nostri Iesu Christi, congregatis vobis & meo spiritu, cum virtute Domini Iesu, tradere hujusmodi hominem Satanae. Tradere Satanae, idem est, quod ex Ecclesia ejicere hominem cujus non essent peccata remissa. Sententiam ergo pronuntiavit Paulus, sed postquam causam cognovisset congregatio. Eodem Capite (vers. 11, 12)[aj] Scripsi vobis in Epistola, Ne commisceamini fornicariis: non utique fornicariis hujus mundi, aut avaris, aut rapacibus, aut idolis servientibus: alioquin debueratis de hoc mundo exisse. Sed scripsi vobis non commisceri, si is, qui frater nominatur inter vos est fornicator, aut avarus, aut idolis serviens, aut maledicus, aut ebriosus, aut rapax, cum ejusmodi nec cibum sumere. Quid enim mihi de iis qui foris sunt judicare? Nonne de iis, qui intus sunt vos judicatis? Videmus hic Sententiam quidem à Paulo pronuntiatam; judicasse autem congregationem. Atque ita quidem res se habuit ante conversionem Regum, & eorum, qui summam habuere in Civitatibus suis Potestatem.

Pars haec Potestatis Ecclesiasticae Excommunicatio dicitur & ἀποσυνάγωγον ποιεῖν;[ak] & ritus erat etiam à Iudaeis usitatus; sed ut videtur, post captivitatem Babylonicam; nam non legimus quenquam ante id tempus doctrinae causa ejectum esse è Synagoga, neque etiam in [239] Testamento Novo, sed tantummodo pro malis moribus, in Scandalum Ecclesiae.

The use of Excommunication without Civill Power,

The Use and Effect of Excommunication, whilest it was not yet strengthened with the Civill Power, was no more, than that they, who were not Excommunicate, were to avoid the company of them that were. It was not enough to repute them as Heathen, that never had been Christians; for with such they might eate, °and drink;° which with Excommunicate persons they might not do; as [121]appeareth by the words of St. Paul,[121] (1 Cor. 5. ver. 9, 10, &c.) °where he telleth them, he had formerly forbidden them to company with Fornicators; but (because that could not bee without going out of the world,) he restrained it to such Fornicators, and otherwise vicious persons, as were of the brethren; with such a one (he saith) they ought not to keep company, no not to eat. And this is no more than our Saviour saith (Mat. 18. 17.) Let him be to thee as a Heathen, and as a Publican. For Publicans (which signifieth Farmers,[am] and Receivers of the revenue of the Common-wealth) were so hated, and detested by the Jews that were to pay it, as that Publican and Sinner were taken amongst them for the same thing: Insomuch, as when our Saviour accepted the invitation of Zacchaeus a Publican; though it were to Convert him, yet it was objected to him as a Crime.[an] And therefore, when our Saviour, to Heathen, added Publican, he did forbid them to eat with a man Excommunicate.°

As for keeping them out of their Synagogues, or places of Assembly, they had no [122]Power to do it, but that of [122] the owner of the place, whether he were Christian, or Heathen. And because [123]all places are by right, in the Dominion[123] of the Common-wealth; as well hee that was Excommunicated, as hee that never was Baptized, might enter into [124]them by Commission from the Civill Magistrate;[124] as Paul before his conversion entred into [125]their Synagogues[125] at Damascus, to apprehend [126]Christians, men and women,[126] and to carry them bound to Jerusalem, by Commission from the High Priest.

Of no effect upon an Apostate.

By which it appears, that upon a Christian, that should become an Apostate, in a place where the Civill Power did persecute, or not [127]assist[127] the Church, the effect of Excommunication had [128]nothing in it, neither of dammage in this world, nor of terrour: Not of terrour, because of their unbeleef; nor of dammage,[128] because they returned thereby into the favour of the world; and in the world to come, [129] were to be in no worse estate, then they which never had beleeved. The dammage [130] redounded rather to the Church, [131]by provocation [277] of them they cast out, to a freer execution of their malice.[131]

Excommunicationis Usus & Effectus, antequam a Potestate Civili vim acceperat, alius non erat, quàm ut Excommunicatus à non Excommunicatis fugiendus esset. Ut pro Ethnico haberetur, qui Christianus nunquam fuerat, non suffecit; cum his enim cibum sumere licuit; cum Christiano non licuit, ut paulo ante ostensum est ex 1. Cor. 5. 9, 10, &c.

Ut autem illos ex Coetibus suis, aut Synagogis excluderent, Ius, nisi à Domino loci concessum, sive ille Christianus, sive Ethnicus esset, nullum habuere. Ius autem in Civitatis loca omnia, est illius, qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem; & propterea, non modo illi, qui Excommunicati erant, sed etiam illi, qui nunquam Baptizati erant, in Synagogas (data à Summo Imperante Potestate) intrare potuerunt; sicut Paulus, ante conversionem suam, ingressus est Synagogam Christianorum in Damasco, ut eos comprehenderet, vinctosque ad Ierusalem, jussu Summi Sacerdotis duceret.

Constat ergò Excommunicationem in homines Christianos, qui à Religione Christiana deficerent, in eo loco ubi Potestas Civilis Ecclesiam aut persequebatur, aut non protegebat, nullam vim habuisse, neque ad damnum, neque ad terrorem; quia huic mundo favorabiliores inde futuri essent; neque in mundo futuro, pejore conditione fore expectabant, quam qua usuri erant illi, qui nunquam crediderant. But upon the faithfull only.

Excommunication therefore had its effect onely upon those, that beleeved that Jesus Christ was to come again in Glory, to reign over, and to judge both the quick, and the dead, and should °therefore° refuse entrance into his Kingdom, to those °whose Sins were Retained; that is, to those° that were Excommunicated by the Church. [132] And thence it is that St. Paul calleth Excommunication, a delivery of the Excommunicate person to Satan.[ao] For without[ap] the Kingdom of Christ, all other Kingdomes after Judgment, [133]are comprehended in the Kingdome of Satan. This is it that the faithfull stood in fear of, as long as they stood Excommunicate, that is to say, in an estate wherein their sins were not Forgiven.[133] Whereby wee may understand, that Excommunication in the time that Christian Religion was not [134]authorized[134] by the Civill Power, was used onely for a correction of manners, not of °errours in° opinion: for it is a [135] punishment, whereof none could be sensible but such as beleeved, and expected the coming again of our Saviour [136]to judge the world; and they who so beleeved,[136] needed no other opinion, but onely [137]uprightnesse[137] of life, to be saved.

For what fault lyeth Excommunication.

[138]There lyeth Excommunication[138] for Injustice; as (Mat. 18.)[aq] If thy Brother offend thee, tell it him privately; then with Witnesses; lastly, tell the Church; and then if he obey not, Let him be to thee as an Heathen man, and a Publican. And [139]there lieth Excommunication for a Scandalous Life,[139] as (1 Cor. 5. 11.) If any man that is called a Brother, be a Fornicator, or Covetous, or an Idolater, or a Drunkard, or an Extortioner, with such a one yee are not to eat. But to Excommunicate a man that [140] held this foundation, that Iesus was the Christ, for difference of opinion [141]in other points,[141] by which that Foundation was not destroyed, there appeareth [142] no authority in the Scripture, nor example in the Apostles. There is indeed in St. Paul (Titus 3. 10.) °a text that seemeth to be to the contrary.° A man that is an Haeretique, after the first and second admonition, reject. For an Haeretique, is he, that being a member

Hoc est, quod metuerunt in Excommunicatione Christiani veri. Dixerat enim Sanctus Paulus, hominem Excommunicatum traditum esse Satanae.[ao] Nam extrà Regnum Christi, post diem Iudicii, Regna alia omnia Regnum erunt Satanae. Intelligitur, hinc Excommunicationem, quo tempore Religio Christiana à Potestate Civili nondum protegebatur, in usu fuisse pro Morum tantùm correctione, non Opinionum: genus enim illud punitionis, tale erat, ut sentiri à nemine poterat nisi à Fidelibus, & Servatoris nostri adventum secundum expectantibus. Hi autem cum jam veri Christiani essent, Doctrina nulla ad Salutem, sed sanctitate vitae solâ indigebant.

Excommunicari potuit Christianus illis temporibus, propter Injustitiam; [240] ut (Matth. 18.)[aq] Si frater tuus te laeserit, admone solus illum solum; deinde coram testibus; postremo, dic Ecclesiae; sin Ecclesiam non audierit, sit tibi ut Ethnicus, & Publicanus.

Sed Excommunicandi illum, qui fundamentum hoc Iesum esse Christum firmiter teneret, propter hoc, quod ab Ecclesia in opinione aliqua dissentiret, quae fundamentum illud non destruebat, neque Scripturis, neque ab Apostolorum exemplis, ulla omnino Authoritas derivari potest. of the Church, teacheth neverthelesse some [143]private opinion,[143] which the Church has forbidden: °and such a one, S. Paul adviseth Titus, after the first, and second admonition, to Reject.° But to Reject °(in this place)° is not to Excommunicate the Man; But to give over admonishing him, °to let him alone,° to set by disputing with him, °as one that is to be convinced onely by himselfe.° The same Apostle saith (2 Tim. 2. 23.) Foolish and unlearned questions avoid: [144]The word Avoid in this place, and Reject in the former, is the same in the Originall, παραιτοῦ: but Foolish questions may bee set by[144] without Excommunication. And again, (Tit. 3. 9.) Avoid Foolish questions, [145]where the Originall περιΐστασο, (set them by) is equivalent to the former word Reject.[145] There is no other place that can [146]so much as colourably[ar] be drawn, to countenance the Casting out of the Church[146] faithfull men, such as beleeved the foundation, onely for a singular [147]superstructure[147] of their own, proceeding perhaps from a good & pious [148]conscience. But on the contrary, all such places as command avoiding [278] such disputes, are written for a Lesson to[148] Pastors, (such as Timothy and Titus were) not to make new Articles of Faith, by determining every small controversie, which oblige men to a needlesse burthen of Conscience, or provoke them to [149]break the union[149] of the Church. °Which Lesson the Apostles themselves observed well.° S. Peter, and S. Paul, though their controversie were great, °(as we may read in Gal. 2. 11.)° yet they did not cast one another out of the Church. °Neverthelesse, during the Apostles times, there were other Pastors that observed it not; As Diotrephes (3 Iohn 9. &c.) who cast out of the Church, such as S. John himself thought fit to be received into it, out of a pride he took in Praeeminence; so early it was, that Vain-glory, and Ambition had found entrance into the Church of Christ.°

Of persons liable to Excommunication.

That a man be liable to Excommunication, there be many conditions requisite; as First, that he be a member of some °Commonalty, that is to say, of some° lawfull Assembly, that is to say, of some [150] Christian Church, that hath power to judge of the cause for which hee is to bee Excommunicated. For where there is no Community, there can bee no Excommunication; nor where there is no power to Judge, can there bee any power to give Sentence.

[ar] = with an appearance of truth, plausibly, speciously (OED, 'colourable, colorable', a., 2).

From hence it followeth, that one Church cannot be Excommunicated by another: For either they have equall power to Excommunicate each other, in which case Excommunication is not Discipline, °nor an act of Authority,° but Schisme, °and Dissolution of charity;° or one is so subordinate to the other, as that they °both have but one voice, and then they° be but one Church; and [151]the part Excommunicated, is no more a Church, but a dissolute number of individuall persons.[151]

And because the sentence of Excommunication, importeth[as] an advice, not to keep company, nor °so much as° to eat with him that is Excommunicate, if a Soveraign [152]Prince, or Assembly[152] bee Excommunicate, the sentence is of no effect. For all [153]Subjects are bound to be in the company and presence of[153] their own Soveraign (when he requireth it) by the law of Nature; nor can they lawfully either [154]expell[154] him from any place of his own Dominion, whether profane or holy; nor [155] go out of his Dominion, without his leave; much lesse (if he call them to [156]that[156] honour,) refuse to eat with him. And as to other [157]Princes and States,[157] because they are not parts of [158]one and the same congregation, they need not any other sentence to keep them from keeping company with the State Excommunicate: for the very Institution, as it uniteth many men into[158] one Community; so it dissociateth one Community from another: °so that Excommunication is not needfull for keeping Kings and States asunder; nor has any further effect then is in the nature of Policy[au] it selfe; unlesse it be to instigate Princes to warre upon one another.°

Nor is the Excommunication of a Christian [159]Subject, that obeyeth the laws of his own Soveraign, whether Christian, or Heathen,[159] of any effect. For if he beleeve that Iesus is the Christ, he hath the [279] Spirit of God, (1 Joh. 4. 1.)[av] and God dwelleth in him, and he in God, (1 Joh. 4. 15.) But hee that hath the Spirit of God; hee that dwelleth in God; hee in whom God dwelleth, can receive no harm by the Excommunication of men. Therefore, he that beleeveth Jesus to be the Christ, [160]is free from all the dangers threatned to persons Excommunicate.[160] He that beleeveth it not, is no Christian. °Therefore a true and unfeigned Christian is not liable to Excommunication: Nor he also that is but a professed Christian, till his Hypocrisy appear in his Manners, that is, till his behaviour bee contrary to the law of his Soveraign, which is the rule of Manners, and which Christ and his Apostles have commanded us to be subject to. For the Church cannot judge of Manners but by externall Actions, which Actions can never bee unlawfull, but when they are against the Law of the Common-wealth.°

Sequitur hinc, Ecclesiam unam ab alia Excommunicari non posse. Siquidem enim Excommunicandi se mutuò Potestatem aequalem habeant, non Disciplina Excommunicatio est, sed Schisma. Sin Ecclesia una alteri subordinata sit; unica tantum sunt [241] Ecclesia, & qui Excommunicantur, homines privati sunt, sed non Ecclesia.

Quoniam autem Excommunicationis sententia admonitionem continet congressum & convictum cum Excommunicato fugiendi; si is, qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem Excommunicatus fuerit, Sententia invalida est. Cives enim adesse summo Imperanti, quoties jusserit, Lege Naturae obligantur; neque illum à loco quocunque dominii sui, sive prophano, sive sacro prohibere jure possunt; neque exire ex ejus dominio, Civium quisquam, nisi illo permittente debet; multo minus cum illo (si ad tantum honorem evocentur) cibum una capere recusare. Quod autem ad alios[at] Reges aliosque Summam habentes Potestatem attinet; cum non sint ejusdem Ecclesiae, nec ejusdem Civitatis partes, non opus est sententia Excommunicationis, ut alter alterius congressum vitet: ipsa enim Civitatis Institutio, sicut homines privatos in una Communitate conjungit; ita Communitates ipsas alteram ab altera disjungit. Neque in Civem Christianum, si Legibus Civitatis suae obediat vim ullam habet. Nam si credat Iesum esse Christum, Spiritum habet Dei, 1 Ioh. 4, 1.[av] Et Deus in illo habitat, & ille in Deo, 1 Ioh. 4, 15. Sed is, qui Spiritum habet Dei, is qui in Deo habitat, is in quo habitat Deus nihil pati potest mali, ab Excommunicationibus hominum. Quicunque ergo credit Iesum esse Christum, damnum ab Excommunicatione nullum habet. Qui vero articulum illum non credit, non est Christianus.

If a mans Father, or Mother, or Master bee Excommunicate, [161]yet are not the Children[161] forbidden to keep them Company, nor to Eat with them; for that were (for the most part) to oblige them not to eat at all, [162]for want of means to get food; and to authorise them to disobey[162] their Parents, and Masters, contrary to the Precept of the Apostles.[aw]

In summe, the Power of Excommunication cannot be extended further than to the end for which the Apostles and Pastors of the Church have their Commission from our Saviour; which is not to rule by Command and Coaction,[ax] but by Teaching and Direction of men in the way of Salvation in the world to come. And as a Master in any Science, may abandon his Scholar, when hee °obstinately° neglecteth °the practise of° his rules; but not accuse him of Injustice, because he was never bound to obey him: so a Teacher of Christian doctrine may abandon his Disciples that °obstinately° continue in an unchristian life; but he cannot [163]say, they doe him wrong, because they are not obliged to obey him: For to a Teacher that shall so complain,[163] may

Of the Interpreter of the Scriptures before Civil Soveraigns became Christians.

[168]St. Paul coming to Thessalonica, where was a Synagogue of the Jews,[168] (Acts 17. 2, 3.) As his manner was, went in unto them, and three Sabbath dayes reasoned with them out of the Scriptures, Opening[bb] and alledging,[bc] that Christ must needs have suffered and risen again from the dead; and that this Iesus whom [169]he preached was[169] the Christ. The Scriptures [170]here mentioned[170] were the Scriptures of the Jews, that is, the Old Testament. The men, to whom he was to prove that Jesus was the Christ, and risen again from the dead, were also Jews, and did beleeve already, that they were the Word of God. Hereupon (as it is verse 4.) some of them beleeved, and °(as it is in the 5. ver.)° some beleeved not. What was the reason, when they all beleeved the Scripture, that they did not all beleeve alike[171]; but that [172]some approved, others disapproved the Interpretation of St. Paul that cited them; and every one Interpreted them to himself? It was this;[172] S. Paul came to them without any [173]Legall Commission,[173] and in the manner of one that would not Command, but Perswade; which he must needs do, either by Miracles, as Moses did to the Israelites in Egypt, that they might see his Authority in Gods works;[bd] or by [174]Reasoning[174] from the already received Scripture, that they might see the truth of his doctrine in Gods Word. But whosoever [175]perswadeth by reasoning[175] from principles written, maketh him to whom hee speaketh [176]Judge, both of the meaning of those principles, and also of the force of his inferences upon them.[176] If these Jews of Thessalonica were not, who else was the Judge of what S. Paul alledged out of Scripture? If S. Paul, what needed he to quote any places °to prove his doctrine?° It had been enough to have said, I find it so [177]in Scripture, that is to say,[177] in your Laws, of which I am Interpreter, as sent by Christ. [178]The[178] Interpreter therefore of the Scripture, to whose Interpretation the Jews of Thessalonica were bound to stand, °could be none:° every one might beleeve, or not beleeve, according as the Allegations seemed to himselfe to be [179]agreeable, or not agreeable to the meaning of the places alledged.[179] [be] And generally in all cases of the world, hee that pretendeth any proofe, maketh Judge of his proofe him to whom he addresseth his speech. °And as to the case of the Jews in particular, they were bound by expresse words (Deut. 17.)[bf] to receive the determination of all hard questions, from the Priests and Judges of Israel for the time being. But this is to bee understood of the Jews that were yet unconverted.°

[168] To come to the interpreter of the Scriptures: we read that when St Paul was in Thessalonica, he went into the synagogue of the Jews which was there, and [169] I preach to you is [170] which he cited [171] ^ in Paul [172] they disagreed about the interpretation of the Scriptures, one approving St Paul's interpretation, another interpreting them for himself? Why was this? It was because Scripturae quas citabat, erant Iudaeorum, nempe Testamentum vetus. Illi ad quos probaturus erat Iesum esse Christum & à mortuis resuscitatum, Iudaei quoque erant, & Scripturas illas Verbum Dei esse crediderunt, & (vers. 4.) aliqui eorum crediderunt, alii non crediderunt. Quare autem hoc? Quia scilicet ad eos accessit S. Paulus sine omni mandato Civitatis, ut qui non ad Imperandum, sed ad persuadendum venisset; & quia persuadere voluit, necesse illi erat, vel per Miracula id facere, ut Moses Israelitis in Aegypto, ut Authoritatem suam ostenderet, per opera Divina,[bd] vel per disputationem in Synagoga, ex Scripturis quas receperant, ut veritas Doctrinae suae per Verbum Divinum apparere posset. [be] In this passage Hobbes's use of the verb 'allege' has mostly followed that of Acts 17: 3 in AV (quoted by him above), meaning 'assert', 'affirm' (the word translated thus in AV is παρατιθέμενος, 'putting forward'). 'Allegations' here means 'assertion', 'affirmation' (OED, 'allegation', 3). But 'alledged' here means 'cited' or 'adduced' (as reasons) (OED, 'allege', *v.*², 2, 3). [bf] Deut. 17: 8–13.

For the conversion of the Gentiles, there was no use of alledging[bg] the Scriptures, [180]which they beleeved not.[180] The Apostles therefore [181]laboured by Reason to confute their Idolatry; and that done, to perswade[181] them to the faith of Christ, by their testimony of his Life, and Resurrection. So that there could not [182]yet[182] bee any controversie concerning the authority to Interpret Scripture; seeing no man was obliged during his infidelity, to follow any mans Interpretation of [183]any Scripture, except his Soveraigns Interpretation of the Laws of his countrey.[183] [281]

Let us now consider the Conversion it self, and see [184]what there was therein, that could be cause of such an obligation.[184] Men were converted to no other thing then to the Beleef of that which the Apostles preached: And the Apostles preached nothing, but that Jesus was the Christ, that is to say, the King that was to save them, and reign over them °eternally° in the world to come; and consequently that hee was not dead, but risen again from the dead, °and gone up into Heaven,° and should come again °one day° to judg the world, °(which also should rise again to be judged,)° and reward every man according to his works. None of them preached that himselfe, or any other Apostle was such an Interpreter of the Scripture, as all that [185]became[185] Christians, ought to [186]take[186] their Interpretation °for Law.° For to Interpret the Laws, [187]is part of the Administration of[187] a present Kingdome; which the Apostles had not. They prayed then, and all other Pastors ever since, Let thy Kingdome come;[bh] and exhorted [188]their Converts to obey their then Ethnique[188] [bi] Princes. The New Testament was not yet published in [189]one Body.[189] Every of the Evangelists was Interpreter of his own Gospel; and every Apostle of his own Epistle; And of the Old Testament, our Saviour himselfe saith to the Jews (Iohn 5. 39.) Search the Scriptures; for in them yee [190]thinke to have[190] eternall life, and they are they that testifie of me. [191]If hee had not meant they should Interpret them, hee would not have bidden them take thence the proof of his being the Christ: he would either have Interpreted them himselfe, or referred them to the Interpretation of the Priests.[191]

Ad conversionem Ethnicorum, tum Iudaeos tum Scripta eorum omnia contemnentium, ex Scripturis Sacris disputare, frustra fuisset. Apostoli ergo Idololatriam eorum rationibus à natura sumptis aggressi sunt; deinde confutata illorum Religione falsa, ad Fidem Christi adducere illos conati sunt per testimonium Vitae & Resurrectionis Christi praebitum. De Authoritate ergò Scripturas interpretandi, nulla hic controversia esse potuit, propterea, quod cum Infideles essent, Scripturae nullius interpretationem sequi obligarentur, praeter Legum suarum Civilium interpretationem, Lege Civitatis comprobatam.

Apostoli autem nihil praedicaverant, nisi quod Iesus erat Christus, id est Rex à quo salvandi essent, & qui super eos in mundo futuro regnaturus esset; & per consequens, quod non mortuus esset, sed à mortuis resuscitatus, quodque rediturus esset ad mundum judicandum, & cuique secundum opera ejus tributurus. When a difficulty arose, the Apostles and Elders of the Church assembled themselves together, and determined what should bee preached, and taught, and how they should Interpret the Scriptures to the People; but took not from [192]the People[192] the liberty to read, and Interpret them to themselves. The Apostles sent °divers° Letters to the Churches, and other Writings for their instruction; which had been in vain, if they had not allowed them to Interpret, [193]that is, to consider the meaning of them. And as it was[193] in the Apostles time, it must be till such time as [194]there should be Pastors, that could authorise an Interpreter, whose Interpretation should generally be stood to: But that could not be till Kings were Pastors, or Pastors Kings.[194]

Of the Power to make Scripture Law.

There be two senses, wherein a Writing may be said to be Canonicall; for Canon, signifieth a Rule; and a Rule is a Precept, by which a man is guided, and directed in any action whatsoever. Such Precepts, though given by a Teacher to his Disciple, or a Counsellor to [195]his friend,[195] without power to Compell him to observe them, are neverthelesse Canons; because they are Rules: But when they are given by one, whom he that receiveth them is bound to obey, then are [196]those Canons, not onely Rules,[196] but Laws: The question therefore here, is of [197] the Power to make the Scriptures °(which are the Rules of Christian Faith)° Laws.

Of the Ten Commandements.

That part of the Scripture, which was first Law, was the Ten Commandements, °written in two Tables of Stone, and delivered by [282] God himselfe to Moses; and by Moses made known to the people.° Before that time there was no written Law of God, who as yet having not chosen any people to bee his peculiar [198]Kingdome,[198] had given no Law to men, but the Law of Nature, [199]that is to say, the Precepts of Naturall Reason, written in every mans own heart. Of these two Tables, the first containeth the law of Soveraignty;[199] 1. That they should not obey, nor honour the Gods of other Nations, in these words, Non habebis Deos alienos coram me,[bj] that is, Thou shalt not have for Gods, the Gods that other Nations worship; but onely me: whereby they were forbidden to obey, or honor, [200]as their King and Governour, any other God,[200] than him that spake unto them then by Moses, °and afterwards [bj] For this and the following commandments see Exod. 20: 3–17; Deut. 5: 7–21.

Ad omnem, quae oriebatur difficultatem, Apostoli & Presbyteri solebant convenire, & quidem quid praedicarent, & docerent, & quomodo ad populum Scripturas interpretarentur, determinârunt; libertatem autem illas legendi, & interpretandi sibi, nemini ademerunt. Apostoli Ecclesiis Epistolas, aliaque scripta miserunt instructionis causa; id quod frustra fuisset, nisi illa interpretari permissum illis esset. Sicut autem permissum hoc erat tempore Apostolorum, ita permittendum est, quamdiu non sint Reges Doctores, vel Doctores [244] Reges, qui Interpretationem, aut interpretem Legibus constituant.

Scriptura aliqua duobus modis Canonica dici potest; Canon enim Regula est, & Regula Praeceptum, quo in actione quacunque aliquis regitur. Quae Praecepta etsi data sint à Magistro Discipulo suo vel à Consiliario ad Consulentem, absque potestate cogendi ut observentur, Canones tamen sunt, quia Regulae. Sed quando ab eo data sunt, cui is, qui illa accipit tenetur obedire, tunc non modo Canones sunt, sed etiam Leges. Quaestio ergò est hoc loco de Potestate faciendi, ut Scripturae Leges sint, cujus est.

Pars illa Scripturae Sacrae, quae prima Lex facta est, est Decalogus. Ante tempus illud, Lex Dei Scripta nulla erat; nondum enim populum suum ullum peculiarem sibi elegerat, nec aliam hominibus dederat Legem praeter Leges Naturales. Decalogi autem duae erant tabulae, quarum prima jus Regium continet; nempe primò, ne populus adoraret aut serviret Diis Gentium, his verbis, non habebis Deos alienos coram me.[bj] Quibus verbis prohibentur obedire vel honorem dare Regi vel Rectori alii, quàm illi qui per Mosem ad by the High Priest.° 2. That they should not make any Image to represent him; that is to say, they were not to [201]choose to themselves, neither in heaven, nor in earth, any Representative[201] of their own fancying, but obey Moses °and Aaron, whom he had appointed to that office.° 3. That they should not take the Name of God in vain; that is, they should not speak rashly of their King, nor dispute his Right, [202]nor the commissions of Moses and Aaron, his Lieutenants.[202] 4. That they should every Seventh day abstain from their ordinary labour, and employ that time in doing [203]him[203] Publique Honor. The second Table containeth the Duty of one [204]man[204] towards another, as To honor Parents; Not to kill; Not to Commit Adultery; Not to steale; Not to corrupt Iudgment by false witnesse; and finally, Not so much as to designe in their heart the doing of any injury [205]one to another.[205] The question now is, Who it was that gave to these [206]written Tables the obligatory force of Lawes.[206] There is no doubt but they were made Laws by God himselfe: But because a Law obliges not, °nor is Law to any,° but to them that acknowledge it to be the act of the [207]Soveraign;[207] how could the people of Israel that were forbidden to approach the Mountain to hear what God said to Moses,[bk] be obliged to obedience to all those [208]laws which Moses propounded to them? Some of them were indeed the Laws of Nature, as all the Second Table; and therefore to be acknowledged for Gods Laws; not to the Israelites alone, but to all people: But of those that were peculiar to the Israelites, as those of the first Table, the question remains; saving that they had obliged themselves, presently[bl] after the propounding of them,[208] to obey Moses, in these words (Exod. 20. 19.) Speak thou to us, and we will hear thee; but let not God speak to us, lest we dye. [209]It was therefore onely Moses then, and after him the High Priest, whom (by Moses) God declared should administer this his peculiar Kingdome, that had on Earth, the power to make this short Scripture of the Decalogue to bee Law in the Common-wealth of Israel. But Moses, and Aaron, and the succeeding High Priests were the Civill Soveraigns.[209] Therefore hitherto, the Canonizing, [210]or making of the Scripture Law,[210] belonged to the Civill Soveraigne.

[bk] Exod. 19: 12. [bl] = immediately (OED, 'presently', adv., 1.a).

Of the Iudiciall, and Leviticall Law.

The Judiciall Law, that is to say, the Laws that God prescribed to the Magistrates of Israel, for the rule of their administration of [283] Justice, and of the Sentences, or Judgments they should pronounce, [211]in Pleas between man and man;[211] [bm] and the Leviticall Law, that is to say, the rule that God prescribed touching the Rites and Ceremonies of [212]the Priests and Levites,[212] [bn] were all delivered to them by Moses onely; and therefore also became Lawes, by vertue of the °same° promise of obedience to °Moses. Whether these laws were then written, or not written, but dictated to the People by Moses (after his forty dayes being with God in the Mount) by word of mouth, is not expressed in the Text; but they were all positive Laws, and equivalent to holy Scripture, and made Canonicall by° Moses the Civill Soveraign.

The Second Law.

After the Israelites were come into the Plains of Moab over against Jericho, and ready to enter into the land of Promise, Moses to the former Laws added divers others; which therefore are called Deuteronomy; that is, Second Laws. And are (as it is written, Deut. 29. 1.) The words of a Covenant which the Lord commanded Moses to make with the Children of Israel, besides the Covenant which he made with them in Horeb. For having explained those former Laws, in the beginning of the Book of Deuteronomy, he addeth others, that begin at the 12. Cha. and continue to the end of the 26. of the same Book. This Law °(Deut. 27. 1.)° [bo] they were commanded to write upon [213]great stones playstered over[213] at their passing over Jordan: This Law also was written by Moses himself in a Book; and delivered into the hands of the Priests, and to the Elders of Israel, °(Deut. 31. 9.)° and commanded °(ve. 26.)° to be put in the side of the Arke; °for in the Ark it selfe was nothing but the Ten Commandements.° This was the Law, which [214]Moses (Deuteronomy 17. 18.)[214] commanded the Kings of Israel should keep a copie of: And this is the Law, which having been long time lost, was found again in the Temple in the time of Josiah, and by his authority received [215] for the Law of God.[bp] But both Moses [216]at the writing, and Josiah at the recovery thereof, had both of them[216] the Civill Soveraignty. Hitherto therefore the Power of making Scripture Canonicall, was in the Civill Soveraign.

Besides this Book of the Law, there was no other Book, °from the time of Moses,° till after the Captivity, °received amongst the Jews for the Law of God.° For the Prophets (except a few) lived in the time of the Captivity it selfe; °and the rest lived but a little before it;° and were so far from having their Prophecies °generally° received for Laws, as that their persons were persecuted, [217] partly by false Prophets, and partly by the Kings °which were seduced by them.° And this Book it self, which was [218] confirmed by Josiah for the Law of God, and with it all the History of the Works of God, was lost in the Captivity, and [219]sack[219] of the City of Jerusalem, as appears by that of 2 Esdras[bq] 14. 21. Thy Law is burnt; therefore no man knoweth the things that are done of thee, or the works that shall [220]begin.[220] And before the Captivity, between the time when the [221] Law was lost, (which is not mentioned in the Scripture, but may probably be thought to be the time of Rehoboam, when * Shishak King of Egypt took the spoile of[br] the Temple,) and the time of Josiah, when it was found againe, [284] [222]they[222] had no written Word of God, but [223] ruled according to their own discretion, or by the direction of such, as each of them esteemed Prophets.

The Old Testament when made Canonicall.

From hence we may inferre, that the Scriptures of the Old Testament, which we have at this day, were not Canonicall, nor a Law unto the Jews, till the renovation of their Covenant °with God° at their return from the Captivity, °and restauration of their Common-wealth° under Esdras. But from that time forward they were accounted the Law of the Jews, and for such translated into Greek by Seventy Elders of Judaea, and put into the Library °of Ptolemy° at Alexandria, °and approved for the Word of God.°[bs] Now seeing Esdras was the High Priest, and the High Priest was their Civill Soveraigne, it is manifest, that [224] the Scriptures were never made Laws, but by the Soveraign Civill Power.

The New Testament began to be Canonicall under Christian Soveraigns.

By the Writings of the [225] Fathers that lived in the time before °that Christian Religion was received, and authorised by° Constantine [226] the Emperour,[bt] we may find, that the [227]Books wee now have of the New Testament, were held by the Christians of that time (except a few, in respect of whose paucity the rest were called the Catholique Church, and others Haeretiques)[227] for the dictates of the Holy Ghost; and consequently for the Canon, or Rule of Faith: such was the reverence °and opinion° they had of their Teachers; °as generally the reverence that the Disciples bear to their first Masters, in all manner of doctrine they receive from them, is not small.° Therefore there is no doubt, [228]but when S. Paul wrote to the Churches he had converted; or any other Apostle, or Disciple of Christ, to those which had then embraced Christ, they received those their Writings[228] for the true Christian Doctrine. But in that time, when not the Power and Authority of the Teacher, but the Faith of the Hearer caused them to receive it, it was [229] not the Apostles that made their own Writings [230]Canonicall,[230] but every Convert made them so to himself.

But the question here, is not what any Christian made a Law, or Canon to himself, (which he might again reject, by the same right he received it;) but what was so made a Canon to them, as without injustice they could not doe any thing contrary thereunto. That the New Testament should in this sense be [231]Canonicall, that is to say, a Law in any place where the Law of the Common-wealth had not made it so,[231] is contrary to the nature of a Law. For a Law, (as hath been already shewn)[bv] is the Commandement of that Man, or Assembly, [232]to whom we have given Soveraign Authority, to make such Rules for the direction of our actions, as hee shall think fit; and to punish us, when we doe any thing contrary to the same.[232] When therefore any other à Summo Civitatis Imperante. De Testamento Novo satis apparet ex antiquis Patribus qui fuerunt ante tempora Imperatoris Constantini Magni,[bt] quod à Christianis omnibus pro dictamine Spiritus Sancti, & proinde pro Regula fidei receptum erat; tanta erat illis Doctorum suorum reverentia. Dubium ergo non est, quin ea, quae Ecclesiis quas condiderant, scripserat Sanctus Paulus, aliusve Apostolus vel Discipulus Christi, ab illis Ecclesiis, hominibusque quos ad Christianismum ipsi converterant, pro vera Doctrina Christiana recepta fuerint. Veruntamen eo tempore, quando, non Potestas & Authoritas Doctoris, sed audientium Fides fecit, ut reciperentur, manifestum est, novum Testamentum Legem factum esse, non ab ipsis Apostolis, sed Scripturam illam Legem sibi ipsi factam esse ab unoquoque Proselytorum.

Sed non quaeritur hoc loco, quid Christianus Legem vel Canonem sibimet ipsi fecerit (qui eodem jure, quo fecerit, rejicere etiam potuit) sed quid ita ipsi Lex facta sit, ut illam transgredi sine Injustitia non potuerit. man [233]shall offer unto us any other Rules, which the Soveraign Ruler hath not prescribed, they are[233] but Counsell, and Advice; which, whether good, or bad, hee that is counselled, may without injustice [234] refuse to observe; and when contrary [285] to the Laws already established, without injustice cannot observe, [235]how good soever he conceiveth it to be. I say, he cannot in this case[235] observe the same in his actions, nor in his discourse °with other men;° though he may without blame beleeve his private Teachers, and wish [236]he had the liberty to practise their advice; and that it were publiquely received for[236] Law. For internall Faith is in its own nature invisible, and consequently exempted from all humane jurisdiction; °whereas the words, and actions that proceed from it, as breaches of our Civill obedience, are injustice both before God and Man.° Seeing then our Saviour hath denyed his Kingdome to be in this world,[bw] seeing he hath said, he came not to judge, but to save the world,[bx] he hath not subjected us to other Laws than those of the Common-wealth; that is, the Jews to the Law of Moses, (which he saith (Mat. 5.)[by] he came not to destroy, but to fulfill,) and other Nations to the [237]Laws of their severall Soveraigns,[237] and all men to the Laws of Nature; °the observing whereof, both he himselfe, and his Apostles have in their teaching recommended to us, as a necessary condition of being admitted by him in the last day into his eternall Kingdome, wherein shall be Protection, and Life everlasting.° Seeing then our Saviour, and his Apostles, [238]left[238] not new Laws to oblige us in this world, but new Doctrine to prepare us for the next; the Books of the New Testament, which containe that Doctrine, untill obedience to them was commanded, by [239]them that God had given power to on earth to be[239] Legislators, were not [240]obligatory Canons, that is, Laws, but onely good, and safe advice, for the direction of sinners in the way[240] to salvation, which every man might take, and refuse at his owne perill, without injustice.

Again, our Saviour Christs Commission to his Apostles, and Disciples, was to [241]Proclaim his Kingdome (not present, but) to come;[241] and to Teach all Nations; and to Baptize them that should beleeve; and °to enter into the houses of them that should receive them; and° where they were not received, to shake off [242]the dust of their feet against them;[242] [bz] but not to call for fire from heaven to destroy them,[ca] nor to compell them to [243]obedience[243] by the Sword. In all which there is nothing of [244]Power, but of Perswasion.[244] He sent them out as Sheep unto Wolves,[cb] not as Kings to their Subjects. They had not in Commission[cc] to make Laws; but to obey, and teach obedience to Laws made; and consequently they could not make their [245]Writings obligatory Canons, without the help[245] of the Soveraign Civill Power. And therefore the °Scripture of the° New Testament is there only Law, where the [246]lawfull Civill Power[246] hath made it so. And there also the King, [247]or Soveraign, maketh it a Law to himself; by which he subjecteth himselfe,[247] not to the Doctor, or Apostle that converted him, but to God himself, and his Son Jesus Christ, [248]as immediately as did the Apostles themselves.[248]

Of the Power of Councells to make the Scriptures Law.

That which may seem to give the New Testament, °in respect of those that have embraced Christian Doctrine,° the force of Laws, in the times, [249]and places of persecution,[249] is the decrees they made amongst themselves in their Synods. For we read (Acts 15. 28.) the stile of the Councell °of the Apostles, the Elders, and the whole [286] Church,° in this manner, It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burthen than these necessary things, &c. which is a stile that [250]signifieth[250] a Power to lay a burthen on them that had [251]received their Doctrine. Now to lay a burden on another, seemeth the same that[251] [cd] to oblige; and therefore the Acts of that Councell were Laws °to the then Christians.° Neverthelesse, they were no more Porrò, Servator noster Apostolis & Discipulis mandatum dedit, ut praedicarent Regnum Dei appropinquare; ut nationes omnes docerent, & credentes Baptizarent; ut ubi non reciperentur, pulverem ejus Civitatis pedibus suis excuterent;[bz] sed non, ut ignem ex coelo ad destructionem eorum postularent;[ca] neque ut eos ad Fidem Christi gladio cogerent. Nihil hic est Imperii, sed Consilii tantùm. Emisit illos Christus sicut Oves ad Lupos,[cb] non ut Reges ad subditos. Non habuerunt in Mandatis, ut Leges ferrent, sed ut Legibus obedirent latis, & obedientiam alios docerent. Non potuere ergò Apostoli ipsi facere, ut Doctrina eorum vim haberet Legum, sine voluntate eorum, qui in Civitatibus suis summam habuere Potestatem. Testamentum ergo Novum in iis locis tantùm Lex est, in quibus ita à summa Potestate Civili factum est. In illis autem Reges ipsi eidem Legi se submittunt, non autem Doctori, vel Apostolo à quo conversi erant, sed ipsi Deo, & Filio suo Iesu Christo, immediatè.

Id quod Testamentum Novum, quo tempore Ecclesia à potestate Civili non protegebatur, Legem videri fecit, erant decreta in suis ipsorum Synodis facta. Legimus enim (Act. 15. 28.) Laws than are these other Precepts, Repent; Be Baptized; Keep the Commandements; Beleeve the Gospel; Come unto me; Sell all that thou hast; Give it to the poor; and, Follow me;[ce] which are not Commands, but Invitations, and Callings of men to Christianity, like that of Esay[cf] 55. 1. Ho, every man that thirsteth, come yee to the waters, come, and buy wine and milke without money. For first, the Apostles power was no [252]other than that of our Saviour,[252] to invite men to °embrace° the Kingdome of God; which they themselves [253]acknowledged for[253] a Kingdome (not present, but) to come; and they that have no [254] Kingdome, can make no Laws. And secondly, if their Acts of Councell, were Laws, they could not without sin be disobeyed. But we read not any where, that they who [255]received not[255] the Doctrine of Christ, did therein sin; but that they died in their sins; that is, that their sins against the Laws to which they owed obedience, were not pardoned. [256]And those Laws were the Laws of Nature, and the Civill Laws of the State, whereto every Christian man had by pact submitted himself.[256] And therefore by the Burthen, which the Apostles [257]might lay on such as they had converted,[257] are not to be understood Laws, but Conditions, proposed to those that sought Salvation; which they might accept, or refuse at their own perill, without a new sin, though not without the hazard of being °condemned, and° excluded out of the Kingdome of God for their sins past. And therefore of Infidels, S. John saith not, the wrath of God shall come upon them, but the wrath of God remaineth upon them; and not that they shall be condemned; but that they are condemned already. Nor can it be conceived, that the benefit of Faith, is Remission of sins, unlesse we conceive withall, that the dammage of Infidelity, is the Retention of °the same° sins.

[248] Vnusquisque qui sitit, venite ad aquas; venite & emite vinum & lac sine pecunia. Apostoli enim Potestatem majorem non habuêre, quam ipse Christus, nempe invitandi homines ad Regnum Dei, quod non praesens, sed futurum esse praedicaverunt ipsi; qui autem Regnum non habent Praesens, Leges ferre non possunt. But to what end is it (may some man aske), that the Apostles, and other Pastors of the Church, °after their time,° should meet together, to agree upon what Doctrine should be taught, both for Faith and Manners, if no man were obliged to observe their Decrees? To this may be answered, that the Apostles, and Elders of that Councell, were obliged even by [258]their entrance into[258] it, to teach the Doctrine therein concluded, and decreed to be taught, so far forth, as [259]no precedent Law, to which they were obliged to yeeld obedience, was to the contrary; but not that all other Christians should be obliged to observe, what they taught. For though they might deliberate what each of them should teach; yet they could not deliberate what others should do, unless their Assembly had had a Legislative Power; which none could have but Civil Soveraigns. For though God be the Soveraign of all the world, we[259] are not bound to take for his Law, whatsoever is propounded by [260]every[260] man in his name; nor [261] any thing [287] contrary to the Civill Law, which God hath °expressely° commanded us to obey.

Seeing then the Acts of Councell of the Apostles, were [262]then no Laws, but Counsells; much lesse are Laws the Acts of any other Doctors, or Councells since, if assembled without the Authority of the Civill Soveraign. And consequently, the Books of the New Testament,[262] though most perfect Rules of Christian Doctrine, could not be made Laws [263]by any other authority then that of Kings, or Soveraign Assemblies.[263]

The first Councell, that made the [264]Scriptures we now have,[264] Canon, is not extant:[cg] For that Collection of the Canons of the Apostles, attributed to Clemens, the first Bishop of Rome after S. Peter, is [265] subject to question: For though the Canonicall books bee there reckoned up; yet these words, Sint vobis omnibus Clericis & Laicis Libri venerandi, &c. containe a distinction of Clergy, and Laity, that was [266] not in use so neer [267]St. Peters[267] time.[ch] The first Councell [268]for setling[268] the Canonicall Scripture, °that is extant,° is that of Laodicea, Can. 59. which forbids the reading of other Books then those in the Churches;[ci] [269]which is a Mandate that is not addressed to every Christian, but to those onely that had authority to read any thing publiquely in the Church; that is, to Ecclesiastiques onely.[269]

1 is it] it is B 17 Councells] Councell B 22 made H-Errata; made {of del. by TH} MS] made of H, B

[258] the fact that they chose to be present in [259] they were not bound by any civil law to the contrary. Nor did they come together to deliberate about what should be received, but about what should be taught. For unless they had legislative power, they could not determine what should be received. All men are indeed obliged to take the word of God for law; but they [260] a mortal [261] ^ to teach

[262] not laws, much less should we regard as laws the acts of those councils of pastors which were later held without civil authority. So it is clear that the Holy Scriptures,

Quorsum autem (quaeret forte aliquis) Apostoli aliique Ecclesiae Pastores convenerunt, determinandi causa quae Doctrina tum Fidei tum Morum doceretur, si decreta eorum observare teneretur nemo? Ad quod responderi potest, Apostolos, Presbyterosque praesentes in Concilio, eo ipso quod praesentes esse voluerunt, Doctrinam illam, quae doceri decernebatur docere obligatos fuisse, quatenus nulla Lege Civili ad contrarium tenerentur. Neque enim eo fine convenerunt, ut quid reciperetur, sed ut quid doceretur deliberarent. Nam quid reciperetur, nisi Potestatem habuissent Legislativam, determinare non potuerunt. Verbum quidem Dei pro Lege habere obligantur homines universi; ut autem pro verbo Dei reciperent, quicquid in Dei nomine ab homine mortali pronuntiaretur, aut quod Legibus Civilibus quas custodiendas esse Deus jussit, contrarium doceretur obligati non erant.

Quoniam autem conciliorum Apostolorum Acta non erant Leges, multominus pro Legibus habenda sunt Conciliorum eorum Pastorum Acta, quae postea sine Authoritate Civili habita fuêrunt. Constat ergo Scripturas Sacras, etsi Doctrinae Christianae Regulae erant perfectissimae, Leges tamen fieri non potuisse, sine consensu Regum aliorumque summam habentium Potestatem Civilem. [249]

Of the Right of constituting Ecclesiasticall Officers in the time of the Apostles.

Of Ecclesiasticall Offices in the time of the Apostles, some were Magisteriall, some Ministeriall. Magisteriall were the Offices of preaching of the Gospel °of the Kingdom of God° to Infidels; of administring the Sacraments, and [270] Divine Service; and of teaching the Rules of Faith and Manners to those that were converted. Ministeriall was the Office of Deacons, that is, of them that [271]were appointed to the administration of the secular necessities of the Church, at such time as they[271] lived upon a common stock of mony, raised out of the voluntary contributions of the faithfull.

Amongst the Officers Magisteriall, the first, and principall were the Apostles; whereof there were at first but twelve; and these were chosen and constituted by [272]our Saviour[272] himselfe; and their Office was not onely to Preach, Teach, and Baptize, but also to [273]be Martyrs, (Witnesses of our Saviours Resurrection.)[273] This Testimony, was the specificall, and essentiall mark; [274]whereby the Apostleship was distinguished from other Magistracy Ecclesiasticall; as being necessary for an Apostle, either to have seen our Saviour after his Resurrection, or to have conversed[cj] with him before, and seen his works, and other arguments of his Divinity, whereby they might be taken for sufficient Witnesses.[274] And therefore at the election of a new Apostle in the place of Judas Iscariot, S. Peter saith (Acts 1. 21, 22.) Of these men that have companyed with us, all the time that the Lord Iesus went in and out among us, beginning from the Baptisme of Iohn unto that same day that he was taken up from us, must one be ordained to be a Witnesse with us of his Resurrection: [275]where, by this word must, is implyed a necessary property [288] of an Apostle, to have companyed with the first and prime Apostles in the time that our Saviour manifested himself in the flesh.[275]

Matthias made Apostle by the Congregation.

The first Apostle, of those which were not constituted by Christ °in the time he was upon the Earth,° was Matthias, chosen in this manner: There were assembled together in Jerusalem about 120 Christians (Acts 1. 15.) These appointed two, Ioseph °the Iust,° and Matthias [276](ver. 23.) and caused lots to be drawn; and (ver. 26.) the Lot fell on Matthias, and he[276] was numbred with the Apostles. So that here we see the [277]ordination of this Apostle, was the act of the Congregation, and not of St. Peter, nor of the eleven, otherwise then as Members of the Assembly.[277]

Magisteriale munus erat Euangelium Infidelibus praedicare; Sacramenta & omnem cultum divinum administrare; & Regulas fidei & Morum eos docere, quos ad Fidem converterent. Ministeriale munus erat Diaconorum, id est, eorum, qui Ecclesiae secularia administrabant, quo tempore Christiani à contributionibus Fidelium voluntariis, in commune collatis alebantur. Inter Munera Magisterialia, primum & maximum erat Apostolatus; Apostoli autem primo duodecem erant, omnes ab ipso Christo electi & constituti; quorum officium erat, non solum Praedicare, Docere, & Baptizare, sed etiam resurrectionem Christi (quanquam periculo vitae) attestari. Testimonium autem hoc Apostolatus nota specifica essentialisque erat. Itaque quando in locum Iudae Iscariotae Apostolus eligendus erat, praefatus est Petrus (Act. 1. 21, 22.) Oportet ergo eorum virorum qui nobiscum erant per omne tempus in quo introivit ad nos & exivit Dominus Iesus, à Baptismo Iohannis, usque ad diem in quo assumptus est, aliquem constitui Resurrectionis ejus, nobiscum Testem. Necessarium ergo Apostolo erat, ut Christi Resurrectionem testaretur.

Eorum, qui Apostoli constituti ab ipso Christo non erant, primus[ck] fuit Matthias. Electus fuit sic: convenerunt in Ierusalem (Act. 1. 15.) circiter 120. Christiani; atque hi constituerunt duos, Iosephum & Matthiam electionemque Sortibus permiserunt, & sic Apostolatum Sortitus Matthias,[cl] inter Apostolos numeratus est. Ex quo constat, electionem Apostoli penes Ecclesiam fuisse, non autem penes Petrum neque Apostolos undecim reliquos.

[ck] The word 'primus' ('first'), missing from 68 and 70, is supplied here; with it, the Latin is a translation of the English; without it, the meaning is 'Matthias was one of those who were not constituted Apostles by Christ himself.'

[cl] The meaning of the Latin here seems clear, but the accusative construction is clumsy; Hobbes may have intended 'ad Apostolatum' ('for the apostolate').

Paul and Barnabas made Apostles by the Church of Antioch.

After him there [278]was never any other Apostle ordained, but Paul and Barnabas; which was done[278] (as we read (Acts 13. 1, 2, 3.)) °in this manner.° There were in the Church that was at Antioch, certaine Prophets, and Teachers; as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen; °which had been brought up with Herod the Tetrarch,° and Saul. As they [279]ministred[279] unto the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Ghost said, Separate mee Barnabas, and Saul for the worke whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted, and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away.

By which it is manifest, that though they were [280]called by the Holy Ghost, their Calling was declared unto them, and their Mission authorized by the particular[280] Church of Antioch. And that this their calling was to the Apostleship, is apparent by that, that they are both called (Acts 14. 14.) Apostles: And that it was by vertue of this [281]act of the Church of Antioch,[281] that they were Apostles, S. Paul declareth plainly (Rom. 1. 1.) °in that hee useth the word, which the Holy Ghost used at his calling:° For hee stileth himself, An Apostle separated unto the Gospel of God; alluding to the words of the Holy Ghost, Separate me Barnabas and Saul, &c. But seeing the work of an Apostle, was to be a Witnesse of the Resurrection of Christ, a man may here aske, how S. Paul, that conversed[cm] not with our Saviour before his [282]passion, could know he was risen.[282] To which is easily answered, that our Saviour himself appeared to him °in the way to Damascus,° from Heaven, after his Ascension; and chose him °for a vessell° to bear his name before the Gentiles, and Kings, and Children of Israel;[cn] and consequently (having seen the [283]Lord after his passion)[283] was a competent Witnesse of his Resurrection: And as for Barnabas, he [284]was a Disciple before the Passion. It is therefore evident that Paul, and Barnabas were Apostles; and yet chosen, and authorized (not by the first Apostles alone, but) by the Church of Antioch; as Matthias was chosen, and authorized by the Church of Jerusalem.[284]

Cumque jejunâssent, & precati essent, & manus illis imposuissent, dimiserunt illos*. Ex quo manifestum est, quanquam à Spiritu Sancto electi erant, vocatos tamen eos fuisse ab Ecclesia Antiochena. Munus autem ad quod vocati erant, fuisse Apostolatum, manifestum est ex eo quod (Act. 14. 14) vocati sunt ambo Apostoli. Et quod in virtute hujus vocationis fuit, quod Apostoli erant, Sanctus Paulus manifestè indicat (Rom. 1. 1.) Apostolum se separatum vocans, ad Euangelium Dei, alludensque ad verba Spiritus Sancti dicentis, Separate mihi Barnabam & Saulum, &c. What Offices in the Church are Magisteriall.

Bishop, [285]a word formed in our language, out of the Greek Episcopus, signifieth an Overseer, or[285] Superintendent of any businesse, and particularly a Pastor, or Shepherd; and thence by metaphor was taken, °not only amongst the Jews that were originally Shepherds, [289] but also amongst the Heathen,° to signifie the Office of a King, or any other Ruler, or Guide of People, whether he ruled by Laws, or Doctrine. [286]And so the Apostles were the first Christian Bishops, instituted by Christ himselfe:[286] in which sense the Apostleship of Judas is called (Acts 1. 20.) his Bishoprick. And afterwards, when there were constituted Elders °in the Christian Churches, with charge to guide Christs flock by their doctrine, and advice;° these Elders were also called Bishops. Timothy was an Elder (which word Elder, [287]in the New Testament is[287] a name of Office, as well as of Age;) °yet° he was also a Bishop. And [288]Bishops were then content with the Title of Elders. Nay S. John himselfe, the Apostle beloved of our Lord, beginneth his Second Epistle with these words, The Elder to the Elect Lady.[288] By which it is evident, that Bishop, Pastor, Elder, Doctor, °that is to say, Teacher,° were but so many divers names of the same Office in the time of the Apostles. For there was then no government [289]by Coercion,[289] but only by Doctrine, and Perswading. The Kingdome of God was yet to come, in a new world; so that [290]there could be no authority to compell in any Church, till the Common-wealth had embraced the Christian Faith; and consequently no diversity of Authority, though there were diversity of Employments.[290]

Besides °these Magisteriall employments in the Church; namely,° Apostles, Bishops, Elders, Pastors, and Doctors, [291]whose calling was to proclaim Christ to the Jews, and Infidels, and to direct, and teach those that beleeved we read in the New Testament of no other.[291] For by the names of Evangelists and Prophets, is not signified any Office, but severall [292]Gifts, by which severall men[292] were profitable to the Church: as Evangelists, by writing the life and acts of our Saviour; such as were S. Matthew and S. Iohn Apostles, and S. Marke and S. Luke Disciples, and [293]whosoever else wrote of that subject, (as S. Thomas, and S. Barnabas are said to have done, though the Church have not received the Books that have gone under their names:)[co] and as Prophets, by the gift of interpreting the Old Testament; and sometimes by declaring their speciall Revelations to the Church.[293] For neither these gifts, nor the gifts of Languages, nor the gift of Casting out Devils, or of Curing °other° diseases, [294]nor any thing else did make an Officer in the Church, save onely the due calling and election to the charge of Teaching.[294]

Ordination of Teachers.

As the Apostles, Matthias, Paul, and Barnabas, were [295]not made by our Saviour himself, but were elected by the Church, that is, by the Assembly of Christians;[295] namely, Matthias by the Church of Jerusalem, and Paul, and Barnabas by the Church of Antioch; so were also the Presbyters, and Pastors in other Cities, elected by the Churches of those Cities. °For proof whereof, let us consider, first, how S. Paul proceeded in the Ordination of Presbyters, in the Cities where he had converted men to the Christian Faith, immediately after he and Barnabas had received their Apostleship.° We read (Acts 14. 23.) that [296]they ordained Elders in every Church;[296] which at [290] first sight may be taken for an Argument, that they themselves °chose, and° gave them their authority: But if we consider the Originall text, it will [297]be manifest, that they were authorized, and chosen by the Assembly of the Christians of each City. For the words there are, χειροτονήσαντες αὐτοῖς πρεσβυτέρους κατ' ἐκκλησίαν, that is, When they had Ordained them Elders by the Holding up of Hands[cp] in every Congregation. Now it is well enough known, that in all those Cities, the manner of choosing Magistrates, and Officers, was by plurality of suffrages; and (because the ordinary way of distinguishing the Affirmative Votes from the Negatives, was by Holding up of Hands) to ordain an Officer in any of the Cities, was no more but to bring the people together, to elect them by plurality of Votes, whether it were by plurality of elevated hands, or by plurality of voices, or plurality of balls, or beans, or small stones, of which every man cast in one, into a vessell marked for the Affirmative, or Negative; for divers Cities had divers customes in that point.[297] It was therefore the Assembly that elected their own Elders: the Apostles [298]were onely Presidents of the Assembly to call them together for such Election, and [298]to pronounce them Elected, and to give them the benediction, which now is called Consecration. [299]And for this cause they that were Presidents of the Assemblies, as (in the absence of the Apostles) the Elders were, were called προεστῶτες, and in Latin Antistites;[cq] which words signifie the Principall Person of the Assembly, whose office was to number the Votes, and to declare thereby who was chosen; and where the Votes were equall, to decide the matter in question, by adding his own; which is the Office of a President in Councell.[299] And (because all the Churches had their [300]Presbyters[300] ordained in the same manner,) where [301] the word is Constitute, (as Titus 1. 5.) ἵνα καταστήσῃς κατὰ πόλιν πρεσβυτέρους, For this cause left I thee in Crete, that thou shouldest constitute Elders in every City,[cr] we are to understand the same thing; namely, that hee should call the faithfull together, and ordain them Presbyters by plurality of suffrages. It had been a strange thing, if in a Town, where men perhaps had never seen any Magistrate otherwise chosen then by an Assembly, those of the Town becomming Christians, should so much as have thought on any other way of Election of their Teachers, and Guides, that is to say, of their Presbyters, (otherwise called Bishops,) then this of plurality of suffrages, intimated by S. Paul (Acts 14. 23.) in the word χειροτονήσαντες: Nor was there ever any choosing of Bishops, (before the Emperors found it necessary to regulate them in order to the keeping of the peace amongst them,) but by the Assemblies of the Christians in every severall Town.[301]

[cp] AV has only 'ordained them elders'; 'by the Holding up of Hands' is Hobbes's expansion, based on the fact that the verb χειροτονέω (literally to 'stretch out a hand') was used in classical Greek for voting by hand.

[cq] The Greek term means 'leading men', 'chiefs' (literally, 'people placed in front'); the Latin term means 'presidents', 'overseers' (literally, 'people standing at the front'). Both were used as Hobbes describes here.

The same is also confirmed by the continuall practise °even to this day,° in the Election of the Bishops of Rome. For if [302] the Bishop of any place, had the right of choosing another, to the succession of the Pastorall Office, in any City, at such time as he went from thence, to plant the same in another place; much more had he had the Right, to appoint his successour in that place, in which he last resided and [291] dyed: And we find not, that ever any Bishop of Rome appointed his successor. For they were a long time chosen by the People,[302] as we may see by the sedition raised about the Election, [303] between Damasus, and Vrsicinus; which Ammianus Marcellinus saith was so great, that Iuventius the [303] Praefect, unable to keep the peace between them, was forced to goe out of the City; and that there were above an hundred men found dead upon that occasion in the Church it self.[cs] And though they afterwards were chosen, first, by the whole Clergy of Rome, and afterwards by the Cardinalls; yet never any was appointed to the succession by his predecessor. [304] If therefore they pretended no right to appoint their own successors, I think I may reasonably conclude, they had no right to appoint the successors of other Bishops, without receiving some new power; which none could take from the Church to bestow on them, but such as had a lawfull authority, not onely to Teach, but to Command the Church; which none could doe, but the Civill Soveraign.[304]

[301] we read (Titus 1: 5) that the Apostles constituted some pastors, 'constituted' means the same as χειροτονήσαι, that is, to elect by votes given by means of raised hands, or beans, or stones thrown into an urn. In towns where no other method of election had ever been seen, any election using a different method would have astonished all the citizens, whether pagan or Christian. Nor, in the times that followed, were bishops themselves elected in any other way than by the Churches of the individual towns, until people began to fight over the elections.

modo eligebantur, ubi legimus (Tit. 1, 5.) Apostolos constituisse Pastores aliquos, idem significat constituisse quod Χειροτονήσαι, vel eligere, per suffragia manibus elevatis data, vel Fabis, vel Lapillis in urnam conjectis. In urbibus autem, ubi modus Electionum alius numquam visus fuerat Electionem aliusmodi Cives omnes sive Ethnici sive Christiani, admirati essent. Neque temporibus sequentibus Episcopi ipsi aliter electi erant, quam ab Ecclesiis singularum Vrbium, donec de Electionibus coeptum est pugnari.

Confirmatur idem à diuturnâ in Episcopis ipsius Romae eligendis consuetudine. Nam si in ullâ Civitate Episcopus in aliam sedem migraturus, vel moriturus Successorem suum constituendi jus habuisset, multo magis Episcopus Romanus illud jus habuisset: Successorem tamen suum Episcopus Romanus nunquam elegit, sed Civitatis Romanae Christiani; ut manifestum est ex Seditione ortâ in electione Damasi prae Vrsino, quae tanta erat, ut Praefectus Vrbis, cum Pacem inter illos conservare conatus frustra esset, exire è Civitate coactus est, occisis in illa Seditione plusquam centum hominibus, in Ecclesia ipsa.[cs] Et postea, quanquam Episcopi Romani eligerentur, primo, à Clero Romano, deinde à Cardinalibus, ab Antecessoribus tamen Episcopis nunquam electi erant. Quoniam ergo Successores suos, Pontifices Romani eligere non potuerunt, multo minùs potuere Successores aliorum Episcoporum constituere, sine Authoritate ab illo derivata, qui in Ecclesiam jus habuit Imperandi, id est sine Authoritate Civili. [302] in any city the bishop had a right of constituting his successor when he was about to move to another see or to die, the Bishop of Rome would have had that right to a much greater degree [70: pre-eminently]; yet his successor was never chosen by the Bishop of Rome, but rather by the Christians of the city of Rome, [cs] Damasus and Ursinus (not 'Ursicinus', who was a military commander) were rival candidates for the papacy, elected simultaneously in 366; Viventius (not 'Juventius'; but Hobbes was here following the most recent scholarly edn. of Ammianus Marcellinus, Rerum gestarum . . . libri xviii, ed. de Valois (1636), which gave 'Iuuentius' (p. 337)) was the prefect who had to retreat to the suburbs; 137 Christians were reported dead. Ministers of the Church what:

The word Minister in the Originall Διάκονος, signifieth one that °voluntarily° doth the businesse of another man; and differeth from a Servant onely in this, that Servants are obliged by their condition, to what is commanded them[305]; whereas Ministers are obliged onely by their undertaking, and bound therefore to no more than that they have undertaken: So that both they that [306]teach[306] the Word of God, and they that administer the secular affairs of the Church, are both Ministers, but they are Ministers of different Persons. For the Pastors of the Church, called (Acts 6. 4.) The Ministers of the Word, are Ministers of Christ, whose Word [307]it is: But the Ministery of a Deacon, which is called[307] (verse 2. of the same Chapter) Serving of Tables, °is a service done to the Church, or Congregation:° So that neither any one man, nor the whole Church, could ever of their Pastor say, he was their Minister; but of a Deacon, whether [308]the charge he undertook[308] were to serve tables, or distribute maintenance to the Christians, when they lived in each City on a common stock, or upon collections, as in the first times, or to take a care of the House of [309]Prayer, or of the Revenue, or other worldly businesse of the Church, the whole Congregation[309] might properly call him their Minister.

for the [313]conferring[313] of the Holy Ghost, that their Baptisme should be administred, or confirmed by a Minister of the Word, not by a Minister of the Church. [314]And therefore to confirm the Baptisme of those that Philip the Deacon had Baptized, the Apostles sent out of their own number from Jerusalem to Samaria, Peter, and John; who conferred on them that before were but Baptized, those graces that were signs of the Holy Spirit, which at that time did accompany all[314] true Beleevers; which what they were may be understood by that which S. Marke saith (chap. 16. 17.)[ct] °These signes follow them that beleeve;° In my Name they shall cast out Devills; they shall speak with new tongues; They shall take up Serpents, and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. This to doe, was it that Philip could not give; but the Apostles could, and (as appears by this place) effectually did to every man that truly beleeved, [315]and was by a Minister of Christ himself Baptized: which power either Christs Ministers in this age cannot conferre, or else there are very few true Beleevers, or Christ hath very few Ministers.[315]

And how chosen.

That the first Deacons were chosen, not by the Apostles, but by [316]a Congregation of the Disciples; that is, of Christian men of all sorts,[316] is manifest out of Acts 6. where we read that the Twelve, after the number of Disciples was multiplyed, called them together, and having told them, that it was not fit that the Apostles should leave the Word of God, and serve tables, said unto them °(verse 3.)° Brethren looke you out among you seven men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost, and of Wisdome, whom we may appoint over this businesse. Here it is manifest, that though the Apostles declared them °elected;° yet the Congregation chose them; which also, (verse the fift) is more expresely said, where it is written, that the saying pleased the [317]multitude, and they chose seven, &c.[317] ut Baptismus administraretur, vel confirmaretur per Ministrum Verbi, non per Ministrum Ecclesiae. Baptismus enim Pastoris, temporibus illis in illos, qui verè crediderunt Spiritus Sancti dona conferebat; quae dona (Marc. 16, 17.)[ct] erant; Per nomen meum Daemonia ejicient; linguis loquentur novis; serpentes tollent; & si quid lethale biberint, nequaquam nocebit eis; aegrotis manus imponent, & bene se habebunt. Of Ecclesiasticall Revenue, under the Law of Moses.

[318] Under the Old Testament,[cu] the Tribe of Levi were onely capable of the Priesthood, and other °inferiour° Offices of the Church. The [319] land was divided amongst the other Tribes (Levi excepted,) which by the subdivision of the Tribe of Joseph, into Ephraim and Manasses, were still twelve. [320]To the Tribe of Levi were assigned[320] certain Cities for their habitation, with the suburbs [321]for their cattell: but for their portion, they were to have the tenth of the fruits of the land of their Brethren.[321] [cv] Again, the Priests for their maintenance had the tenth of that tenth, together with °part of° the oblations, and sacrifices.[cw] For God had said to Aaron (Numb. 18. 20.) Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part amongst them, I am thy part, and thine inheritance amongst the Children of Israel. For God being then King, and having [322]constituted[322] the Tribe of Levi to be his Publique Ministers, he allowed them for their maintenance, the Publique revenue, °that is to say, the part° that God had reserved to himself; which were Tythes, and Offerings: and that is it which is meant, where God saith, I am [323] thine inheritance. And therefore to the Levites might not unfitly be attributed [293] the name of Clergy °from Κλῆρος,° which signifieth Lot, or Inheritance; not that they were heirs of the Kingdome of God, more than other[324]; but that [325] Gods inheritance, °was their maintenance.° Now seeing in this time God himself was their King, and Moses, [326]Aaron, and the succeeding High Priests[326] were his Lieutenants; it is manifest, that the Right of Tythes, and Offerings was constituted by the Civill Power.

°After their rejection of God in the demanding of a King, they enjoyed still the same revenue; but the Right thereof was derived from that, that the Kings did never take it from them: for the Publique Revenue was at the disposing of him that was the Publique Person; and that (till the Captivity) was the King. And again, after the return from the Captivity, they paid their Tythes as before to the Priest.[cx] Hitherto therefore Church Livings were determined by the Civill Soveraign.°

In our Saviours time, and after.

Of the maintenance of our Saviour, and his Apostles, we read onely they had a Purse, (which was carried by Judas Iscariot;) and, that of the Apostles, such as [327]were Fisher-men, did sometimes use their trade;[327 cy] and that when our Saviour sent the Twelve Apostles to Preach, he forbad them to carry Gold, and Silver, °and Brasse in their purses,° for that the workman is worthy of his [328]hire:[328] By which it is probable, their [329]ordinary maintenance was not unsuitable to their employment; for their employment[329] was (ver. 8.) freely to give, because they had freely received; [330]and their maintenance was the free gift of those that beleeved the good tyding they carryed about of the coming of the Messiah their Saviour. To which we may adde, that which was contributed out of gratitude; by[330] such as our Saviour had healed of diseases; of which are mentioned Certain women (Luke 8. 2, 3.) which had been healed of evill spirits and infirmities; Mary Magdalen, out of whom went seven Devills; and Ioanna the wife of Chuza, Herods Steward; and Susanna, and many others, which ministred unto him of their substance.

Mat. 10. 9, 10.

After our Saviours Ascension, the Christians of every City lived in Common, * upon the mony which was made of the sale of their lands and possessions, and laid down at the feet of the Apostles, of good will, not of duty; for [331]whilest the Land remained[331] (saith S. The Ministers of the Gospel lived on the Benevolence of their flocks.

1 Cor. 9. 13

But here may some ask, whether the Pastor were then bound to live upon voluntary contribution, [338]as upon [338] almes, For who (saith S. Paul 1 Cor. 9. 7.) goeth to war at his own charges? [339] or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milke of the flock? And again, Doe ye not know that they which minister about holy things, live of the things of the Temple; and they which wait at the Altar, partake with the Altar; °that is to say, have part of that which is offered at the Altar for their maintenance? And then he concludeth,° Even so hath the Lord appointed, that they which preach the Gospel should live of the Gospel.[dc] From which place may be inferred indeed, that the Pastors of the Church ought to be maintained by their flocks; but not that the Pastors were to determine, either the quantity, or the kind of their own allowance, [340]and be (as it were) their own Carvers.[dd] Their allowance must needs therefore be determined, either by the gratitude, and liberality of every particular man of their flock, or by the whole Congregation.[340] By the whole Congregation it could not be, because their Acts were then no Laws: Therefore the maintenance of Pastors, before Emperours and °Civill° Soveraigns had made Laws to settle it, was nothing but [341]Benevolence.[341] They that served at the Altar lived on what was offered[342]. So may the [343]Pastors[343] also take what is offered them by their flock; but [344]not exact what is not offered.[344] In what Court should they sue for it, [345]who had no Tribunalls? Or if they had Arbitrators amongst themselves, who should execute their Judgments, when they had no power to arme their Officers?[345] It remaineth therefore, that there could be no certaine maintenance assigned to any Pastors °of the Church,° but by the [346]whole Congregation;[346] and then onely, when their Decrees should [347]have the force (not onely of Canons, but also) of [347] Laws; which Laws could not be made, but by Emperours, Kings, or other Civill Soveraignes. The Right of Tythes in Moses Law, could not be applyed to the °then° Ministers of the Gospell; because Moses and the High Priests were the Civill Soveraigns °of the people° under God, [348]whose Kingdom amongst the Jews was present; whereas the Kingdome of God by Christ is yet to come.[348]

Hitherto hath been shewn what the Pastors °of the Church° are; what are the points of their Commission [349] (as that they were to Preach, to Teach, to Baptize, to be Presidents in [350]their severall Congregations;) what is Ecclesiasticall Censure, viz. Excommunication, that is to say, in those places where Christianity was forbidden by the Civill Laws, a putting of themselves out of the company of the Excommunicate, and where Christianity was by the Civill Law commanded, a putting the Excommunicate out of the Congregations of Christians;[350] who elected the Pastors and Ministers °of the Church,° (that it was the Congregation); who consecrated and blessed them, (that it was the [351]Pastor); what was their due revenue,[351] (that it was none but their own possessions, and their own labour, and the voluntary contributions of [352]devout and gratefull Christians).[352] We are [295] to consider now, what Office in the Church those persons have, who being Civill Soveraignes, have embraced also the Christian Faith.

That the Civill Soveraign being a Christian hath the Right of appointing Pastors.

And first, we are to remember, that the Right of Judging what Doctrines are fit for [353] Peace, and to be taught the Subjects, is °in all Common-wealths° inseparably annexed (as hath been already proved °cha. 18.°)[de] to the Soveraign Power Civill, whether it be in one Man, or in one Assembly of men. For it is evident to the meanest capacity, that mens actions are derived from the opinions they have of the Good, or Evill, which from those actions redound unto themselves; and consequently, men that are once possessed of an opinion, that their obedience to the Soveraign Power, will [354]bee more hurtfull to them, than their disobedience, will[354] disobey the Laws, and thereby overthrow the Common-wealth, and [355]introduce confusion, and[355] Civill war; for the avoiding whereof, all Civill Government was ordained. And therefore in [356]all[356] Common-wealths of the Heathen, the Soveraigns have [357] had the name of Pastors °of the People,° because there was no [358]Subject[358] that could °lawfully° Teach the people, but by their °permission and° authority.

Itaque in Civitatibus etiam Ethnicis, Pastores passim vocati sunt, qui Summam in illis habuere Potestatem: populum enim docere Civis nullus potuit, nisi per illorum Authoritatem.

This Right of the Heathen Kings, cannot bee thought taken from them by their conversion to the Faith of Christ; who [359]never ordained,[359] that Kings for beleeving in him, should be [360]deposed, that is, subjected to any but himself, or (which is all one)[360] be deprived of the power necessary for the conservation of Peace amongst their [361]Subjects,[361] and for their defence against °foraign° Enemies. And therefore Christian Kings are still the Supreme Pastors of their [362]people, and have power to ordain what Pastors they please, to teach the Church, that is, to teach the People committed to their charge.[362]

Again, let the right of choosing them be °(as before the conversion of Kings)° in the Church, for so it was in the time of the Apostles °themselves (as hath been shewn already in this chapter);° even so also the Right will be in the [363]Civill Soveraign, Christian. For in that he is a Christian, he allowes the Teaching; and in that he is the Soveraign (which is as much as to say, the Church by Representation,) the Teachers hee elects, are elected by the Church.[363] And when an Assembly °of Christians° choose their Pastor in a Christian Common-wealth, it is the Soveraign [364] that electeth him, °because tis done by his Authority;° In the same manner, as when [365] a Town choose their Maior, it is the act of him that hath the Soveraign Power: For every act done, is the act of him, without whose consent it is invalid. And therefore whatsoever examples may be drawn out of History, concerning the Election of Pastors, by the People, or by the Clergy, they are no arguments against the Right of [366]any Civill Soveraign,[366] because they that elected them did it by his Authority.

Seeing then in every Christian Common-wealth, the Civill Soveraign is the Supreme Pastor, [367]to whose charge the whole flock of [296] his Subjects is committed, and consequently[367] that it is by his authority, that all other Pastors are made, [368]and have power to teach, and performe all other Pastorall offices; it followeth also, that it is from the Civill Soveraign, that all other Pastors derive their right of Teaching, Preaching, and other functions pertaining to that Office; and that they[368] are but his Ministers; in the same manner as [369]the Magistrates of Towns, Judges in Courts of Justice, and Commanders of Armies, are all but Ministers of him that is the Magistrate of the whole Common-wealth, Judge of all Causes, and Commander of the whole Militia, which is alwaies the Civill Soveraign. And the reason hereof, is[369] not because Quod jus hoc Regum Ethnicorum, simul ac converterentur Reges illi ad Fidem Christi, sublatum esset, non potest credi. Christus enim spoliari Imperio Reges eo nomine non voluit, quod in ipsum crederent: neque ut cuiquam alii subjicerentur: neque ut Potestate pacem inter Cives suos conservandi, & contra hostes defendendi, privarentur. Sunt ergo Reges Christiani, etiam nunc Subditorum suorum Pastores supremi, & jus habent Pastores sub [256] se constituendi, quos ipsi idoneos ad populum instruendum judicabunt.

Praeterea, etsi jus Pastores eligendi penes Ecclesiam esset, sicut erat tempore Apostolorum; sic quoque jus illud penes Regem esset, qui personam Civitatis gerit, id est personam Ecclesiae, & proinde sine illo Ecclesia muta esset. Quando autem Coetus aliquis in Civitate Christiana, Pastorem suum eligit, is eligit, qui Summam habet in Civitate Potestatem; eodem planè modo quo, quando Oppidi alicujus populus, Praetorem sibi eligunt, eligit is, qui Summam habet Potestatem; omnis enim Actio illius est, sine cujus consensu valida non est. Itaque quaecunque ex Historiis, de Pastoribus à populo vel à Clero electis exempla adducuntur, pro praejudicio contra jus ejus qui Civitatem repraesentat, haberi non possunt; quia per illius Authoritatem eligebantur.

[360] deprived of their rule, nor that they should be subjected to anyone else, nor that they should [361] citizens, [362] subjects, and they have the right to constitute pastors under them, whom they shall judge suitable to teach the people.
[363] king, who bears the person of the commonwealth, that is, the person of the Church, and hence without him the Church would be unable to speak. [364] ^ of the commonwealth
[365] ^ the people of [366] him who represents the commonwealth, [367] and [368] it follows that the other pastors [369] those who are put in charge of cities, provinces, or towns;

they that Teach, but because they that are to Learn, are his Subjects. [370]For let it be supposed, that a Christian King commit the Authority of Ordaining Pastors in his Dominions to another King, (as divers Christian Kings allow that power to the Pope;)[370] he doth not thereby constitute a Pastor over himself, nor a Soveraign Pastor over his [371]People; for that were[371] to deprive himself of the Civill Power; °which depending on the opinion men have of their Duty to him, and the fear they have of Punishment in another world, would depend also on the skill, and loyalty of Doctors, who are no lesse subject, not only to Ambition, but also to Ignorance, than any other sort of men.° So that where a stranger [372]hath authority to appoint Teachers, it is given him by the Soveraign in whose Dominions he teacheth. Christian Doctors are our Schoolmasters to Christianity; But[372] Kings are Fathers of Families, and may receive Schoolmasters for their [373]Subjects[373] from the recommendation of a stranger, but not from the command; especially when the [374]ill teaching them shall redound to the great and manifest profit of him that recommends them: nor can they be obliged to retain them, longer than it is for the Publique good; the care of which they stand so long charged withall, as they retain any other essentiall Right of the Soveraignty.[374]

The Pastorall Authority of Soveraigns only is de Jure Divino, that of other Pastors is Jure Civili.

If a man therefore should ask a Pastor, [375]in the execution of his Office, as the chief Priests and Elders of the people[375] (Mat. 21. 23.) asked our Saviour, By what authority dost thou these things, and who gave thee this authority: he can make no other °just° Answer, but that he doth it by the Authority of the Common-wealth, given him by [376]the King, or Assembly that representeth it.[376] All Pastors, except the Supreme, execute their charges °in the Right, that is by the Authority of the Civill Soveraign, that is,° Iure Civili.[df] But the King, and every other Soveraign, executeth [377]his Office of Supreme Pastor, by immediate[377] Authority from God, that is to say, in Gods Right, or Iure Divino.[dg] And therefore none but Kings [378] can put into their Titles °(a mark of their submission to God onely)° Dei gratiâ Rex,[dh] &c. Bishops ought to say °in the beginning of their Mandates,° By the favour of the [379]Kings Majesty, Bishop of such a Diocesse; or as Civill Ministers, In his Majesties Name. For in saying, Divinâ providentiâ,[di] which is the same with Dei gratiâ, though disguised, they deny to have received their authority from the Civill State; and sliely [297] slip off the Collar of their Civill Subjection, contrary to the unity and defence of the Common-wealth.[379]

Fieri potest, ut Rex aliquis Subditorum suorum Pastorem constituat Regem alium (ut multi Reges Christiani Pastorem fecerunt Subditorum suorum Papam Romanum) non tamen Pastorem suum illum facit, neque Subditorum suorum Summum; nisi Potestate Civili seipsum spoliare vellet. In qua Civitate igitur Pastores constituit Persona externa, non id facit jure suo, sed jure ejus qui Civitati illi imperat. Admittuntur autem tales quasi Ludimagistri in Civitate aliena, cujus Rex est Paterfamilias, Ludimagistros autem filiis suis, ab externo homine commendatos recipere quidem potest, sed non Imperatos; praesertim si doctrinas quas docuerint non ad suum, sed ad illorum emolumentum tendere perspexerit.

Si quis ergò Pastorem praedicantem vel Baptizantem videns interrogaret, sicut Servatorem nostrum interrogaverunt Sacerdotes & Seniores (Matth. 21, 23.) qua Authoritate facis ista? Et quis tibi dedit istam Authoritatem? Respondere aliter non potest, nisi quod facit ista Authoritate Civitatis, ab eo data, qui Civitatis est Persona. Pastores omnes praeter Supremum jure Civili ista faciunt; sed Rex, & quicunque Summam habet Potestatem, eadem faciunt Authoritate Dei, sive (ut loquuntur) jure Divino. [370] It can happen that one king appoints another king as pastor over his subjects (as many Christian kings have made the Roman Pope pastor over their subjects);
[371] subjects, unless he wishes
[372] constitutes pastors in a commonwealth, he does so not by his own right, but by the right of the ruler of the commonwealth. Such people [sc. pastors] are admitted like schoolmasters to foreign commonwealths, whose [373] children [374] king perceives that the doctrines they teach tend not to his profit but to theirs.

[df] = 'by civil right'. [dg] = 'by divine right'. [dh] = 'by the grace of God, King'.
[di] = 'by divine providence'.

Christian Kings have Power to execute all manner of Pastoral function.

But if every Christian [380]Soveraign be[380] the Supreme Pastor of his own Subjects, it seemeth that he hath also the Authority, not only to Preach (which perhaps no man will deny;) but also to Baptize, and to Administer the Sacrament of the Lords Supper; and to Consecrate both Temples, and Pastors [381]to Gods Service; which most men deny;[381] partly because they use not to do it; and partly because [382]the Administration of Sacraments, and Consecration of Persons, and Places to holy uses, requireth the Imposition of such mens hands, as by the like Imposition successively from the time of the Apostles have been ordained to the like Ministery.[382] For proof therefore that Christian Kings have power to [383]Baptize, and to Consecrate,[383] I am to render a reason, both why they use not to doe it, and how, without the ordinary ceremony of Imposition of hands, they [384]are made capable of doing[384] it, when they will.

There is no doubt but any King, in case he were skilfull in the [385] Sciences, might by the same Right [386]of his Office, read Lectures of[386] them himself, by which [387]he authorizeth others to read them in the Universities.[387] Nevertheless, because the care of the [388]summe of the businesse of the Common-wealth taketh up his whole time, it were not convenient for him to apply himself in Person to that particular.[388] A King may also if he please, [389]sit in Judgment, to hear and determine all manner of Causes, as well as give others authority to[389] doe it in his name; but that the [390]charge[dj] that lyeth upon him of Command and Government, constrain[390] him to bee continually at the Helm, and to commit the [391]Ministeriall Offices to others under him.[391] In the like manner our Saviour (who surely had power to Baptize) Baptized none * himself, but [392]sent his Apostles and Disciples to Baptize.[392] So also S. Paul, [393] by the necessity of Preaching in divers and far distant places, Baptized few: [394]Amongst all the Corinthians he Baptized only * Crispus, Cajus, and Stephanus;[dk] and the reason was, because his principall * Charge was to Preach. Whereby it is manifest, that[394] the greater Charge, (such as is the Government of the Church,) is a dispensation for the lesse. The reason therefore why Christian Kings use not to Baptize, is evident, and the same, for which at this day there are few Baptized by Bishops, and by the Pope fewer.

Atqui, si unusquisque Rex Christianus Subditorum suorum Summus quoque Pastor sit, etiam non solùm praedicandi (quod forte non negabitur) sed etiam Baptizandi, Sacramentum coenae Dominicae administrandi, & Templa Sacerdotesque Consecrandi jus habere videri potest, quod non facile concedetur. Neque enim id facere solent; neque sine Impositione manuum Episcopi vel Presbyteri fieri consuevit. Si quis Rex Scientiae alicujus humanae peritus esset, quin docere eam publicè eodem jure posset, quò eam docent qui ab illo jus accipiunt, dubium nullum est. Quoniam autem totius Civitatis in illum incumbit cura, ut ipse, in res illas momenti minoris, tempus suum contereret, incommodum publicum esset. Potest etiam Rex, si voluerit, lites Civiles publicè cognoscere, & decidere, non minore jure, quàm qui id per ipsius faciunt Authoritatem; nisi quod cura reipublicae cogeret gubernaculo indesinenter illum assidere, cura rerum exiguarum aliis commissa. And as concerning Imposition of Hands, [395]whether it be needfull, for the authorizing of[395] a King to Baptize, and Consecrate, we may consider thus.

Imposition of Hands, was a most ancient publique [396] ceremony amongst the Jews, by which was designed,[dl] and made certain, the person, or other thing intended in a mans prayer, blessing, sacrifice, °consecration,° condemnation, or other speech. So Jacob in blessing the children of Joseph (Gen. 48. 14.) [397]Laid his right Hand on Ephraim the younger, and his left Hand on Manasseh the first born;[397] and [298] this he did wittingly [398](though they were so presented to him by Joseph, as he was forced in doing it to stretch out his arms acrosse) to design[398] to whom he intended the greater blessing. So also °in the sacrificing of the Burnt offering,° Aaron is commanded [399] [Exod. 29. 10.] to Lay his Hands on the head of the bullock; and [ver. 15.] to Lay his Hand on the head of the ramme. °The same is also said again, Levit. 1. 4. & 8. 14.° Likewise Moses when he ordained [400]Joshua to be Captain of the Israelites, that is, consecrated him to Gods service,[400] [Numb. 27. 23.] Laid his Hands upon him, and gave him his Charge,[dm] [401]designing, and rendring certain,[401] who it was they were to obey in war. And in the consecration of the Levites [Numb. 8. 10.] [402]God commanded that the Children of Israel should[402] Put their Hands upon the Levites. And in the condemnation of him that had blasphemed °the Lord° [Levit. 24. 14.] [403]God commanded that all that heard him should Lay their Hands on his head, and that all the Congregation should[403] stone him. And why should they only that heard him, Lay their Hands upon him, and not rather a Priest, Levite, or other Minister of Justice, but that none else were able to design, and demonstrate to the eyes of the Congregation, who it was that had blasphemed, and ought to die? And to design a man, or any other thing, by the Hand to the Eye, is lesse subject to mistake, than when it is done to the Eare by a Name.

Ceremonia antiquissima apud Iudaeos erat, tum publicè, tum privatim, Impositio manuum; per quam designabatur, ostendebaturque Persona, vel alia res quaecunque, inter Precandum, Benedicendum, sacrificandum, condemnandum vel alloquendum intelligenda. Ita Iacob benedixit filiis Ioseph, Gen. 48, 14, extendens dextram suam ut imponeret capiti Ephraimi, (quamvis esset minor) & sinistram suam capiti Manassis. Atque hoc sciens fecit, ut benedictionem majorem designare se minori, astantibus ostenderet. Ita etiam Aaronem jubet Deus (Exod. 29, 10,) manus suas imponere capiti juvenci; & rursus (vers. 15.) Manum imponere capiti arietis. Etiam Moses cum Ducem Israelitarum constitueret (Num. 27, 23.) Imponens manus [258] suas illi, Mandatis instruxit, populo ostendens quis esset, cui in bello obedire debuerunt. Item in Consecratione Levitarum Num. 8, 10. Admovebis Levitas coram Iehovah, & filii Israelis manus suas super ipsos Levitas imponent; & in condemnatione blasphemi (Leviticus 24, 14.) Educito blasphemum istum extra castra, ut quicunque audiverunt illum, manus suas super caput ejus ponant; deinde lapidabunt eum totus Coetus. Quare autem manus illi imponere soli jubebantur, qui illum audierant, ac non potius Sacerdos, vel Levita, vel Iustitiae Minister aliquis, nisi quod illorum nemo congregationi designare, vel indicare, potuit quis fuerit, qui blasphemaverat, & commeruerat mori? Hominem autem vel rem aliam quamcunque, per manum ad oculos ostendere errori minus obnoxium est, quam ad aures nomine designare.

And so much was this ceremony [404]observed,[404] that in blessing the whole Congregation at once, which cannot be done by Laying on of Hands, yet [405]Aaron [Levit. 9. 22.] did lift up his Hand towards the people when he blessed them. And we read also of the like ceremony of Consecration of Temples amongst the Heathen, as that the Priest laid his Hands on some post of the Temple, all the while he was uttering the words of Consecration. So naturall it is to design[dn] any individuall thing, rather by the Hand, to assure the Eyes, than by Words to inform the Eare in matters of Gods Publique service.[405]

This ceremony was [406]not therefore new in our Saviours time. For Jairus [Mark 5. 23.] whose daughter was sick, besought our Saviour (not to heal her, but) to Lay his Hands upon her, that shee might bee healed. And [Matth. 19. 13.] they brought unto him little children, that hee should Put his Hands on them, and Pray.[406]

According to this °ancient° Rite, the Apostles, and Presbyters, and the Presbytery it self, Laid Hands on them whom they ordained Pastors, and withall prayed for them that they might receive the Holy Ghost; and [407]that not only once, but sometimes oftner, when a new occasion was presented:[407] but the end was still the same, namely a punctuall, and religious designation of the person, [408]ordained either[408] to the Pastorall Charge °in general, or to a particular Mission: so° [Act. 6. 6.] The Apostles °Prayed, and° Laid their Hands on the seven Deacons; which was done, not to give them the Holy Ghost, (for they were full of the Holy Ghost before they were chosen, as appeareth °immediately [299] before,° verse 3.) but to design[do] them to [409]that Office.[409] And after Philip the Deacon had converted certain persons in Samaria, [410]Peter and John went down [Act 8. 17.] and Laid their Hands on them, and they received[410] the Holy Ghost. And [411]not only an Apostle, but a Presbyter had this power:[411] For S. Paul adviseth Timothy [1 Tim. 5. 22.] Lay Hands suddenly on no man; °that is, designe no man rashly to the Office of a Pastor.° The whole [404] liked at that time, [405] they lifted up their hands towards the people when blessing them, as we may read in Lev. 9: 22. [406] also used by Christ, who put his hands on those whom he healed or blessed.

[407] sometimes hands were laid on the same pastor more often, as when he was sent out on a new ministry; [408] elected [409] the office of deacon. Those who laid on hands were either bishops or elders; it was not the office of a deacon.
[410] the Apostles Peter and John laid their hands upon them (Acts 8: 17) so that they might receive
[411] Timothy, a presbyter, laid on hands;

In tantùm autem placuit eo tempore Ceremonia haec, ut in benedicenda tota simul congregatione, quia per manuum Impositionem fieri non potuit, manus tamen versus populum in benedicendo elevarunt, ut legere est Levit. 9, 22.

Eadem Ceremonia usus etiam est Christus, manus in illos imponens, quos sanabat, aut quibus benedicebat. Iuxta ritum hunc Apostoli & Presbyteri, ipsumque Presbyterium, in illos quos Pastores constituebant, manus imposuerunt, & pro illis precati sunt, ut reciperent Spiritum Sanctum. Etiam eidem Pastori manus impositae fuêre aliquando saepius nempe cum ad Ministerium novum mitteretur. Finis autem Impositionis manuum semper idem fuit, personae ad munus Pastorale electae designatio exacta & Religiosa. Apostoli manus imposuerunt (Act. 6, 6.) Septem Diaconis, non ut reciperent Spiritum Sanctum; nam Spiritu Sancto pleni erant, antequam eligerentur, ut constat ex vers. 3, sed ut ad munus Diaconorum designarentur.

Presbytery Laid their Hands on Timothy, as we read 1 Tim. 4. 14. [412]but this is to be understood, as that some did it by the appointment of the Presbytery, and most likely[412] their προεστώς,[dq] or Prolocutor,[dr] which it may be was St. Paul himself. For in his 2 Epist. to Tim. ver. 6.[ds] he saith to him, Stirre up the gift of God which is in thee, by the Laying on of my Hands: where note by the way, that by the [413]Holy Ghost,[dt] is not meant[413] the third Person in the Trinity, but the [414]Gifts necessary to the Pastorall Office.[414] We read also, that St. Paul had Imposition of Hands twice; once from Ananias at Damascus [Acts 9. 17, 18.] at the time of his Baptisme; and again [Acts 13. 3.] at Antioch, when he was °first° sent out to Preach. The use then of this ceremony °considered° in the Ordination of Pastors, was to design[du] the Person to whom they gave such Power. [415]But if there had been then any Christian, that had had the Power of Teaching before; the Baptizing of him, that is, the making him a Christian, had given him no new Power, but had onely caused him to preach true Doctrine, that is, to use his Power aright; and therefore the Imposition of Hands had been unnecessary; Baptisme it selfe had been sufficient. But every Soveraign, before Christianity, had the power of Teaching, and Ordaining Teachers; and therefore Christianity gave them no new Right, but only directed them in the way of teaching Truth; and consequently they needed no Imposition of Hands (besides that which is done in Baptisme) to authorize them to exercise any part of the Pastorall Function, as namely, to Baptize, and Consecrate.[415] And in the Old Testament, though the Priest only had right to Consecrate, during the time that the Soveraignty was in the °High° Priest; yet it was not so [416]when the Soveraignty was in the[416] King: For we read [1 Kings 8.] That Solomon Blessed the People, Consecrated the Temple, and pronounced [417]that Publique Prayer, which is the pattern now for Consecration of all Christian Churches, and Chappels:[417] whereby it appears, he had [418]not only the right[418] of Ecclesiasticall Government; but also of exercising [419] Ecclesiasticall Functions.

[412] How did the presbytery lay on hands? When the presbytery does this, it is to be understood that it was done by the hands of [413] gift of God is not meant the Holy Spirit, [414] divine gifts conferred on Timothy.

[415] To a man, therefore, who had had the power of teaching and baptizing before hands were laid upon him, the imposition of hands could not have contributed anything, except the power to teach the Christian faith. Certainly those who were sovereigns over their commonwealths before they became Christians received no new power from the imposition of hands. [416] after the people had begun to be under a

[dp] The awkward sequence of tenses here is not entirely untypical of Hobbes; but it is possible that 'facit' ('does') was a scribal or compositorial error for 'fecit' ('did').

[dt] This reference is puzzling, as the phrase just quoted was 'gift of God', not 'Holy Ghost'; cf. the Latin, which seems to correct this. But if 'where' refers to 2 Tim. 1 more generally, Hobbes may have had in mind the next verse, which says that God has 'given us the spirit . . . of power, and of love', and v. 14: 'That good thing which was committed unto thee keep by the Holy Ghost which dwelleth in us.'

The Civill Soveraigne if a Christian, is head of the Church in his own Dominions.

[420] From this consolidation[dy] of the Right Politique, and Ecclesiastique [421]in Christian Soveraigns, it is evident, they have all manner of[421] Power over their Subjects, that can be given [422]to man, for the government of mens externall actions,[422] both in Policy,[dz] and Religion; °and may make such Laws, as themselves shall judge fittest, for the government of their own Subjects, both as they are the Common-wealth, and as they are the Church: for both State, and Church are the same men.° [300]

[420] ^ But (someone will say) what if the sovereignty belongs to a woman? Does a woman have the power to preach in churches and administer the sacraments? I know that women were forbidden to speak in church.[dv] But that certainly does not prevent a woman endowed with sovereign power from being able to appoint men who can both speak and administer all other matters in the churches by the authority of the commonwealth – that is, by her authority. For authority is not distinguished as male or female. Therefore women, even if they cannot exercise all offices, can nevertheless appoint those who shall exercise them. In the first year of her reign, when she had asserted her right to the supremacy over the English Church, Queen Elizabeth passed a law whereby all church ministers (if they wished to keep their benefices) had to recognize, on oath, her ecclesiastical supremacy.[dw] Many therefore took the oath; many also refused for some time, merely because they thought that if they took it, it would appear that the Queen was able, through them, to administer sacraments in the Church, and that she herself could exercise other pastoral functions. But when the Queen gave a public written promise that she would not do so,[dx] they did then finally take the oath. As this scruple clearly showed, all those ministers were of the opinion that the authority to exercise pastoral functions is indeed always united with the supremacy over the Church, but that the exercise of those functions is suitable only for men. Therefore the Queen not only refrained from exercising such functions, but also entrusted, by her warrant, all the care of ecclesiastical matters to the convocation of bishops, together with a few of her counsellors.

[421] , Christian kings have all the [dw] The Act of Supremacy of 1559 (1 Eliz. c. 1) required clergymen, and holders of public office, to take the Oath of Supremacy, which described the Queen as 'Supreme Governor' in both temporal and spiritual matters.

[dx] This probably refers to the 'Injunctions for Religion' issued by Elizabeth in the summer of 1559, which said that the Oath did not imply that the kings or queens of England 'may challenge [sc. claim] the authority and power of ministry of divine offices in the church' (Hughes and Larkin, eds., Tudor Royal Proclamations, ii, p. 130).

If they please therefore, [423]they may (as many Christian Kings now doe) commit the government of their Subjects in matters of Religion to the Pope; but then the Pope is in that point Subordinate to them, and exerciseth that Charge in anothers Dominion[423] Iure Civili, in the Right of the Civill Soveraign; not Iure Divino, in Gods Right; and may therefore be discharged of that Office, [424]when the Soveraign for the good of his Subjects shall think it necessary. They may also if they please, commit the care of Religion to one Supreme Pastor, or to an Assembly of Pastors; and give them what power over the Church, or one over another, they think most convenient;[ea] and what titles of honor, as of Bishops, Archbishops, Priests, or Presbyters, they will; and make such Laws for their maintenance, either by Tithes, or otherwise, as they please, so they[424] doe it out of a sincere conscience, of which God onely is the Judge. It is the Civill Soveraign, that is to appoint °Judges, and° Interpreters of the [425]Canonicall[425] Scriptures; for it is [426]he[426] that maketh them Laws. It is he also that giveth strength to Excommunications; [427]which but for such Laws and Punishments,[427] as may humble obstinate Libertines,[eb] and reduce them to union with the rest of the Church, °would bee contemned.° In summe, he hath the Supreme Power in all [428]causes,[428] as well Ecclesiasticall, as Civill, as far as concerneth actions, and words, for those onely [429]are known, and may be accused; and of that which cannot be accused,[429] there is no Judg at all, but God, °that knoweth the heart. And these Rights are incident to all Soveraigns, whether Monarchs, or Assemblies: for they that are the Representants of a Christian People, are Representants of the Church: for a Church, and a Common-wealth of Christian People, are the same thing.°

The first book.

Of five Books he hath written of this subject, the first containeth three Questions: One, Which is °simply° the best [433] government, Monarchy, Aristocracy, or Democracy; and concludeth for neither, but for a [434] government mixt of all three: Another, which of these is the best Government of the Church; and concludeth for the mixt, but which should most participate of Monarchy: The third, whether in this mixt Monarchy, St. Peter had the place of Monarch.[ef] Concerning his first Conclusion, I have already sufficiently proved (chapt. 18.) that [435]all Governments, which men are bound to obey, are[435] Simple, and Absolute.[eg] In Monarchy there is but One Man [436]Supreme;[436] and all other men that have any kind of Power °in the State,° have it by his Commission, during his pleasure; and execute it in his name: And in Aristocracy, and Democracy, but One Supreme Assembly, [301] with the same Power that in Monarchy belongeth to the Monarch, which is not a Mixt, but an Absolute Soveraignty. [437] And of the three [438] sorts, which is the best, is not to be disputed, where any one of them is already established; but the present ought alwaies to be preferred, maintained, and accounted best; because it is against both the Law of Nature, and the Divine positive Law, [439] to doe any thing tending to the subversion thereof. Besides, it maketh nothing to[eh] the Power of any Pastor, (unlesse he have the °Civill° Soveraignty,) what kind of [440]Government[440] is the best; because their Calling is not to govern men by Commandement, but [441] to teach them, and perswade them by Arguments, and leave it to them to consider, whether they shall embrace, or reject the Doctrine taught.[441] For Monarchy, Aristocracy, and Democracy, do mark out unto us three sorts of Soveraigns, not of Pastors; or, as we may say, three sorts of Masters °of Families,° not three sorts of Schoolmasters °for their children.°

[433] ^ of the three kinds of [434] ^ fourth
[435] in every type of commonwealth that men can be bound to obey, the sovereignty is not mixed, but [436] that has the power of the whole commonwealth;
[437] ^ Besides, it is evident that if a monarchy could be called mixed, some monarch too could be called mixed; but this is absurd. [438] ^ previously mentioned simple [439] ^ for a citizen [440] commonwealth [441] by teaching and arguments.

Librorum quinque quos de hac re scripsit, primus tres continet Quaestiones: unam, specierum Regiminis trium, Monarchiae, Aristocratiae, Democratiae quaenam sit optima. Concludit autem nullam harum optimam esse, sed quartam ab his mixtam. Secundam, quaenam harum regendae Ecclesiae sit optima, & sententiam fert pro Mixta, sed quae magis participaret de Monarchia. Tertiam, utrum in hac Monarchia Mixta, Monarchae locum haberet Sanctus Petrus.[ef] Quod ad primam Conclusionem attinet, satis (Cap. 18) supra demonstratum est, quod in omni forma Civitatis, cui obedire homines obligari possunt, Imperium Summum Simplex, & Absolutum, non Mixtum [261] sit.[eg] In Monarchia enim unus Homo totius Civitatis Potestatem habet, & proinde quamcunque alius Potestatem adeptus sit, eam adeptus est Iure illius, & quamdiu illi videbitur, possidebit, & in illius nomine Potestate sua uti debet. Etiam in Aristocratia & Democratia unicum esse Coetum Supremum, eumque eandem habere Potestatem, quam habet in Monarchia Monarcha; & proinde non mixtum Imperium, sed Absolutum. Praeterea manifestum est, si Monarchia aliqua Mixta dici posset, etiam Monarcha aliquis dici posset Mixtus. Hoc autem absurdum est. De tribus autem speciebus Simplicibus antedictis, quaenam sit optima, in eo loco in quo earum una constituta jam sit, disputare nefas est; propterea quòd ea, quae constituta est, caeteris omnibus anteferri, defendi, & optima appellari debet; quia is Civis, qui aliquid faceret, quod ad subversionem ejus tenderet, tum Leges Naturae, tum Leges Divinas positivas violaret. Praeterea ad Potestatem Pastoris, Imperium non habentis, quae forma Civitatis optima sit, non pertinet inquirere; cum vocentur Pastores, non ut homines regerent Imperio, sed doctrina, & argumentis. Monarchia enim, Aristocratia, & Democratia, Imperantium, non Pastorum species denotant; vel tres Dominos, non tres Ludimagistros.

[ef] Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 3, 'De summo pontifice', bk. 1, addresses these three questions as follows: (1) chs. 1–4; (2) chs. 5–9; (3) chs. 10–28. Hobbes's summary of Bellarmino's answer to (1) is not correct; in ch. 3 Bellarmino says that monarchy mixed with aristocracy and democracy is 'more profitable' or 'more expedient' ('vtilius') because of the corruption of human nature (i, p. 620), and in ch. 4 he says that, taken simply, pure monarchy is best (i, p. 621).

[eg] Hobbes apparently refers to the argument in Ch. 18 that the rights of sovereignty cannot be divided (see pp. 278–81); cf. also the discussion in Ch. 19 of the three types of commonwealth (pp. 284–9). His main discussion of 'mixed monarchy', however, is in Ch. 29 (pp. 512–15).

[eh] = does not pertain to, is of no consequence to (OED, 'make', v.[1], 21.b; cf. the Latin: 'non pertinet').

And therefore the second Conclusion, concerning the best form of Government of the Church, is nothing to the question of the Popes Power without[ei] his own Dominions: For in [442]all[442] other Common-wealths his Power [443](if hee have any at all) is that of the Schoolmaster onely, and not of the Master of the Family.[443]

For the third Conclusion, which is, that St. Peter was Monarch of the Church, he bringeth for his chiefe argument the place of S. Matth. (chap. 16. 18, 19.)[ej] Thou art Peter, And upon this rock I will build my Church, [444]&c.[444] And I will give thee the keyes of Heaven; whatsoever thou shalt bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on Earth, shall be loosed in Heaven. Which place well considered, proveth no more, but that the Church of Christ hath for foundation one onely Article; namely, that which Peter in the name of all the Apostles professing, [445] gave occasion to our Saviour to speak the words here cited; which that wee may cleerly understand, we are to consider, that our Saviour preached by himself, by John Baptist, and by his Apostles, nothing but this Article of Faith, that he was the Christ; °all other Articles requiring faith no otherwise, than as founded on that.° John °began first,° (Mat. 3. 2.) preaching only this, The Kingdome of God is at hand. Then our Saviour himself (Mat. 4. 17.) preached the same: And to his Twelve Apostles, when he gave them their Commission (Mat. 10. 7.) [446]there is no mention of preaching any other Article but that.[446] This was the fundamentall Article, that is the Foundation of the [447]Churches[447] Faith. Afterwards the Apostles being returned to him, [448] he asketh them all, (Mat. 16. 13.) not Peter onely, [449]Who men said he was;[449] and they answered, that some said he was Iohn the Baptist, some Elias, and others Ieremias, or one of the Prophets: Then (ver. 15.) he asked them all again, (not Peter onely) Whom say yee that I am? Therefore S. Peter answered (for them all) Thou art Christ, the Son of the Living God; which I said is the Foundation of the Faith of the whole Church; from which our Saviour takes the occasion [302] of saying, [450] Vpon this stone I will build my Church: By which it is manifest, that by the Secunda ergò Conclusio, de optima specie Regiminis Ecclesiae, ad quaestionem de Potestate Pontificis Romani, extra Dominium ejus temporale, nihil omnino attinet. In Dominiis enim Civitatum aliarum, merè Pastoritium est.

Ad tertiam Conclusionem probandam nempè Sanctum Petrum Ecclesiae fuisse Monarcham, adducit inprimis locum S. Matth. 16. 18, 19:[ej] Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram aedificabo meam Ecclesiam: & portae inferorum non superabunt eam. Et tibi dabo Claves regni coelorum: & quicquid ligaveris in terra, erit ligatum in coelis: & quicquid solveris in terra, erit solutum in coelis. Qui locus rectè intellectus, nihil aliud probat, nisi Ecclesiam Christi pro fundamento unicum habere Articulum Fidei, quem Sanctus Petrus, nomine Apostolorum hic professus est, nempe Iesum esse Christum; quae professio Servatori nostro ea verba dicendi occasionem praebuit. Quod ut clarius intelligatur, sciendum est, Servatorem nostrum per seipsum, per Iohannem Baptistam, & per Apostolos, nihil aliud de Fide praedicasse, praeterquam quod ipse esset Christus. Iohannes (Matth. 3. 2,) hoc solùm praedicavit Regnum Dei appropinquat. Idem Servator noster praedicavit ipse, Matth. 4. 17; & duodecem Apostolis in Mandatis dedit Matth. 10. 7 Servator noster; ut idem praedicarent. Articulus ille Fidei Christianae fundamentalis erat. Postquam igitur Apostoli à Praedicatione Articuli hujus ad Christum reversi [262] essent interrogavit illos Christus cunctos simul, (Matth. 16. 13) non Petrum solum, quemnam esse me dicunt homines, Filium Hominis? Illi vero dixerunt, Alii quidem Iohannem Baptistam, alii vero Eliam, alii vero Ieremiam, aut unum ex Prophetis. Tunc autem vers. 15 interrogavit illos simul omnes, non Petrum solum, Vos autem quem me dicitis esse? Itaque Sanctus Petrus pro omnibus respondit, Tu es Christus, Filius Dei viventis. Qui Articulus, ut dixi, Fidei totius Ecclesiae fundamentum est. Atque hinc occasionem coepit dicendi: Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram aedificabo meam Ecclesiam &c. Manifestum ergo est petram

[ej] Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 3, 'De summo pontifice', bk. 1, chs. 10–13. (Bellarmino's primary argument is based on this and another Gospel text, John 21: 15–17, which he discusses in chs. 14–16.)

Foundation-Stone of the Church, was meant [451] the Fundamentall Article of the Churches Faith. But why then (will some object) doth our Saviour interpose these words, Thou art Peter? °If the originall of this text had been rigidly translated, the reason would easily have appeared:° We are therefore to consider, that the Apostle Simon, was surnamed [452] Stone, (which is the signification of the Syriacke word Cephas, and of the Greek word Petrus). Our Saviour therefore after the confession of that Fundamentall Article, alluding to his name, said (as if it were in English) thus, Thou art Stone, and upon this Stone I will build my Church: which is as much as to say, this Article, that [453]I am[453] the Christ, is [454]the Foundation of all the Faith I require in those that are to bee members of my Church: Neither is this allusion to a name, an unusuall thing in common speech: But it had been a strange, and obscure speech, if our Saviour intending to build his Church on the Person of S. Peter, had said, thou art a Stone, and upon this Stone I will build my Church, when it was so obvious without ambiguity to have said, I will build my Church on thee; and yet there had been still the same allusion to his name.[454]

And for the following words, I will give thee the Keyes of Heaven, &c. [455]it is no more than what our Saviour gave also to all[455] the rest of his Disciples [Matth. 18. 18.] Whatsoever yee shall bind on Earth, shall be bound in Heaven. And whatsoever ye shall loose on Earth, shall be loosed in Heaven. But howsoever this be interpreted, there is no doubt but the Power here granted belongs to all [456]Supreme Pastors; such as are all Christian Civill Soveraignes in their own Dominions.[456] In so much, as if St. Peter, or our Saviour himself had converted any of them to [457]beleeve him, and to acknowledge his Kingdome;[457] yet because his Kingdome is not of this world, he had left the supreme care of converting his subjects to none but him; or else hee must have deprived him of the [458]Soveraignty,[458] to which the Right of Teaching is inseparably annexed. And thus much in refutation of his first Book, wherein hee would prove St. Peter to have been the Monarch [459]Universall of the Church, that is to say, of all the Christians in the world.[459]

13–14 S. Peter, had said] said Peter, to say MS 24 of them] man MS 26 none] one B

[451] ^ in that passage nothing other than [452] ^ by Christ [453] Jesus is [454] essential or fundamental to the faith which makes the Church Christian. For if he had wanted to appoint Peter King of the Church at that time, would it not have been very easy for him to say so explicitly?
[455] nothing more is given here to Peter than to [456] those who are sovereigns over their commonwealths, provided they are Christians.
[457] the Christian faith, [458] kingdom [or: kingship],

Ecclesiae fundamentalem aliam intellectam non esse eo loco, praeter Fidei Articulum illum fundamentalem. Sed quare (dicet aliquis) interponit Christus verba illa Tu es Petrus? Considerandum ergò est Apostolum cognominatum fuisse à Christo Cepham, id est, Graecè, petram, vel petrum, Latine Lapidem. Postquam igitur Articulum hunc Petrus confessus esset, Servator noster, ad nomen ejus alludens, dixit: Tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram aedificabo &c. tanquam diceret Articulum illum, Iesum esse Christum: Fidei per quam Ecclesia erat Christiana essentialem sive fundamentalem esse. Quod si Petrum tunc Ecclesiae Regem constituere voluisset, quam facilè fuisset verbis disertis id dixisse?

Proximis autem verbis, dabo tibi Claves coelorum &c. nil amplius Petro quam caeteris Discipulis datum est, Matth. 18. 18 Quicquid ligaveritis in terra, ligabitur in coelo, & quicquid solveritis in terra, solvetur in coelo. Sed utcunque locum hunc interpretetur, dubium nullum est, quin Potestas hoc loco data pertineat ad eos omnes, qui Summam in Civitatibus suis Potestatem habent modo Christiani sint. Adeo ut Sanctus Petrus, vel etiam Servator noster ipse, si aliquem eorum ad Fidem Christianam convertisset; quia tamen Regnum Christi non est hujus mundi, convertendi subditos proprios summam curam[ek] illi soli reliquisset; alioqui Regno illum privâsset, cui Docendi jus adhaeret inseparabiliter. Haec ergo sufficiant ad refutationem libri hujus primi, in quo probare conatus est Monarcham Ecclesiae universalis, id est, Christianorum fuisse Sanctum Petrum.

The second Book.

The second Book hath two Conclusions: One, that S. Peter was Bishop of Rome, and there dyed: The other, that the Popes of Rome are his Successors. Both which [460]have been disputed by others.[460 el] But supposing them true; yet if by Bishop of Rome, bee understood either the Monarch of the Church, or the Supreme Pastor of [461]it;[461] not Silvester, but Constantine[em 462](who was the first Christian Emperour)[462] was that Bishop; and as Constantine, so all other Christian Emperors were of Right °supreme° Bishops of the Roman Empire; I say of the Roman Empire, not of all Christendome: For [463]other Christian Soveraigns had the same Right in their severall Territories, as to an Office essentially adhaerent to their Soveraignty.[463] Which shall serve for answer to his second Book. [303]

The third Book.

In the third Book, he handleth the question whether the Pope be Antichrist.[en] For my part, I see no argument that proves he is so, °in that sense the Scripture useth the name: nor will I take any argument from the quality of Antichrist, to contradict the Authority he exerciseth, or hath heretofore exercised in the Dominions of any other Prince, or State.°

It is evident that the Prophets of the Old Testament foretold, and the Jews expected a Messiah, that is, a Christ, that should re-establish amongst them the kingdom of God, which had been rejected °by them in the time of Samuel, when they required a King after the manner of other Nations.° This expectation of theirs, made them obnoxious[eo] to the Imposture of [464]all such, as had both the ambition to attempt the attaining of the Kingdome, and the art to deceive[464] the People by counterfeit miracles, by hypocriticall life, or by orations and doctrine plausible. Our Saviour therefore, and his Apostles forewarned men [465]of[465] False Prophets, and °of° False Christs. False Christs,

Liber secundus duas habet conclusiones: Alteram Sanctum Petrum Romae fuisse Episcopum, atque ibi mortuum esse: Alteram, Successores illius esse Pontifices Romanos. Quarum utraque quasi dubia hodie disputatur.[el] Sed si utramque veram esse, concesserimus; si tamen per Episcopum Romanum, Monarcham Ecclesiae, sive Pastorem omnium Supremum intelligat, non Sylvester, sed Constantinus Magnus[em] Monarcha ille erat; & ut Constantinus, ita etiam Imperatores Christiani [263] omnes, Imperii Romani Episcopi Iure erant; Romani (inquam) Imperii, non totius orbis Christiani. In Libro tertio Quaestionem tractat, an Papa sit Antichristus.[en] Quod Papa sit Antichristus, equidem probatum nusquam vidi. Manifestum autem est, Prophetas Veteris Testamenti praedixisse, Iudaeosque Messiam, id est Christum, venturum esse, ut Regnum Dei (quod rejectum fuerat) restitueret, expectâsse. Expectatio autem illa, Imposturis ambitiosorum hominum, qui regnare conarentur, quique populum per Miracula falsa, per vitam hypocriticam vel per orationes & doctrinas blandas, decipiendi artem calluerunt, eos obnoxios reddidit. Propter hanc causam Servator noster & Apostoli populum monuerunt ne Prophetis & Christis falsis, temerè crederent. Falsus autem Christus intelligebatur is qui se Christum esse, cum non esset are such as pretend to be the Christ, but are not, and [466]are called properly[466] Antichrists, in such sense, as when there happeneth a Schisme [467]in the Church by the election of two Popes, the one calleth the other Antipapa, or the false Pope.[467] And therefore Antichrist °in the proper signification° hath two essentiall marks; One, that he denyeth Jesus to be Christ; and another that he professeth himselfe to bee Christ.[ep] The first Mark is set down by S. Iohn in his 1 Epist. 4. ch. 3. ver. Every Spirit that confesseth not that Iesus Christ is come in the flesh, is not of God; And [468]this is the Spirit[468] of Antichrist. The other Mark is expressed in the words of our Saviour, (Mat. 24. 5.) Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ[469]; and again, If any man shall say unto you, Loe, here is Christ, there is Christ, beleeve it not.[eq] And therefore Antichrist must be a False Christ, that is, some one of them that shall pretend themselves to be Christ[470]. And out of these two Marks, to deny Iesus to be the Christ, and to affirm himselfe to be the Christ, it followeth, that he must also be an Adversary of °Iesus° the true Christ, °which is another usuall signification of the word Antichrist.° But of these many Antichrists, there is one speciall one, ὁ Ἀντίχριστος, The Antichrist, or Antichrist definitely, as one certaine person; not indefinitely an Antichrist. Now seeing the Pope of Rome, neither pretendeth himself, nor denyeth Jesus to bee the Christ, I perceive not how he can be called Antichrist; by which word is not meant, one that °falsely° pretendeth to be His Lieutenant, or Vicar generall, but to be Hee. There is also some Mark [471]of the time of this speciall Antichrist, as (Mat. 24. 15.)[er] when that abominable Destroyer, spoken of by Daniel, * shall stand in the Holy place, and such tribulation as was not since the beginning of the world, nor ever shall be again, insomuch as if it were to last long, (ver. 22.) no flesh could be saved; but for the elects sake those days shall be shortened (made fewer).[471] But that tribulation is not yet come; for it is to be followed immediately °(ver. 29.)° by a darkening of the Sun [472]and Moon, a falling of the Stars, a concussion[es] of the Heavens, and the glorious coming again of our Saviour in the cloudes.[472] And [304] therefore The Antichrist is not yet come;[et] whereas, many Popes are both come and gone. It is true, the Pope in taking upon him to give Laws [473]to all Christian Kings, and Nations, usurpeth a Kingdome in this world, which Christ took not on him: but[473] he doth it not as Christ, but as for Christ, wherein there is nothing of The Antichrist.

The fourth Book.

In the fourth Book, to prove the Pope to be the supreme Judg in all questions of Faith and Manners, (which is as much as to [474]be the[474] absolute Monarch of all Christians in the world,) he bringeth three Propositions: The first, that his Judgments are Infallible: The second, that [475] he can make very[eu] Laws, and punish those that observe them not: The third, that our Saviour conferred all Jurisdiction Ecclesiasticall on the Pope of Rome.[ev]

Texts for the Infallibility of the Popes Judgement in points of Faith.

For the Infallibility of his Judgments, he alledgeth[ew] [476] the Scriptures: and first, that of Luke 22. 31.[ex] Simon, Simon, Satan hath desired you that hee may sift you as wheat; but I have prayed for thee, that thy faith faile not; and when thou art converted, strengthen thy Brethren. This, according to Bellarmines exposition, is, that Christ gave here to Simon Peter two priviledges: one, that neither °his Faith should fail, nor the Faith of any of his successors: the other, that neither° he, nor any of his successors should ever define any point concerning Faith, or Manners erroneously, or contrary to the definition[ez] of a former Pope:[fa] [477]Which is a strange, and very much strained interpretation. But he that with attention readeth that chapter, shall find there is no place in the whole Scripture, that maketh more against the Popes Authority, than this very place.[477] The Priests and Scribes seeking to kill our Saviour at the Passeover, and Judas possessed with a resolution to betray him, [478]and the day of killing the Passeover[fb] being come, our Saviour[478] celebrated the same with his Apostles, which he said, till the Kingdome of God was come hee would doe no more; and withall told them, that one of them was to betray him: [479]Hereupon they questioned, which of them it should be; and withall (seeing the next Passeover their Master would celebrate should be when he was King)[479] entred into a contention, who should then be the greatest man[480]. Our Saviour therefore told them, that the Kings of the Nations had Domin-

Peter answered [486](as one that no more expected any authority in this world)[486] Lord I am ready to goe with thee, not onely [305] to Prison, but to Death. Whereby it is manifest, S. Peter had not onely no jurisdiction given him °in this world,° but a charge[fd] to teach all the other Apostles, that they also should have none. And for the Infallibility of St. Peters sentence definitive[fe] in matter of Faith, there is [487]no more[487] to be attributed to it out of this Text, [488]than that Peter should continue in the beleef of this point, namely, that Christ should come again, and possesse the Kingdome at the day of Judgement; which was not given by this Text to all his Successors; for wee see they claime it in the World that now is.[488]

The second place[ff] is that of Matth. 16. Thou art Peter, and upon this rocke I will build my Church, and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it. By which (as I have already shewn in this chapter) is proved no more, than that the gates of Hell shall not prevail against the confession of Peter, °which gave occasion to that speech; namely this,° that Iesus is Christ the Sonne of God.

The third Text[fg] is Iohn 21. ver. 16, 17. Feed my sheep; which contains no more but a Commission of Teaching: [489]And if we grant the rest of the Apostles to be contained in that name of Sheep; then it is the supreme Power of Teaching: but it was onely for the time that there were no Christian Soveraigns already possessed of that Supremacy. But I have already proved, that Christian Soveraignes are in their owne Dominions the supreme Pastors, and instituted thereto, by vertue of their being Baptized, though without other Imposition of Hands. For such Imposition being a Ceremony of designing[fh] the person, is needlesse, when hee is already designed[fi] to the Power of Teaching what Doctrine he will, by his institution to an Absolute Power over his Subjects. For as I have proved before, Soveraigns are supreme Teachers (in generall) by their Office; and therefore oblige themselves (by their Baptisme) to teach the Doctrine of Christ: And when they suffer others to teach their people, they doe it at the perill of their own souls; for it is at the hands of the Heads of Families that God will require the account of the instruction of his Children and Servants. It is of Abraham himself, not of a hireling, that God saith (Gen. 18. 19.) I know him that he will command his Children, and his houshold after him, that they keep the way of the Lord, and do justice and judgement.[489]

The fourth place is that of Exod. 28. 30. Thou shalt put in the Breastplate of Iudgment, the Vrim and the Thummin[490]: which hee saith is interpreted by the Septuagint δήλωσιν καὶ ἀλήθειαν, that is, Evidence[fj] and Truth: And thence concludeth, [491]God had given Evidence, and Truth, (which is almost Infallibility,) to the High Priest.[fk] But be it Evidence and Truth it selfe that was given; or be it but Admonition to the Priest to endeavour to inform himself cleerly, and give judgment uprightly; yet in that it was given to the High Priest, it was given to the Civill Soveraign: For such next under God was the High Priest in the Common-wealth of Israel; and is an argument [306] for Evidence and Truth, that is, for the Ecclesiasticall Supremacy of Civill Soveraigns over their own Subjects, against the pretended Power of the Pope. These are all the Texts hee bringeth for the Infallibility of the Judgement of the Pope, in point of Faith.[491]

Textus tertius[fg] est ex Ioh. 21, 16, 17: Pasce oves meas. Hoc autem non Imperandi, sed docendi Mandatum est, idque tamdiu tantùm, quamdiu Rex Christianus non esset, qui Potestatem illam Potestati Civili adjunctam haberet. Locus quartus est Exod. 28, 30: Pones in sacro illo Pectorali juris, Vrim & Thummim, quae sint supra cor Aaronis: quem locum à Septuaginta redditum esse dicit, per δήλωσιν καὶ ἀλήθειαν, id est, Evidentiam & Veritatem, Inde autem concludit Sacerdoti Summo datam esse Lucem & Veritatem.[fk] Quicquid autem significant Vrim & Thummim, manifestum tamen est ex eo Textu, data ea esse Sacerdoti Summo, id est illi, qui Summam in Civitate Israelitarum habuit Potestatem. But whatever the meaning of 'Urim' and 'Thummim', it is nevertheless evident from the text that they were given to the high priest, that is, to him who was the sovereign over the commonwealth of the Israelites. This text therefore militates in favour of the civil sovereign, against the supremacy of the Roman pontiff.

Texts for the same in point of Manners.

For the Infallibility of his Judgment concerning Manners, hee bringeth °one Text, which is that of° Iohn 16. 13. When the Spirit of truth is come, hee will lead you into all truth: [492]where (saith he) by all truth, is meant, at least, all truth necessary to salvation.[fl] But with this mitigation, he attributeth no more Infallibility to the Pope, than to any man that professeth Christianity, and is not to be damned: For if any man erre in any point, wherein not to erre is necessary to Salvation, it is impossible he should be saved; for that onely is necessary to Salvation, without which to be saved is impossible. What points these are, I shall declare out of the Scripture in the Chapter following. In this place I say no more, but that though it were granted,[492] the Pope could not possibly [493]teach[493] any error at all, yet doth not this entitle him to any Jurisdiction in the Dominions of another Prince, °unlesse we shall also say, a man is obliged in conscience to set on work upon all occasions the best workman, even then also when he hath formerly promised his work to another.°

[494]Besides the Text, he argueth from[494] Reason, thus. If the Pope could erre in [495]necessaries,[495] then Christ hath not sufficiently provided for the Churches Salvation; because he hath commanded [496]her[496] to follow the Popes directions.[fm] But [497]this Reason is invalid, unlesse he shew when, and[497] where Christ commanded that, or took at all any notice of a Pope: Nay granting whatsoever was given to S. Peter, was given to the Pope; yet seeing there is in the Scripture no command to any man to obey St. Peter, no man can bee just, that obeyeth him, when his commands are contrary to [498]those of his lawfull Soveraign.[498]

[492] .When he has taken away from kings all judgements of both faith and behaviour, is there anything at all left for kings to do? What laws will they make, since there is no law that is not either a rule of behaviour (such as the rule that no one should commit murder, or theft, or adultery, or tell falsehoods, or be covetous, and the like), or a rule of faith, and of divine worship? But let us consider the words of the text, 'the spirit of truth will lead you into all truth': is it right to infer from this that only the Pope has the right to judge the behaviour of the citizens of someone else's commonwealth? What do truth and behaviour have in common? Truth is a matter only of words, but behaviour concerns men living under laws. The supreme pontiff can certainly teach behaviour, that is, as to whether it is good or bad; but he must not judge it, except in his own dominion. Even if it were true that

Ut probet Iudicia Pontificis circa Mores Infallibilia esse, locum citat Ioh. 16, 13: Cum autem venerit ille Spiritus Veritatis, Dux viae vobis erit in omnem veritatem.[fl] Cum Iudicia omnia tum Fidei, tum Morum Regibus sustulerit, quid habent omninò, quod faciant Reges? Mores doceri quidem possunt à Summo Pontifice, sed an Boni, an Mali sint; nisi in suo ipsius Dominio, judicare non debet. Etiamsi verum esset, non posse omnino errare Papam, id tamen jus Iudicandi in Civitatibus alienis nullum contribueret. Deinde à ratione naturali pro Infallibilitate Papae arguit sic: Si Papa in rebus ad salutem necessariis errare posset, tunc ad Salutem Ecclesiae non satis à Christo provisum est; propterea quod doctrinam Papae sequi nobis imperavit.[fm] Ubi autem Christus id jusserit, aut omnino de Papa locutus sit, non ostendit. Lastly, it hath not been declared by the Church, nor by the Pope himselfe, that he is the Civill Soveraign of all the Christians in the world; and therefore all Christians are not bound to acknowledge his Jurisdiction in point of Manners. For the Civill Soveraignty, and supreme Judicature in controversies of Manners, are the same thing: [499]And the Makers of Civill Laws, are not onely Declarers, but also Makers of the justice, and injustice of actions; there being nothing in mens Manners that makes them righteous, or unrighteous, but their conformity with the Law of the Soveraign. And therefore when the Pope challengeth[fn] Supremacy in controversies of Manners, hee teacheth men to disobey the Civill Soveraign; which is an erroneous Doctrine, contrary to the many precepts of our Saviour and his Apostles, delivered to us in the Scripture.[499]

To prove the Pope has Power to make Laws[500], he alledgeth[fo] °many places; as first,° Deut. 17. 12.[fp] The man that [501]will doe presumptuously,[501] and will not hearken unto the Priest, (that [502]standeth to Minister there before[502] the Lord thy God, or unto the Iudge,) even that man [307] shall die, and thou shalt put away the evill from Israel. [503]For answer whereunto, we are to remember[503] that the High Priest °(next and immediately under God)° was the Civill Soveraign; and all Judges were to be constituted by him. The words alledged [504]sound[fq] therefore thus.[504] The man that will presume to disobey the Civill Soveraign °for the time being, or any of his Officers in the execution of their places,[fr] that man° shall die, &c. which is [505]cleerly for the Civill Soveraignty, against the Universall power of the Pope.[505]

Secondly, he alledgeth[fs] that of Matth. 16. [506] Whatsoever yee shall bind[507], &c. and interpreteth it [508]for such binding as is attributed (Matth. 23. 4.) to the Scribes and Pharisees, They bind heavy burthens, and grievous to be born, and lay them on mens shoulders; by which is meant (he sayes) Making of Laws; and concludes thence, that the Pope can make Laws.[ft] But this also maketh onely for the Legislative power of Civill Soveraigns: For the Scribes, and Pharisees sat in Moses Chaire,[fv] but Moses next under God was Soveraign of the People of Israel: and therefore our Saviour commanded them to doe all that they should say, but not all that they should do. That is, to obey their Laws, but not follow their Example.[508]

Postremò, Papam Potestatem habere Summam per totum orbem Christianum in rebus Civilibus, neque Papa, neque Ecclesia definivit. Non ergo obligantur Iurisdictionem ejus, in rebus Moralibus agnoscere omnes Christiani. Imperium enim Civile Summum, & suprema de controversiis Moralibus Iudicatio eadem est res: imo Reges non modò, quid sit Iustum & Injustum in Actionibus definiunt, sed etiam Iustitiam ipsam per Leges suas faciunt; Iustitia autem & Injustitia ad Moralia pertinent. Neque Iustum, aut Injustum in Moribus quicquam est, nisi id quod ita factum est per Leges Civiles.

Ut Papam Potestatem habere in Civitatibus alienis Legislativam probet, adducit locum Deut. 17. 12:[fp] Vir autem ille, qui fecit superbè, ut non auscultet Sacerdoti constanter Ministranti Iehovae Deo tuo aut Iudici; utique morietur vir ille, & tolles malum illud ex Israele; oblitus, quod Summus Sacerdos Summam tunc haberet Potestatem Civilem, Iudicesque sub se constitueret. Nihil aliud ergò probant verba illa, nisi, quod Vir ille, qui Summo Imperanti Civili obedire recusaverit, morietur &c. Id quod conclusioni Bellarmini directè contrarium est.

Secundo, adducit Textum Matth. 16. 21.[ft] Quicquid ligaveris in terra &c. & ita interpretatur, ac si Potestas illa ligandi, esset Potestas Legislativa;[fu] quam Potestatem locus hic attribuit Potestati Civili. The third place,[fw] is Iohn 21. 16. Feed my sheep; which is not [509]a Power to make Laws, but a command to Teach. Making Laws belongs to the Lord of the Family; who by his owne discretion chooseth his Chaplain, as also a Schoolmaster to Teach his children.[509]

The fourth place[fx] Iohn 20. 21. is against him. The words are, As my Father sent me, so send I you. But our Saviour was sent [510] to Redeem (by his Death) such as should Beleeve[511]; and by his own, and his Apostles preaching to prepare them for their entrance into his [512]Kingdome; which he himself saith, is not of this world,[fy] and hath taught us to pray for the coming of it hereafter, though hee refused (Acts 1. 6, 7.) to tell his Apostles when it should come; and in which, when it comes, the twelve Apostles shall sit on twelve Thrones (every one perhaps as high as that of St. Peter) to judge the twelve tribes of Israel.[512] [fz] Seeing then God the Father sent not our Saviour to make Laws in this present world, [513]wee may conclude from the Text, that neither did our Saviour send S. Peter to make Laws here, but to perswade men to expect his second comming with a stedfast faith; and in the mean time, if Subjects, to obey their Princes; and if Princes, both to beleeve it themselves, and to do their best to make their Subjects doe the same; which is the Office of a Bishop.[513] Therefore this place maketh °most strongly° for the joining of the Ecclesiasticall Supremacy to the Civill Soveraignty, contrary to that which Cardinall Bellarmine alledgeth it for.

The fift place is Acts 15. 28.[ga] It hath seemed good to the Holy Spirit, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden, than these necessary things, that yee abstaine from meats offered to Idols, and from bloud, and from things strangled, and from fornication. Here hee notes the word Laying of burdens for the Legislative [308] Power.[gb] But [514]who is there, that reading this Text, can say, this stile of the Apostles may not as properly be used in giving Counsell, as in making Laws? The stile of a Law is, We command: But, We think good, is the ordinary stile of them, that but give Advice; and they lay a Burthen that give Advice, though it bee conditionall, that is, if they to whom they give it, will attain their ends: And such is the Burthen, of abstaining from things strangled, and from bloud; not absolute, but in case they will not erre. I have shewn before (chap. 25.) that Law, is distinguished from Counsell, in this, that the reason of a Law, is taken from the designe, and benefit of him that prescribeth it; but the reason of a Counsell, from the designe, and benefit of him, to whom the Counsell is given. But here, the Apostles aime onely at the benefit of the converted Gentiles, namely their Salvation; not at their own benefit; for having done their endeavour, they shall have their reward, whether they be obeyed, or not. And therefore the Acts of this Councell, were not Laws, but Counsells.[514]

15 benefit] benefit and designe MS

[514] although Bellarmino may know well enough how to write Latin, he has not sufficiently understood this passage – or, if he has understood it, he has knowingly misinterpreted those words in favour of the power of the Pope. What is imposed by law, if it is indeed a heavy imposition, can also be called, metaphorically, a burden. Also, when a doctor imposes a drug to be drunk by a sick person, if it is a heavy imposition, it can also be called a burden. What a law imposes is imposed for the good of the ruler, that is, for the public good; accordingly, the person on whom that burden is imposed is obliged to bear it, so far as he can. But what a doctor imposes is imposed for the good of the sick person only, and is nothing other than a condition suitable for the regaining of health, a condition which is called a burden if it is somewhat hard. And just like the precepts of doctors, the precepts of pastors, without civil authority, are not laws, but counsels; each of us is allowed to follow them or ignore them at his own risk. Now such was the burden that is spoken of in this text, namely, that converted Gentiles should abstain from eating those animals that had been sacrificed to idols, and from eating strangled things, and blood. But if eating blood is prohibited, and if that prohibition is a law, which we Christians are all obliged to observe, why is it that nowadays Christians commonly eat blood everywhere, even in Rome itself? Thus Bellarmino has not proved from this text that the acts of the Council of the Apostles are laws.

Locus quintus est Act. 15. 28:[ga] Visum est Spiritui Sancto & nobis, ne quod amplius imponeremus onus praeter necessaria ista, ut abstineatis ab iis quae sunt immolata simulacris, & sanguine, & suffocato & fornicatione. Ubi per onus imponere intelligit Potestatem Legislativam.[gb] Sed locum hunc Bellarminus, etsi Latinè scribere satis sciret, non satis intellexit, vel si intellexit, verbis illis ad Potestatem Pontificiam sciens abusus est. Quod Lege imponitur, si quidem grave sit, vocari etiam Onus potest per metaphoram. Etiam quod à Medico imponitur, aegrotanti bibendum Pharmacum, si grave sit, etiam Onus appellari potest. Quod Lex imponit, ad Bonum Imperantis, id est ad Bonum publicum imponitur; ideoque is, cui imponitur onus illud, perferre quatenus potest, obligatur. Sed quod à Medico imponitur, ad Bonum solius aegrotantis imponitur, neque aliud est, quam convalescentiae adipiscendae apposita Conditio, quae si duriuscula sit, appellatur onus. Et sicut praecepta Medicorum, ita quoque praecepta Pastorum, sine Authoritate Civili, Leges non sunt, sed consilia; quae sequi, vel negligere suo cujusque periculo permissum est. Tale autem erat Onus, de quo in hoc textu sermo est, nempe, quod Gentibus conversis ab esu eorum animalium, quae simulachris immolata erant, & ab esu suffocati, & sanguinis abstinendum erat. Sed si prohibeatur esus sanguinis, & prohibitio illa sit Lex, quam obligamur omnes Christiani custodire; quare hodie Christiani, ubique etiam in Roma ipsa, sanguinem vulgo comedunt. Apostolorum ergo Acta Concilii Leges esse, ex hoc textu Bellarminus non probavit.

The sixt place is that of Rom. 13. Let every Soul be subject to the Higher Powers, for there is no Power but of God; which is meant, he saith not onely of Secular, but also of Ecclesiasticall Princes.[gc] To which I answer, [515]first,[515] that there are no Ecclesiasticall Princes but those that are [516]also Civill Soveraignes; and their Principalities exceed not the compasse of their Civill Soveraignty; without those bounds though they may be received for Doctors, they cannot be acknowledged for Princes.[516] For if the Apostle had meant, we should be subject both to our own Princes, and also to the Pope, [517]he had taught us a doctrine,[517] which Christ himself hath told us is impossible, namely, to serve two Masters[518].[gd] And though [519]the Apostle[519] say in another place, I write these things being absent, lest being present I should use sharpnesse, according to the Power which the Lord hath given me;[ge] it is not, that he challenged[gf] a Power either to put to death, imprison, banish, whip, or fine any of them, °which are Punishments;° but onely to Excommunicate, which (without the Civill Power) is no more but a leaving of their company, °and having no more to doe with them, than with a Heathen man, or a Publican;° which in many occasions [520]might be[520] a greater pain to the Excommunicant, than to the Excommunicate.

The seventh place[gg] is 1 Cor. 4. 21. Shall I come unto you with a Rod, or in love, and the spirit of lenity?[gh] But here again, [521]it is not the Power of a Magistrate to punish offenders, that is meant by a Rod; but onely the Power of Excommunication,[521] which is not in its owne nature a Punishment, but onely a Denouncing[gi] of punishment, [522]that Christ shall inflict, when he shall be in possession of his Kingdome, at the day of Judgment. Nor then also shall it bee properly a Punishment, as upon a Subject that hath broken the Law; but a Revenge, as upon an Enemy, or Revolter, that denyeth the Right of our Saviour to the Kingdome: And therefore this proveth not the Legislative Power of any Bishop, that has not also the Civill Power.[522] [309]

Locus sextus est Rom. 13. 1: Omnis anima Potestatibus supereminentibus subjecta esto: non enim est Potestas, nisi à Deo. Id quod intelligendum esse vult non solum de Principibus Secularibus, sed etiam de Ecclesiasticis.[gc] Ad quod pro responso, id quod saepe ante dictum est, referam, nimirum Principes Ecclesiasticos, praeter Principes Civitatum [268] nullos esse, nec fuisse unquam. Nam si Apostolus voluisset subditos nos, non solùm Principibus nostris esse, sed etiam Papae, qui est Princeps externus, imposuisset nobis Onus non solùm grave, sed etiam, quod Christus ipse pronuntiavit esse impossibile, nempe duobus Dominis simul servire.[gd] Quanquam autem Sanctus Paulus alicubi dicat, Scribo haec absens, ne praesens uterer acrimoniâ, juxta Potestatem quam mihi Christus dedit;[ge] non tamen intellexit Sanctus Paulus, Potestatem sibi datam esse, occidendi quenquam, aut incarcerandi, aut mittendi in exilium, aut flagellandi, aut pecuniâ mulctandi, sed tantùm excommunicandi, id est (sine Potestate Civili) Excommunicatum fugiendi; id quod saepenumerò Excommunicanti, quam Excommunicato gravius est.

Septimus locus,[gg] 1 Cor. 4, 21, Quid vultis? Cum virga veniam ad vos, an cum charitate, & spiritu lenitatis? Hic rursus loquitur Sanctus Paulus non de punitione, sed de Censura Ecclesiastica, quae sua natura poena non est, sed poenae in seculo venturo denuntiatio. The eighth place is, Timothy 3. 2.[gj] A Bishop must be the husband but of one wife, °vigilant, sober, &c.° which he saith was a Law.[gk] I thought that none could make a Law in the Church, but the Monarch of the Church, St. Peter. [523]But suppose this Precept made by the authority of St. Peter; yet I see no reason why to call it a Law, rather than an Advice, seeing Timothy was not a Subject, but a Disciple of S. Paul; nor the flock under the charge of Timothy, his Subjects in the Kingdome, but his Scholars in the Schoole of Christ: If all the Precepts he giveth Timothy, be Laws, why is not this also a Law, Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy healths sake?[gl] And why are not also the Precepts of good Physitians, so many Laws? but that it is not the Imperative manner of speaking, but an absolute Subjection to a Person, that maketh his Precepts Laws.[523]

[524]In like manner, the ninth place,[524] [gm] 1 Tim. 5. 19. Against an Elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three Witnesses, [525] is a wise Precept, but not a Law.

The tenth place[gn] is, Luke 10. 16. He that heareth you, heareth mee; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me. And there is no doubt, but he that despiseth °the Counsell of° those that are sent by Christ, despiseth °the Counsell of° Christ himself. But who are those °now° that are sent by Christ, but such as are ordained Pastors by lawfull Authority? and who are lawfully ordained, that are not ordained by the Soveraign Pastor? and who is [526]ordained by the Soveraign Pastor[526] in a Christian Common-wealth, that is not ordained by the °authority of the° Soveraign thereof? Out of this place therefore it followeth, that he which heareth his [527]Soveraign[527] being a Christian, heareth Christ; and hee that despiseth the Doctrine which his King [528]being a Christian, authorizeth, despiseth the Doctrine of Christ (which is not that which Bellarmine intendeth here to prove, but the contrary). But all this is nothing to a Law.[528] Nay more, a Christian King, [529] as a Pastor, and Teacher of his [530]Subjects,[530] makes not thereby his Doctrines Laws. [531]He cannot oblige men to beleeve; though as a Civill Soveraign he may make Laws suitable to his Doctrine, which may oblige men to certain actions, and sometimes to such as they would not otherwise do, and which he ought not to command; and yet when they are commanded, they are Laws; and the externall actions done in obedience to them, without the inward approbation, are the actions of the Soveraign, and not of the Subject, which is in that case but as an instrument, without any motion of his owne at all; because God hath commanded to obey them.[531]

[523] This text suggests the opposite, since Paul also had the same power. They will perhaps say that this precept was given to Paul by Peter. However, that will not make it a law, since Timothy was not the subject of either Paul or Peter, but rather a Disciple. [524] The ninth place is

The eleventh, is every place, where the Apostle for Counsell, putteth some word, [532]by which men use to signifie[532] Command; or calleth the following of [533]his[533] Counsell, by the name of Obedience. [534]And therefore they are alledged[gq] out of[534] 1 Cor. 11. 2. I commend you [535]for keeping my Precepts[535] as I delivered them to you.[gr] °The Greek is, I commend you for keeping those things I delivered to you, as I delivered them.° Which is far from signifying that [536]they[536] were Laws, or any [310] thing else, but good Counsell. And that of 1 Thess. 4. 2. You know what commandements we gave you: where the Greek word [537]is παραγγελίας ἐδώκαμεν, equivalent to παρεδώκαμεν, what wee delivered to you, as in the place next before alledged,[gs] which does not prove the Traditions[gt] of the Apostles, to be any more than Counsells; though as is said in the 8 verse, he that despiseth them, despiseth not man, but God: For our Saviour himself came not to Judge, that is, to be King in this world; but to Sacrifice himself for Sinners, and leave Doctors in his Church, to lead, not to drive men to Christ, who never accepteth forced actions, (which is all the Law produceth,) but the inward conversion of the heart; which is not the work of Laws, but of Counsell, and Doctrine.[537]

And that of 2 Thess. 3. 14. If any man Obey not our word by this Epistle, note that man, and have no company with him, that he may bee ashamed: [538] where from the word [539]Obey,[539] he would inferre, that this Epistle was a Law to the Thessalonians.[gv] The Epistles of the Emperours were indeed Laws.[gw] If therefore the Epistle of S. Paul were also a Law, [540]they were[540] to obey two Masters. But the word Obey, as it is in the Greek ὑπακούει, signifieth °hearkning to, or° putting in practice, not onely that which is Commanded by him that has [541]right to punish, but also that which is delivered in a way of[541] Counsell for our good; and therefore St. Paul [542]does not bid kill[542] him that disobeys, nor beat, nor imprison, nor amerce[gx] him, which Legislators may all do; °but avoid his company, that he may bee ashamed:° whereby it is evident, it was not the Empire of an Apostle, but his Reputation [543]amongst the Faithfull, which the Christians stood in awe of.[543]

[542] bids them not to treat as an enemy [543] , that made Christians stand in awe of their pastors.

Locus undecimus est Textus, in quocunque Apostolus pro Consilio, verbo utitur aliquo, quod Consilio cum Imperio sit commune; aut[gp] in quo Obedientiam vocat, Consilium alicujus sequi, ut 1 Cor. 11, 2, Laudo verò vos, fratres, quod omnia meministis, & sicut tradidi vobis traditiones retinetis.[gr] Quod ut significet, traditiones Pauli, Leges fuisse, aut aliud praeter Consilium, longè abest; & ut locus ille, 1 Thes. 4, 2, Nostis enim, quae Mandata dederimus vobis, ubi vox Graeca significat Traditiones; quae non Leges, sed Consilia sunt: & locus 2. Thes. 3, 14,[gu] Quod si quis non auscultet nostro per Epistolam sermoni, hunc notate: & ne commercium habete cum eo, ut erubescat. Neque ut inimicum ducite, sed admonete ut fratrem. Ubi à voce ὑπακούει probatum vellet, Thessalonicensibus Epistolam hanc fuisse Legem.[gv] Imperatorum sanè Epistolae Leges erant.[gw] Si ergo Lex etiam esset Epistola S. Pauli, obligaremur obedire duobus Dominis. Sed vox illa Graeca significat non modo imperata facere illius, qui potestatem habet puniendi, si non faciamus, sed etiam Consilium sequi illius, qui nobis ad bonum nostrum recte consulit. Paulus ergo illum, qui non auscultaverit, pro inimico haberi prohibet, sed admoneri tantùm, ut fratrem jubet; id est verberari, incarcerari, mulctari (quod Legislatoribus licitum est) prohibet. Ex quo manifestum est, id quod Christianos metuere Pastores suos fecit, non Apostoli Imperium, sed Existimationem ejus fuisse.

[gs] Hobbes assimilates the verb δίδωμι, to 'give' (ἐδώκαμεν, 'we gave'), to παραδίδωμι, to 'deliver', 'pass on' (παρεδώκαμεν, 'we delivered'), which was the verb used in 1 Cor. 11: 2 (παρέδωκα, 'I delivered'), apparently seeking thereby to reduce the significance of the 'παρ[α]-' prefix on παραγγελίας: the normal meaning of the stem-word ἀγγελία is 'message', but the normal meaning of παραγγελία is 'proclamation', 'command'. [gt] = instructions orally delivered (OED, 'tradition', n., 3.b). In the passage cited from 1 Cor. 11: 2, the Latin for 'Precepts' or 'things I delivered' is 'traditiones' in Beza.

The last place[gy] is that of Heb. 13. 17. Obey your Leaders, and submit your selves to them, for they watch for your souls, as they that must give account: And here also is intended by Obedience, a following of their Counsell: For the reason of our Obedience[544], is not drawn from the will and command of our Pastors, but from our own benefit, [545] as being the Salvation of our Souls °they watch for, and not for the Exaltation of their own Power, and Authority. If it were meant here, that all they teach were Laws, then not onely the Pope, but every Pastor in his Parish should have Legislative Power.° Again, they that are bound to obey [546]their Pastors, have no power to examine their commands. What then shall wee say to St. Iohn who[546] bids us (1 Epist. chap. 4. ver. 1.) Not to beleeve every Spirit, but to try the Spirits whether they are of God, because many false Prophets are gone out into the world? It is therefore manifest, that [547]wee may dispute the Doctrine of our Pastors; but no man can dispute a Law. The Commands of Civill Soveraigns are on all sides granted to be Laws: if any else can make a Law besides himselfe, all Common-wealth,[547] and consequently all Peace, and Justice must cease; which is contrary to all Laws, both Divine and Humane. Nothing therefore can be drawn from these, or any other places of Scripture, to prove the Decrees of the Pope, [548]where he has not also the Civill Soveraignty,[548] to be Laws. [311]

The question of Superiority between the Pope and other Bishops.

The last point hee would prove, is this, That our Saviour Christ has committed Ecclesiasticall Iurisdiction immediately to none but the Pope.[gz] Wherein he handleth not the Question of [549] Supremacy between the Pope and Christian Kings, but between the Pope and other Bishops. And first, he sayes °it is agreed,° that the Jurisdiction of Bishops, is at least in the generall de Iure Divino,[ha] that is, [550]in the Right of God;[550] for which he alledges[hb] S. Paul, Ephes. 4. 11. where hee sayes, that Christ °after his Ascension into heaven,° gave °gifts to men,° some Apostles, some Prophets, and some Evangelists, and some Pastors, and Teachers And thence inferres, [551]they[551] have indeed their Jurisdiction in Gods Right; but will not grant they have it immediately [552]from God, but derived[hc] through the Pope. But if a man may be said to have his Jurisdiction de Jure Divino, and yet not immediately; what[552] lawfull Jurisdiction, though but Civill, is there in a Christian Common-wealth, that is not also de Jure Divino? For Christian Kings have their Civill Power [553]from God immediately; and the Magistrates under him exercise their severall charges[hd] in vertue of his Commission;[he] wherein that which they[553] doe, is no lesse de Jure Divino mediato,[hf] than that which the [554] Bishops doe, in vertue of the Popes Ordination. All lawfull Power is of God, immediately in the Supreme Governour, and mediately in those that [555]have Authority under him:[555] So that either hee must grant every [556]Constable[556] in the State, to hold his Office in the Right of God; or he must not hold that any Bishop holds his so, besides the Pope himselfe.

But this whole Dispute, whether Christ left [557]the[557] Jurisdiction to the Pope onely, or to other Bishops also, if considered out of those places where the Pope has the Civill Soveraignty, is a contention de lana Caprina:[hg] For none of them °(where they are not Soveraigns)° has any Jurisdiction at all. For Jurisdiction is [558]the[558] Power of hearing and determining Causes between [559]man and man;[559] and can belong to none, but him that hath the Power to prescribe the Rules of [560]Right and Wrong;[560] that is, to make Laws; and with the [561]Sword of Justice to compell men to obey his[561] Decisions, pronounced either by himself, or by the Judges he ordaineth thereunto; which [562]none can lawfully do, but the Civill Soveraign.[562]

Therefore when he alledgeth[hh] out of the 6 of Luke,[hi] that our Saviour called his Disciples together, and chose twelve of them which he named Apostles,[hj] he proveth that he °Elected them all, (except Matthias, Paul and Barnabas,) and° gave them Power °and Command° to Preach, but not to Judge of Causes between [563]man and man:[563] for that is a Power which he refused to take upon himselfe, saying, Who made me a Iudge, or a Divider,[hk] amongst you?[hl] and in another place, My Kingdome is not of this world.[hm] But hee that hath cesso autem hoc, Iurisdictio quaenam alia, etsi merè Civilis, legitima existit in Civitate Christianâ, quae non sit etiam de Iure Divino? Habent enim Potestatem suam Civilem Christiani Reges, non minùs immediatè à Deo, quam Papa Iurisdictionem suam Ecclesiasticam ab eodem Deo habere profitetur. Itaque id, quod Ministri per Authoritatem ejus faciunt, non minus Iure Divino mediato, faciunt, quàm quod faciunt per Ordinationem Papalem, Episcopi caeteri. Potestas enim legitima omnis à Deo est; in Supremo quidem Imperante, immediatè; in illis autem, qui Iurisdictionem suam à Rege agnoscunt, mediatè. Concedendum ergo est, aut Ministrum quemlibet exiguum in Civitate, Iurisdictionem suam Iure Divino exercere, vel Episcopis, ut Iurisdictiones suas ita teneant (Papâ excepto) concedendum non est.

Sed Disputatio, an Iurisdictionem talem dederit Christus soli Papae, an caeteris etiam Episcopis, extrà Dominium Papae temporale tota contentio est de lana Caprina;[hg] neque enim ille, nec hi Iurisdictionem omninò ullam habent. Iurisdictio enim nihil aliud est, praeter Potestatem legitimam, lites inter Civem & Civem cognoscendi & decidendi; & ad neminem pertinere potest, praeter illum, qui Potestatem habet Iusti & Injusti Regulas praescribendi, id est, Leges condendi, & eos, qui Sententiae ejus stare recusaverint, vel Iudicum, quos ille constituerit, gladio publico cogendi; Quam Potestatem habet nemo, praeter Civitatem, id est praeter eum, qui Civitatis personam gerit.

not the Power to hear, and determine Causes between [564]man and man, cannot be said to[564] have any Jurisdiction at all. And yet this hinders not, but that our Saviour gave them Power to Preach and Baptize in all parts of the world, [565]supposing they were not by their own lawfull Soveraign forbidden: For to our own Soveraigns[565] Christ himself, and his Apostles [312] have in sundry places [566]expressely commanded us in all things to[566] be obedient.[ho]

The arguments by which he would prove, that Bishops receive their Jurisdiction from the Pope (seeing the Pope in the Dominions of other Princes hath no Jurisdiction himself,) are all in vain. Yet because they prove, °on the contrary,° that all Bishops receive Jurisdiction °when they have it° from their Civill Soveraigns, I will not omit the recitall of them.

The first, is from Numbers 11.[hp] where Moses not being [567]able alone to undergoe the whole burthen of administring the affairs[567] of the People of Israel, God commanded him to choose Seventy [568]Elders, and took part of the spirit of Moses, to put it upon those Seventy Elders:[568] by which is understood, not that God weakned the spirit of Moses, for that had not eased him at all; but that [569] they had all of them their authority from [570]him;[570] wherein he doth truly, and ingenuously interpret that place.[hq] But seeing Moses had the entire Soveraignty in the Common-wealth of the Jews, [571]it is manifest, that it is thereby signified, that they[571] had their Authority from the Civill Soveraign: and therefore that place proveth, that Bishops in every Christian Common-wealth have their [572]Authority[572] from the Civill Soveraign; [573]and from the Pope in his own Territories only, and not in the Territories of any other State.[573]

[564] citizens does not [565] where they could do so without breaking the civil laws. For to the civil laws
[566] taught that one should [567] sufficient for the administration
[568] men from the elders of Israel, so that God might give them part of the spirit of Moses.
[569] ^ God showed that [570] Moses; [571] the seventy men also [572] jurisdiction
[573] in the same way that they have it from the power of the Pope in his own temporal dominion.

[hn] The Latin in 68 makes some sense ('Nevertheless he has no power at all to hear and determine causes between citizens'), but the use of the adversative 'Atqui' ('Nevertheless'), and of the present tense, reads oddly; the corrector of 70 has made two changes to remedy the oddity, but without knowledge of the English. Comparison with the English shows that 'At qui' ('But he who') was mistakenly set as 'Atqui', and that the words meaning 'does not have jurisdiction' were then omitted to improve the sense. Those changes are reversed here. [ho] Matt. 22: 21; Mark 12: 17; Rom. 13: 1–7; 1 Pet. 2: 17. [hp] Num. 11: 16–25.

decidendi inter Cives controversias non habet, iurisdictionem omnino nullam habet.[hn] Quod tamen non impedit, quin Servator noster Potestatem illis Praedicandi, & Baptizandi in loco quocunque concedere potuerit, ubi sine transgressione Legum Civilium, id fieri potuerit. Nam Legibus Civilibus, tum Apostoli, tum Christus ipse obediendum esse, passim docuerunt.[ho]

Argumenta autem, quibus probare conatur Iurisdictionem suam accipere Episcopos à Pontifice Romano, cum Pontifex ipse in Dominiis alienis Iurisdictionem nullam habeat, omnia frustranea sunt. Veruntamen, quia probant, Iurisdictionem Episcoporum derivari à Potestate Summa Civili, digna puto, ut ea recitem. Primum est à Num. 11.[hp] ubi Moses, cum administrationi Reipublicae Israëliticae non sufficeret, jussus est, à Deo eligere sibi Septuaginta viros ex Senioribus Israëlis, ut Deus partem Spiritus Mosis illis daret. Intelligitur autem inde, non Spiritum Mosis à Deo debilitatum fuisse; sic enim Deus illum non omnino sublevasset; sed quod Deus Authoritatem illorum ab Authoritate Mosis derivatam esse ostenderet, quemadmodum Bellarminus ipse rectè & ingenuè locum hunc interpretatur.[hq] Quoniam ergo Potestatem Civilem in Israëlitis integram tunc habebat Moses, habebant etiam Authoritatem suam Septuaginta Viri à summa Potestate Civili. Locus ergò ille probat in omni Civitate Christiana, Iurisdictionem Episcoporum dependere à Summa Potestate Civili, quemadmodum à Potestate Papae in Dominio suo temporali.

1 controversias non habet, iurisdictionem this edn.] controversias, 68, 70 2 habet] sibi arrogavit 70

The second argument, is from the nature of Monarchy; wherein all Authority is [574] in one Man, and in others by derivation from him: But the Government of the Church, he says, is Monarchicall.[hr] [575]This also makes for Christian Monarchs. For they are really Monarchs of their own people; that is, of their own Church [575] (for the Church is the same thing with a Christian people;) whereas [576]the Power of the Pope, though hee were S. Peter, is neither Monarchy, nor [576] hath any thing of Archicall, nor Craticall,[hs] but onely of Didacticall; For God accepteth not a forced, but a willing obedience.

The third, is, from that the Sea[ht] of S. Peter is called by S. Cyprian, the Head, the Source, the Roote, the Sun, from whence the Authority of Bishops is derived.[hu] [577] But by the Law of Nature (which is a better Principle [578]of Right and Wrong,[578] than the word of any Doctor °that is but a man°) the °Civill° Soveraign in every Common-wealth, is the Head, the Source, the Root, and the Sun, from which all Jurisdiction is derived. And therefore the Jurisdiction of Bishops, is derived [579]from the Civill Soveraign.[579]

The fourth, is taken from the Inequality of their Jurisdictions: For if God (saith he) had given [580]it them[580] immediately, he had given °aswell° Equality of Jurisdiction, °as of Order:° But wee see, some are Bishops but of one Town, some of a hundred Towns, and some of many whole Provinces; which differences were not determined by the [581]command[581] of God; their Jurisdiction therefore is not of God, [582]but of Man; and one has a greater, another a lesse, as it pleaseth the Prince of the Church.[582] [hv] Which argument, if he had proved before, that the Pope had had an Universall Jurisdiction over all

[574] ^ originally
[575] , and thence he infers that other bishops receive their jurisdiction from the Bishop of Rome.[hr] But whether the ruler of the Church is a monarch, or (as he said before) partly a monarch or a mixed monarch, the argument itself militates in favour of kings. For they are full and entire monarchs of their subjects, that is, of the Churches that exist in their own dominions
[576] no power granted to a foreigner in a commonwealth other than the Roman one
[577] ^ Bellarmino seems not to have known that questions of right are not to be decided by witnesses.
[578] for distinguishing right and injury, [579] entirely from the civil power.
[580] jurisdiction to the other bishops [581] word [582] immediately.

Argumentum secundum sumitur à natura Monarchiae; in Monarchia autem Authoritas omnis originaliter in uno tantum homine est; in caeteris per derivationem ab illo. Sed Regimen Ecclesiae Monarchicum esse assumit, & inde infert Episcopos alios Iurisdictionem suam accipere ab Episcopo Romano.[hr] Sed Ecclesiae Rector sive Monarcha sit, sive (ut ante dixit) partim Monarcha sive Monarcha mixtus, argumentum ipsum pro Regibus militat. Sunt enim illi subditorum suorum, id est Ecclesiarum, quae in suis ipsorum Dominiis existunt (Ecclesia enim & populus Christianus eadem res est) Monarchae pleni & integri. Neque in Civitate non Romana quicquam est Potestatis concessum homini externo neque Archicum, neque Craticum;[hs] sed tantum Didacticum. Obedientiam enim non coactam, sed voluntariam accipit Deus.

Tertium est sumptum ex Cypriano, qui sedem S. Petri Caput, Fontem, Radicem, & Solem, appellat, unde Episcoporum Authoritas derivatur.[hu] [272] Videtur Bellarminus quaestiones Iuris testibus determinari non debere, ignorasse. Leges Naturae (quae Iuris & Injuriae distinguendae principia meliora sunt, quam Doctorum verba) Caput, Fontem, Radicem, & Solem unde Iurisdictio omnis derivatur, in iis qui Summam in Civitatibus suis habent Potestatem, collocant; & proinde Iurisdictio Episcopalis derivatur omnis à Potestate Civili.

Argumentum quartum ab Inaequalitate sumit Iurisdictionum. Inquit enim, si Iurisdictionem Episcopis aliis, Deus dedisset immediatè, dedisset etiam Iurisdictionem aequalem; videmus autem, alios Oppidi unius tantùm, alios Oppidorum centum, alios integrarum Provinciarum Episcopos esse; quas differentias non determinat Verbum Dei. Non sunt ergo Iurisdictiones eorum à Deo datae immediatè.[hv] Argumentum hoc validius fuisset, si probatum fuisset antè Iurisdictionem in Christianos omnes universalem habuisse

Christians, had [313] been [583]for his purpose. But seeing that hath not been proved, and that it is notoriously[583] known, the large Jurisdiction of the Pope was given him by those that [584] had it, that is, by the Emperours of Rome, [585](for the Patriarch of Constantinople, upon the same title, namely, of being Bishop of the Capitall City of the Empire, and Seat of the Emperour, claimed to be equall to him,) it followeth, that all other[585] Bishops have their Jurisdiction from the [586]Soveraigns of the place wherein they exercise the same: And as for that cause they have not their Authority de Iure Divino;[hw] so neither hath the Pope his de Iure Divino, except onely where hee is also the Civill Soveraign.[586]

His fift argument is this, If Bishops have their Iurisdiction immediately from God, the Pope could not take [587]it from them,[587] for he can doe nothing contrary to Gods ordination;[hz] And this consequence is good, °and well proved.° But (saith he) the Pope can do this, and has [588] done it.[ia] This also is granted, so he doe it in his own Dominions, or in the Dominions of any other Prince that hath [589]given him that Power;[589] but not universally, in Right of the Popedome: For that power belongeth to [590]every Christian Soveraign, within the bounds of his owne Empire, and is inseparable from the[590] Soveraignty. Before the [591]People of Israel had (by the commandment of God to Samuel) set over themselves a King, after the manner of other Nations,[591] the High Priest had the Civill [592]Government;[592] and none but he could °make, nor° depose an inferiour Priest: But that Power was afterwards in the [593]King, as may be proved by this same argument of Bellarmine; For if the Priest (be he the High Priest or any other) had his Jurisdiction immediately from God, then the King could not take it from him; for he could doe nothing contrary to Gods ordinance: But it is certain, that[593] King Solomon °(1 Kings 2. 26.)°[ib] deprived Abiathar the High Priest of his Office, [594] and placed Zadok °(verse 35.)° in his room. Kings [595]therefore may in the like manner[595] Ordaine, and Deprive Bishops, as they shall thinke fit, for the well governing of their Subjects.

Episcopum Romanum. Sed neque probatum est antè, neque post probari poterit. Cognitum enim est Iurisdictionem amplam illam, quam habuere Pontifices Romani, datam illis fuisse ab illo, qui verè habuit, nempe à Romano Imperatore, qui Sedem Imperii & Religionis Principalem, eandem esse voluit. Habent ergò Episcopi singuli Iurisdictionem suam, ab Authoritate illius, in cujus Dominio illam exercent: & constat[hx] proinde ipsum Papam Authoritatem suam extra Dominia sua temporalia, debere illis, qui sunt Civitatum, ubi illam exercet, Summi Imperantes.

Argumentum quintum tale est; Si Iurisdictionem suam Episcopi à Deo haberent immediatè, Papa[hy] neminem ex Episcopis illis Episcopatu suo deprivare posset, nihil enim facere potest contra ordinationem Divinam; & consequentia quidem bona est; sed Papa (inquit) hoc facere potest & fecit saepe.[ia] Conceditur etiam hoc, subaudito, quod ita fecerit in suo ipsius Dominio, vel etiam in alieno, si consentiat Dominus loci. Sed ut hoc facere possit universaliter, & Iure ipsius Episcopatus Romani, concedendum non est. Potestas enim illa ad Potestatem pertinet Civitatum singularium, & Summae Potestati Civili essentialis est. Ante regnum Saulis in Israële, cum Summa Potestas Civilis in Summo Sacerdote resideret, ille solus Sacerdotem potuit deponere. His sixth argument is this, If Bishops have their Jurisdiction de Iure Divino (that is, immediately from God,) they °that maintaine it,° should bring some Word of God to prove it: But they can bring none.[ic] The argument is good; I have therefore nothing to say against it. But it is an argument no lesse good, to prove the Pope himself to have no Jurisdiction in the Dominion of any other [596]Prince.[596]

Lastly, hee bringeth for argument, the testimony of two Popes, Innocent, and Leo;[id] and I doubt not but he might have alledged,[ie] with as good reason, the testimonies of all the Popes almost since S. Peter: For considering the love of Power naturally implanted in mankind, [597]whosoever were made Pope, he would be tempted to uphold the same opinion.[597] Neverthelesse, they should therein but °doe, as Innocent, and Leo did,° bear witnesse of themselves, and therefore their witnesse should not be good. Of the Popes Temporall Power.

In the fift Book he hath four Conclusions. The first is, That the Pope is not Lord of all the world: The second, That the Pope is not Lord of all the Christian world: The third, That the Pope (without[if] his owne Territory) has not any Temporall Jurisdiction DIRECTLY: These three Conclusions are easily granted. The fourth is, That the Pope has (in the Dominions of other Princes) the Supreme Temporall Power INDIRECTLY:[ig] which is denyed; unlesse hee mean by Indirectly, that he has gotten it by Indirect[ih] means; then is that also granted. But I understand, that when he saith [598]he hath it Indirectly, he means, that such Temporall Jurisdiction belongeth to him of Right, but that this Right is but a[598] Consequence of his Pastorall Authority, [599]the which he could not exercise, unlesse he have the other with it: And therefore to the Pastorall Power (which he calls Spirituall) the Supreme Power Civill is necessarily annexed; and that thereby hee hath[599] a Right to change Kingdomes, giving them to one, [600]and taking them from[600] another, when he shall think it conduces to the Salvation of Souls.

Argumentum sextum est, Si Iurisdictionem suam Iure Divino Immediato habeant Episcopi, debent id probare ex verbo Dei. Sed hoc non possunt.[ic] Argumentum quidem bonum est, nec quicquam dicam in contrarium. Sed argumentum idem similiter probat, Papae ipsi in Dominio alieno Iurisdictionem nullam esse, neque enim id probare ex verbo Dei possunt Pontificii.

Postremò testimonium adducit duorum Paparum Innocentii & Leonis;[id] neque dubito quin potuerit, eodem Iure testimonia adduxisse Paparum fere omnium post S. Petrum. Quis enim (cum Potestatis cupido humano generi tam firmiter infixa sit à natura) non ad idem testandum adduceretur? Sed tamen in propria causa testaretur; & proinde testimonium ejus bonum non esset.

Liber quintus quatuor habet Conclusiones; Primam, Papam non esse Dominum totius orbis. Secundam, Papam non esse Dominum totius orbis Christiani. Tertiam, Papam in Dominiis alienis Iurisdictionem Temporalem nullam habere Directè. Tria haec facilè conceduntur. Quarta est, Papam in Dominiis alienis Potestatem habere Temporalem Summam Indirectè;[ig] quae negatur; nisi per Indirectè intelligat Potestatem illam viis Indirectis acquisitam esse; tunc enim id quoque concedi potest. Sed, ut ego Sententiam ejus intelligo Potestatem illam Pontificis Romani esse dicit, Iure quodam quod Authoritati ejus Pastorali per consequentiam necessariam adhaeret; quia Potestatem Pastoralem (quam Spiritualem vocat) exercere sine illâ non potest. Per hanc autem Authoritatem consequutivam, Pontifici Romano Regna mutandi, modo in unum, modo in alium transferendi, prout ad salutem animarum, ipsi conducere videbitur, Ius attribuit.

Before I come to consider the Arguments [601]by which hee would prove this Doctrine,[601] it will not bee amisse to lay open the [602]Consequences of it; that Princes, and States, that have the Civill Soveraignty in their severall Common-wealths, may[602] bethink themselves, whether it bee [603]convenient for them,[603] and conducing to the good of their Subjects, of whom they are to give an account at the day of Judgment, °to admit the same.°

When it is said, the Pope hath not (in the Territories of other States) the Supreme °Civill° Power Directly; we are to understand, he [604]doth not challenge[ii] it, as other Civill Soveraigns[604] doe, from the originall submission thereto of those that are to be governed. °For it is evident, and has already been sufficiently in this Treatise demonstrated, that the Right of all Soveraigns, is derived originally from the consent of every one of those that are to bee governed; whether they that choose him, doe it for their common defence against an Enemy, as when they agree amongst themselves to appoint a Man, or an Assembly of men to protect them; or whether they doe it, to save their lives, by submission to a conquering Enemy. The Pope therefore, when he disclaimeth the Supreme Civill Power over other States Directly, denyeth no more, but that his Right cometh to him by that way;° He ceaseth not for all that, to claime it another way; and that is, (without the consent of [605]them that are to be governed) by a Right given him by God, (which hee calleth Indirectly,)[605] in his Assumption to the Papacy. But by what way soever he pretend, the Power is the same; and he may (if it bee granted to be his Right) [606]depose Princes and States,[606] as often as it [607]is for[607] the Salvation of Soules, that is, as often as he will; for he claimeth also the Sole Power to Judge, whether it be to the Salvation of mens Souls, or not. And this is the Doctrine, not onely that Bellarmine here, and many other Doctors teach in their Sermons and Books,[ij] but also that some Councells have decreed, and [315] the Popes have [608]accordingly,[608] when the occasion hath served them, put in practise. For the °fourth° Councell of Lateran held under Pope Innocent the third, (in the third Chap. De Haereticis,) hath this Canon. If a King at the Popes admonition, doe not purge his Kingdome of Haeretiques, and being Excommunicate for the same, make not satisfaction within a yeer, his Subjects are Antequam Argumenta ejus considerem, abs re non erit si breviter ostendero, Conclusionis hujus momentum, quantum à Regibus & ab iis, qui Summam habent Potestatem Civilem pensitari debeat, & ut cogitent, an Subditorum suorum bono (cujus rationem reddituri sunt) utile sit; & an tuto concedi possit.

Quando Papam in Dominio alieno Potestatem Summam Directè habere negat; ita intelligendum est, ac si diceret Potestatem illam non venire ad Pontificem Romanum, eâ viâ, qua Reges Potestatem suam obtinuêre, nimirum ab eorum, qui regendi sunt submissione originali. Potestatem tamen eandem viâ aliâ sibi vendicat, etiam sine consensu populi, nempe ut dono Dei factam suam esset in Assumptione sua ad Papatum. Quacunque tamen via illam habuerit, eadem tamen semper est Potestas; & per eam (si concedatur) Principes & Civitates Dominio suo spoliare Iure potest, quoties saluti animarum videbitur [274] conducere; id est, quoties vult. Nam judicandi, utrum ad salutem Animarum conducat necne, solum se Iudicem esse postulat. absolved of their Obedience.[ik] And the practise [609]hereof hath been seen on divers occasions;[609] as in the Deposing of Chilperique, King of France[610]; in the Translation of the Roman Empire to Charlemaine; in the Oppression of Iohn King of England[611]; in Transferring the Kingdome of Navarre[612];[il] and of late years, in the [613]League against[613] Henry the third °of France,[im] and in many more occurrences.° I think there be few Princes that consider not this as Injust, and Inconvenient;[in] but [614] I wish they would all resolve to be Kings, or Subjects. [615]Men cannot serve two Masters:[io] They ought therefore to ease them, either by holding the Reins of Government wholly in their own hands; or by wholly delivering them[615] into the hands of the Pope; that such men as are willing to be obedient, may be protected in their obedience. For this distinction of Temporall, and Spirituall [616]Power[616] is but words. [617]Power is as really divided, and as dangerously to all purposes,[617] by sharing with another Indirect Power, as with a Direct one. But to come now to his Arguments.

The first is this, The Civill Power is subject to the Spirituall: Therefore he that hath the Supreme Power Spirituall, hath right to command Temporall Princes, and dispose of their Temporalls in order to the Spirituall.[ip] As for the distinction of Temporall, and Spirituall, let us consider in what Sense it may be said [618]intelligibly,[618] that the Temporall, or Civill Power is Subject to the Spirituall. °There be but two ways that those words can be made sense.° For when

That Leo III had transferred the Roman Empire from the Byzantine Emperor to Charlemagne was a major claim of papalist writers; Baronius gave it special emphasis (Annales, ix, cols. 613–14), and Bellarmino wrote a treatise about it (reprinted with his Disputationes: tom. 2, 2nd pagination, pp. 46–191).

[im] The 'Catholic League' opposed King Henry III of France (on the grounds that his policies were too favourable to the Protestants), and after Henry III's assassination in 1589 it continued the civil war against his successor, Henry IV.

wee say, one Power is subject to another Power, the meaning either is, that he which hath the one, is subject to him that hath the other; or that the one Power is to the other, as the means to the end. For wee cannot understand, that one Power [619]hath Power over another Power; or that one Power can have Right or[iq] Command over another:[619] For Subjection, Command, Right, and Power are accidents, not of Powers, but of Persons: One Power may be subordinate to another, as the art of a Sadler, to the art of a Rider. If then it bee granted, that the Civill [620]Government be ordained[620] as a means to bring us to a Spirituall felicity; yet it does not follow, that if a King have the Civill Power, and the Pope the Spirituall, that therefore the King is bound to obey the Pope, more then every Sadler is bound to obey every Rider. Therefore as from Subordination of an Art, cannot be inferred the Subjection of the Professor; so from the Subordination of a Government, cannot be inferred the Subjection of the Governor. When therefore he saith, the Civill Power is Subject to the Spirituall, his meaning is, that the Civill Soveraign, is Subject to the Spirituall Soveraign. And the Argument stands thus, The Civil Soveraign, is subject to the Spirituall; Therefore the Spirituall Prince [621]may[621] command Temporall Princes. Where [622]the Conclusion is the same, [316] with the Antecedent he should have proved. But to prove it, he alledgeth[ir] first, this reason,[622] Kings and Popes, Clergy and [623]Laity[623] make but one Common-wealth; that is to say, but one Church: And in all Bodies the Members depend one upon another: But things Spirituall depend not of things Temporall: Therefore Temporall depend on Spirituall. And therefore are Subject to them.[is] In which Argumentation there be two grosse errours: one is, that °all Christian° Kings, Popes, Clergy, and all other Christian men, make but one Common-wealth: For it is evident that France is one Common-wealth, Spain another, and Vensubditam esse, intelligendum est, aut illum, qui unam habet, illi, qui habet alteram, subditum esse, vel Potestatem unam esse ad alteram, ut Medium ad Finem. Intelligere enim non possumus, Potestatem unam, sive Ius unum in Potestatem aliam, id est Ius aliud, Potestatem vel Ius habere Imperandi. Nam Subjectio, Imperium, Ius, & Potestas Accidentia sunt non Potestatum, sed Personarum. Potestas quidem una alteri subordinata [275] esse potest, quemadmodum Ars faciendi Ephippia arti Equitandi subordinata esse potest. Etsi ergo concedatur Potestatem Civilem subordinatam esse Potestati Papali tanquam medium ad Foelicitatem Spiritualem; non tamen sequitur, si Potestas Civilis sit in Rege, & Potestas Spiritualis in Papa, ideo obligari Regem obedire Papae, magis quàm unusquisque, qui artem habet faciendi Ephippia, obligatur obedire omni Equiti. Sicut ergò à Subordinatione Artium, inferri non potest Subjectio Artificum; ita neque à subordinatione Regiminum inferri potest subjectio Regentium. Quando ergò Potestatem Civilem Spirituali dicit esse subditam, intelligit ipsum Civitatis Imperatorem, subditum esse Imperatori Spirituali. Argumentum itaque hujusmodi est: Qui habet Potestatem Summam Civilem, subditus est illius, qui habet Potestatem Summam Spiritualem; ergo Princeps Spiritualis Ius habet Imperandi in Principes Temporales. In quo argumento assumit Reges Papae esse subditos, id quod debuit demonstrare; de consequentia enim, quin bona sit, nulla est controversia. ice a third, &c. And these consist of Christians; and therefore also are severall °Bodies of Christians; that is to say, severall° Churches: And their [624]severall Soveraigns Represent them, whereby they are capable of commanding and obeying, of doing and suffering, as a naturall man;[624] which no °Generall or° Universall Church [625]is, till it have a Representant; which it hath not[625] on Earth: for if it had, there is no doubt but that [626]all Christendome were one Common-wealth, whose Soveraign were that Representant, both in things[626] Spirituall and Temporall: And the Pope, to make himself this Representant, wanteth three things that our Saviour hath not given him, [627] to Command, and to Iudge, and to Punish, °otherwise than (by Excommunication) to run from those that will not Learn of him:° For though the Pope were Christs onely Vicar, yet he cannot [628]exercise his government, till our Saviours second coming:[628] And then also it is not the Pope, but St. Peter himselfe, with the other Apostles, that are to be Judges of the world.[it]

The other errour in this his first Argument is, that he sayes, the Members of every Common-wealth, as of a naturall Body, depend one of another: It is true, they cohaere together; but they depend onely on the Soveraign, which is the Soul of the Common-wealth; which failing, [629]the Common-wealth is dissolved into a Civill war,[629] no one man so much as cohaering to another, for want of [630]a common Dependance on a known Soveraign;[630] Just as the Members of the naturall Body dissolve into Earth, for want of a Soul to hold them together. Therefore there is nothing in this similitude, from whence to inferre a dependance of the [631]Laity[631] on the Clergy, or of the Temporall Officers on the Spirituall; but of both on the °Civill° Soveraign; which ought indeed to direct [632]his Civill commands[632] to the Salvation of Souls; but is not therefore subject to any but God himselfe. And thus [633]you see the laboured fallacy of the first Argument,[633] to deceive such men as distinguish not between the Subordination of [634]Actions[634] in the way to the End; and the Subjection of Persons one to another in the administration of the Means. For to every End, the Means are determined by Nature, or by God himselfe supernaturally: but the Power to make men use the Means, is in every nation resigned (by the Law of Nature, °which forbiddeth men to violate their Faith given°) to the Civill Soveraign. Argumenti hujus Error alter est, quod dicat Membra Reipublicae, sicut Corporis Naturalis, unum ab altero dependere. Quod quidem [276] inter se cohaereant, non negabitur. Sed dependent ab eo solo, qui Summam habet Potestatem, id est ab Anima Reipublicae, qua deficiente deficiunt, ita ut ne unus quidem homo, cum altero cohaereat propter defectum Summi Imperantis, à quo cuncti simul dependerent; non aliter, quàm membra Corporis Naturalis resolvuntur in terram, defectu Animae, quae illa contineret. In hac ergo Similitudine nihil est, unde inferretur Populi dependentia à Clero vel Ministrorum Temporalium à Spiritualibus, sed amborum à Summo Imperante. Qui quidem Leges quas facit, ad salutem Animarum debet dirigere, sed non ideo, cuiquam Subditus est, praeterquam ipsi Deo. Evanescit ergo Paralogismus hic Bellarmini, elaboratus ad decipiendum illos, qui distinguere nesciunt inter subordinationem artium ad finem, & subjectionem personarum in administratione Mediorum. Vnicuique enim Fini Media determinantur vel per Naturam, vel per Deum ipsum supernaturaliter: sed potestas cogendi homines Mediis certis uti in omni gente per Leges Naturae est in Summo Imperante Civili.

His second Argument is this, Every Common-wealth, °(because it is supposed to be perfect[iu] and sufficient in it self,)° may command any other Common-wealth, not subject to it, and, force it to change the [635]administration of the Government; nay[635] depose the Prince, and set another in his room, if it cannot otherwise defend it selfe against the injuries he goes about to doe them: much more may a Spirituall Common-wealth command a Temporall one to change the [636]administration of their Government,[636] and may depose Princes, and institute others, when they cannot otherwise defend the Spirituall Good.[iv]

That a Common-wealth, to defend it selfe against injuries, may lawfully doe all that he hath here said, is very true; and hath already in that which hath gone before been °sufficiently° demonstrated. And if it were also true, that there is now in this world a Spirituall Common-wealth, distinct from [637]a Civill[637] Common-wealth, then might the Prince thereof, [638]upon injury done him, or upon want of caution[iw] that injury be not done him in time to come, repaire,[ix] and secure himself by Warre;[638] which is in summe, deposing, killing, or subduing, or doing any act of Hostility. But by the same reason, it would be no lesse lawfull for a [639]Civill Soveraign,[639] upon the like injuries done, or feared, to make warre upon the Spirituall Soveraign; which I beleeve is more than Cardinall Bellarmine would have inferred from his own proposition.

But Spirituall Common-wealth there is none in this world: for it is the same thing with the Kingdome of Christ; which [640]he himselfe saith, is not of this world;[iy] but shall be in the next world,[640] at the Resurrection, when they that have [641]lived justly, and beleeved that he was the[641] Christ, shall (though they died Naturall bodies) rise Spirituall bodies; and then it is, that our Saviour [642]shall judge the world, and conquer his Adversaries, and make a[642] Spirituall Common-wealth. In the mean time, seeing there are no men on earth, whose bodies are Spirituall; there can be no Spirituall Common-wealth [643]amongst men[643] that are yet in the flesh; °unlesse wee call Preachers, that have Commission to Teach, and prepare men for their reception into the Kingdome of Christ at the Resurrection, a Common-wealth; which I have proved already to bee none.°

Argumentum ejus secundum est, Respublica omnis omni non sibi Subditae, Imperare potest, & cogere eam administrationem publicam mutare, & quod majus est, Principem deponere, & in illius locum alium constituere, si contra injurias, quas parat sibi facere alio modo seipsam defendere non possit: multo magis Respublica Spiritualis Temporali Imperare potest, administrationem publicam mutare, Principes deponere, alios instituere, quoties Bonum Spirituale aliter tueri nequit.[iv]

Quod Civitas haec omnia facere possit, ut se defendat ab Injuriis, negari non potest, & à me supra demonstratum est.Verum quoque est, si qua esset in hoc mundo Civitas Spiritualis, distincta ab omni Civitate Temporali, Principem Civitatis illius Potestatem habiturum, si aliter se reparare aut tutari non posset, Bellum in illos, qui Injuriam facerent, nec repararent, inferendi, id est deponendi, occidendi, subjugandi, aliudve hostile faciendi. This is not in fact Bellarmino's second argument, but a subsidiary point in support of it.

[iy] John 18: 36.

The third Argument is this; It is not lawfull for Christians to tolerate an Infidel, or Haereticall King, in case[iz] he endeavour to draw them [644]to his Haeresie, or Infidelity.[644] But to judge whether a King [645] draw his subjects to Haeresie, or not, belongeth to the Pope. Therefore hath the Pope Right, to determine whether the Prince be to be deposed, or not deposed.[ja]

To this I answer, that both these assertions are false. [646]For Christians, (or men of what Religion soever,) if they tolerate not their King, whatsoever law hee maketh, though it bee concerning Religion, doe violate their faith,[646] contrary to the Divine Law, both Naturall and Positive: [647]Nor is there any Judge of Haeresie amongst Subjects, but their owne Civill Soveraign:[647] For Haeresie is nothing else, but a private opinion, obstinately maintained, contrary [318] to the [648]opinion which the Publique Person (that is to say, the Representant of the Common-wealth) hath commanded to bee taught.[648] By which it is manifest, that an opinion [649]publiquely appointed to bee[649] taught, cannot be Haeresie; °nor the Soveraign Princes that authorize them, Haeretiques. For Haeretiques are none but private men, that stubbornly defend some Doctrine, prohibited by their lawfull Soveraigns.°

But to prove that Christians are not to tolerate Infidell, or Haereticall Kings, he alledgeth[jc] a place in Deut. 17.[jd] where God forbiddeth the Jews, when they shall set a King over themselves, to [650]choose[650] a stranger: And from thence inferreth, that it is unlawfull for a Christian, to choose a King, that is not a Christian.[je] And 'tis true, that he that is a Christian, that is, hee that hath already obliged himself to [651]receive our Saviour when he shall come, for his King,[651] shal tempt God too much in choosing for King [652]in this world, one that hee knoweth will endeavour, both by terrour, and perswasion to make him violate[652] his faith. Tertium argumentum est, Regem Infidelem vel haereticum, Christianis si modo illos conetur à Fide abducere, tolerare licitum non est. Iudicare autem utrum Rex Subditos suos ad haeresim adducere conetur necne, pertinet ad Papam. Ius ergo habet Papa determinandi utrum Princeps deponendus an retinendus sit.[ja, jb]

Respondeo utrumque esse falsum, nempe primum Christiano Regem suum in quocunque casu non esse tolerandum; nam Legibus Divinis, tum Naturalibus tum Positivis contrarium est: & secundum, nempe Iudicem Haeresium quemquam alium esse praeter eum, qui Summam habet Potestatem Civilem. [jb] The Latin in 68 is defective, with 'judicandi' ('to judge'; omitted here) duplicating 'determinandi' ('to determine'). Possibly the 'an' was misinterpreted in the printing-house as meaning 'whether', instead of 'or', and 'judicandi' was then added to govern the 'whether. . .' clause; or, possibly, 'an' was a misreading of 'aut'. The corrector of 70 did interpret 'an' as 'whether', and tried to remedy the defect accordingly.

choose one that is not a Christian, for King, and not to depose him, when hee is chosen.[jf] To this I say, the question is not of the danger of not deposing; but of the [653]Justice[653] of deposing him. To choose [654]him, may in some cases bee unjust;[654] but to depose him, when he is chosen, is in no case Just. For it is alwaies violation of faith, °and consequently against the Law of Nature, which is the eternall Law of God.° Nor doe wee read, that any such Doctrine was accounted Christian in the time of the Apostles; nor in the time of the Romane Emperours, till the [655]Popes had the Civill Soveraignty of Rome.[655] But to this he hath replyed, that the Christians of old, deposed not Nero, nor Diocl esian, nor Iulian, nor Valens an Arrian, for this cause onely, that they wanted °Temporall° forces.[jg] Perhaps so. But did our Saviour, °who for calling for, might have had twelve Legions of immortall, invulnerable Angels to assist him,°[jh] want forces to depose Caesar, or at least Pilate, that [656]unjustly, without finding fault in him,[656] delivered him to the Jews to bee crucified? Or if the Apostles wanted °Temporall° forces to depose Nero, was it therefore necessary for them in their Epistles to the new made Christians, to teach them °(as they did)° to obey the Powers [657]constituted over them, (whereof Nero in that time was one,)[657] and that they ought to obey them, not [658]for fear of their wrath, but[658] for conscience sake?[ji] Shall we say they did °not onely obey, but also° teach what they meant not, for want of strength? It is not therefore for want of strength, but [659]for conscience sake, that Christians are to tolerate their Heathen Princes, or Princes (for I cannot call any one whose Doctrine is the Publique Doctrine, an Haeretique) that authorize[659] the teaching of an Errour. And whereas for the Temporall Power of the Pope, he alledgeth further, that St. Paul (1 Cor. 6.)[jj] [660]appointed[660] Judges under the Heathen Princes °of those times,° such as were not ordained by those Princes;[jk] it is not true. For St. Paul does but advise [661]them,[661] to take some of their Brethren to compound[jl] their differences, as Arbitrators, [319] rather than to goe to law one with another before the Heathen Judges; which is a wholsome Precept, and full of Charity, fit to bee practised also in the best Christian Common-wealths. And for the danger that may [662]arise to Religion, by the Subjects tolerating of an Heathen, or an Erring Prince,[662] it is a point, of which a Subject is no competent Judge; or if hee bee, the Popes [663]Temporall Subjects may[663] judge also of the Popes Doctrine. °For every Christian Prince, as I have formerly proved,[jm] is no lesse Supreme Pastor of his own Subjects, than the Pope of his.°

The fourth Argument, is taken from the Baptisme of Kings; wherein, [664]that they may be made Christians[664] they submit their Scepters to Christ; and promise to keep, and defend the Christian Faith.[jn] This is true; for Christian Kings are no more but Christs Subjects: but they may, for all that, bee the Popes [665]Fellowes; for they are Supreme Pastors of their own Subjects; and the Pope is no more but King, and Pastor, even in Rome it selfe.[665]

The fifth Argument, is drawn from the words spoken by our Saviour, Feed my sheep; by which [666] was given all Power necessary for a Pastor; as the Power to chase away Wolves, such as are Haeretiques; the Power to shut up Rammes, if they be mad, or push at the other Sheep with their Hornes, such as are Evill (though Christian) Kings; and Power to give the Flock convenient[jo] food: [667]From whence hee inferreth, that[667] St. Peter had these three Powers given him by Christ.[jp] To which I answer, that the last of these Powers, is no more than the Power, [668]or rather Command to Teach.[668] For the first, which is to chase away °Wolves, that is,° Haeretiques, the place hee quoteth is (Matth. 7. 15.) Beware of false Prophets which come to you in Sheeps clothing, but inwardly are ravening Wolves. But neither are Haeretiques false Prophets, [669]or at all Prophets: nor (admitting Haeretiques for the Wolves there meant,)[669] were the Apostles commanded to kill them, [670] or if they were Kings, to depose them; but to beware of, fly, and avoid them: nor was it to St. Peter, nor to any of the Apostles, but to the multitude of the Jews that followed him into the mountain, men for the most part not yet converted, that [671]hee gave this Counsell, to Beware of false Prophets: which therefore if it conferre a Power of chasing away Kings, was given, not onely to private men; but to men that were not at all Christians.[671] And as to the Power of [672]Separating, and Shutting up of furious Rammes, (by which hee meaneth Christian Kings that refuse to submit themselves to the Roman Pastor,)[672] our Saviour refused to take upon him that Power in this world himself, but [673]advised[673] to let the Corn and Tares grow up together till the day of Judgment:[jq] much lesse did hee give [674]it[674] to St. Peter, or [675]can S. Peter give it to the Popes.[675] St. Peter, and all other Pastors, are bidden to esteem those Christians that [676]disobey[676] the Church, °(that is, that disobey the Christian Soveraigne)° as [320] Heathen men, and as Publicans. Seeing then [677]men challenge to[jr] the Pope no authority over Heathen Princes, they ought to challenge[677] none over those that are to bee esteemed as Heathen.

Argumentum quartum, à Regum sumitur Baptizatione, in qua Sceptra sua, ut dicit Bellarminus, submittunt Christo; promittuntque custodire & tueri Fidem Christianam.[jn] Et rectè quidem hoc. Reges enim Christiani ipsi, Christi sunt subditi. Quod tamen non impedit, quin Pontificibus Romanis sint aequales.

Argumentum quintum sumitur ab eo, quod dixit Christus, Pasce oves meas; quibus verbis Pontifici Romano Potestatem omnem datam esse dicit Pastori necessariam; qualis est Potestas abigendi lupos, id est Haereticos; & Potestas clausos tenendi arietes furentes, qui gregem cornibus petere consueverunt, id est malos (licet Christianos) Reges; & Potestas praebendi gregi alimentum suum debitum. Atque has Potestates S. Petro à Christo datas esse dicit.[jp] Respondeo Potestatem hanc, de alimentis nihil aliud esse praeter Potestatem praedicandi. Pro primâ de abigendis Haereticis, citat Matth. 7. 15. Cavete vobis à Pseudoprophetis, qui veniunt ad vos, cum vestimentis ovium; sed intrinsecus sunt lupi rapaces. Sed Haeretici Pseudoprophetae non sunt; neque Apostoli Haereticos, quanquam lupi essent, jubentur interficere, vel si iidem Reges fuerint, deponere; sed cavere, fugere, & evitare. Neque S. Petro neque Apostolis à Christo haec dicta sunt, sed multitudini Iudaeorum, qui eum sequuti sunt in montem, homines, magnâ ex parte nondum conversi ad Fidem. Quod autem attinet ad Potestatem arietes furentes coërcendi, & à grege reliquo separandi, Servator noster Potestatem illam in hoc mundo ipse recusavit, triticum & zizania simul jubens crescere usque ad diem Iudicii;[jq] multo minùs Potestatem tantam dedit S. Petro, aut S. Petrus Successoribus suis. Tum ille, tum Pastores caeteri jubebantur Christianos [279] illos, qui Ecclesiam audire nolunt, tanquam Ethnicos & Publicanos ducere. Cum ergò Papae in Ethnicos Potestas nulla sit, in eos etiam, qui pro Ethnicis haberi debent, nulla est.

But from the Power to [678]Teach[678] onely, hee inferreth also a Coercive Power °in the Pope,° over Kings. The Pastor (saith he) must give his flock °convenient°[js] food: Therefore the Pope may, °and ought to° compell Kings to doe their duty.[jt] Out of which it followeth, that the Pope, as Pastor of Christian men, is King of Kings: [679]which all Christian Kings ought indeed either to Confesse, or else they ought to take upon themselves the Supreme Pastorall Charge, every one in his own Dominion.[679]

His sixth, and last Argument, is from Examples.[ju] To which I answer, first, that Examples prove nothing: Secondly, that the Examples he alledgeth[jv] [680]make not so much as a probability[680] [jw] of Right. The fact[jx] of Jehoiada, in Killing Athaliah (2 Kings 11.)[jy] was either by the Authority of King Joash, or it was a horrible Crime in the High Priest, which [681](ever after the election of King Saul) was a mere Subject.[681] The fact of St. Ambrose, in Excommunicating Theodosius the Emperour,[jz] [682](if it were true hee did so,) was a Capitall Crime.[682] And for the Popes, Gregory 1. Greg. 2. Zachary, and Leo 3. their Judgments are void, as given in their own Cause;[ka] and the Acts done by them conformably to this Doctrine, are the greatest Crimes (especially that of Zachary) that are incident to Humane Nature. And thus much of Power Ecclesiasticall; wherein I had been more briefe, forbearing to examine these Arguments of Bellarmine, if they had [683]been his, as a Private man, and not as the Champion of the Papacy, against all other Christian Princes, and States.[683]

CHAP. XLIII.

Of what is NECESSARY for a Mans Reception into the Kingdome of Heaven.

The difficulty of obeying God and Man both at once,

The most frequent praetext of Sedition, and Civill Warre, in Christian Common-wealths hath a long time proceeded from a difficulty, not yet sufficiently resolved, of obeying at once, both God, and Man, then when their Commandements [1]are[1] one contrary to the other. [2]It is manifest enough, that when a man receiveth two contrary Commands, and knows that one of them is Gods, he ought to obey that, and not the other, though it be the command even of his lawfull Soveraign (whether a Monarch, or a soveraign Assembly,) or the command of his Father. The difficulty therefore consisteth in this, that[2] men when they are commanded [3] in the name of God, know not in divers Cases, whether the command be from God, or whether he that commandeth, doe but abuse Gods name for some private [4]ends[4] of his own. For as there were in the Church of the Jews, many false Prophets, that sought reputation with the people, by feigned Dreams, and Visions; so there have been in all times in the Church of Christ, false Teachers, that seek reputation with the people, by phantasticall and false Doctrines; °and by such reputation (as is the nature of Ambition,)° to govern them for their private benefit.

Is none to them that distinguish between what is, and what is not Necessary to Salvation.

But this difficulty of obeying both God, and the Civill Soveraign °on earth,° to those that can distinguish between what is Necessary, and what is not Necessary for their Reception into the Kingdome of God, is of no moment. For if the command of the Civill Soveraign bee such, as that it may be obeyed, without the forfeiture of life Eternall; not to obey it is unjust; and the precept of the Apostle takes place; Servants obey your Masters in all things;[a] and, Children obey your Parents in all things;[b] and the precept of our Saviour, The Scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses Chaire, All therefore they shall say, that observe, and doe.[c] But if the command be such, as cannot be obeyed, without

CAPVT XLIII.

De iis quae ad Receptionem in Regnum Coelorum sunt Necessaria.

Seditionum & Belli Civilis in Rebuspublicis Christianis praetextus frequentissimus jamdudum fuit, difficultas, nondum satis sublata, Deo & Homini simul obediendi, quando pugnare inter se videntur eorum Imperata. Non quod sit, qui nescit Deo obediendum potiùs esse, quam homini cuicunque; sed quod nesciant aliquando, an id, quod in Dei nomine Imperatum est ab homine, sit revera Imperatum à Deo, an qui imperat, ad proprium emolumentum, nomine Dei abutatur. Sicut enim olim in Ecclesia Iudaeorum, multi surrexêre Pseudoprophetae, qui populi favorem Somniis & Visionibus fictis captaverunt, ita etiam in Ecclesia Christi, falsi quidam per omnia tempora, extitêre Doctores, qui existimationem apud populum per [280] Doctrinas falsas, & phantasticas obtinere studuêrunt, eo fine, ut cum lucro proprio eos regerent.

Verùm illis, qui distinguere possunt inter ea, quae ad receptionem in Regnum Dei necessaria sunt, & quae necessaria non sunt, difficultas haec simul obediendi Deo, & Summae Potestati Civili, nulla est. Siquidem enim, quod imperatur à Summo Imperante Civili tale sit, ut obediri possit sine jactura Vitae aeternae; tunc non obedire injustum est; & locum habet Praeceptum Apostoli, Servi obedite Dominis vestris in omnibus;[a] &, Filii obedite Parentibus vestris in omnibus;[b] & locum habet Praeceptum Servatoris nostri, Scribae & Pharisaei sedent in cathedra Mosis; omnia ergò quae dicent, observate & facite.[c] Sin quod imperatur tale sit, ut sine damnatione ad mortem aeternam obebeing damned to Eternall Death, then it were madnesse to obey it, and the Counsell of our Saviour takes place, (Mat. 10. 28.) Fear not those that kill the body, but cannot kill the soule. All men therefore that would avoid, both the punishments that are to be in this world inflicted, for [5]disobedience to their earthly Soveraign,[5] and those that shall be inflicted in the world to come for disobedience to God, have need be taught to distinguish well between what is, and what is not Necessary [6]to Eternall Salvation.[6] [322]

All that is Necessary to Salvation is contained in Faith and Obedience.

All that is NECESSARY to [7] Salvation, is contained in two Vertues, Faith in Christ, and Obedience to Laws. The latter of these, if it were perfect, were enough to us. But because wee are all guilty of disobedience to [8]Gods Law,[8] not onely originally in Adam, but also actually by our own transgressions, there is required at our hands now, not onely Obedience for the rest of our time, but also a Remission of sins for the time past; °which Remission is the reward of our Faith in Christ.° That nothing else is Necessarily required to Salvation, is manifest from this, that the Kingdome of Heaven is shut to none but to °Sinners; that is to say, to the disobedient, or° transgressors of the Law; nor to them, in case they Repent, and Beleeve all the Articles of Christian Faith, Necessary to Salvation.

What Obedience is Necessary;

The Obedience required at our hands by God, that [9]accepteth in all our actions[9] the Will for the Deed, is [10] a serious Endeavour to Obey him; and is called also by all such names as signifie that Endeavour. And therefore Obedience, is [11]sometimes called by[11] the names of Charity, and Love, because they imply a Will to Obey; and our Saviour himself maketh our Love to God, and to one another, a Fulfilling of the whole Law:[d] and sometimes by the name of Righteousnesse; for Righteousnesse is but the will to give to every one his owne,[e] that is to say, the will to obey the Laws: and sometimes by the name of [12]Repentance; because to Repent,[12] implyeth a turning away from sinne, which is the same, with the return of the will to Obedience. Whosoever therefore unfeignedly [13] desireth to fulfill the Commandements of God, or repenteth him truely of his transgressions, or that loveth God with all his heart, and his neighbor as himself, hath all the Obedience Necessary to [14]his Reception into the Kingdom of God:[14] For if God should require [15]perfect Innocence, there could no flesh be saved.[15] [f]

[5] violation of the civil laws, [6] for entrance into the kingdom of heaven. [7] ^eternal [8] God, [9] has promised to accept [10] ^ no more than [11] often recommended with [12] 'recovery of one's senses', or 'repentance', which [13] ^ and with all his heart [14] eternal salvation.

[15] innocence, no one could be saved. God accepts the righteousness of man, that is, the submission of his will to God; he does not demand innocence itself, beyond our endeavour.

dire non possimus, tunc obedire furor esset. Consilium ergo Servatoris nostri (Matth. 10. 28.) locum habet, ne timete eos, qui occidunt corpus, sed animam occidere non possunt. Quicunque ergò tùm poenas hujus mundi propter violationem Legum Civilium, tùm poenas mundi venturi propter contumaciam erga Deum debitas effugere cupiunt, opus habent, ut distinguere quae sint necessaria, & quae non sint necessaria ad introitum in regnum coelorum doceantur.

Quae ad salutem aeternam necessaria sunt, duabus virtutibus continentur, Fide in Christum, & Obedientia Legibus praestita. Posterior harum, si perfecta esset, sola sufficeret. Caeterum quoniam Rei sumus omnes contumaciae in Deum, non solùm originaliter ab Adamo, sed etiam actu propter transgressiones proprias, opus nunc habemus non solùm, ut pro reliquo tempore Obedientes simus, sed etiam ut peccata praeterita nobis Remittantur. Quod autem ad Salutem nihil aliud necessarium sit, ex eo perspicuum est, quod Regnum Dei nemini clausum sit, praeterquam Legum Transgressoribus; neque illis, si Resipiscant, & Christianae Fidei Articulos ad salutem necessarios omnes credant.

Quod ad Obedientiam attinet, amplius à Deo (qui Voluntatem pro opere accipere promisit) non postulatur, quam obediendi conatus serius. Et propterea Obedientia saepenumerò sub nomine Charitatis, & Dilectionis commendatur. Significat enim Obediendi voluntatem. Et Servator noster Dilectionem Dei & proximi, totius Legis impletionem vocat.[d] Aliquando etiam pro Obedientia, Iustitia ponitur. Iustitia enim voluntas est suum cuique tribuendi,[e] id est Obediendi Legibus. Saepe etiam pro Obedientia, ponitur Resipiscentia, sive Poenitentia, quae significat aversionem à peccato, id est voluntatem ad Obedientiam revertendi. Quicunque ergo sincerè & toto corde Mandata [281] Dei implere cupit, item quemcunque peccatorum verè poenitet, & quicunque Deum toto corde diligit, & proximum sicut seipsum, omnem habet Obedientiam Saluti aeternae necessariam. Nam si postularet Deus Innocentiam, servari nemo posset.[f] Accipit Deus Iustitiam Hominis, id est Voluntatem Deo subactam, non exigit Innocentiam ipsam ultrà conatum nostrum.

And to what Laws.

But what [16]Commandements are those that God hath given us?[16] Are all those Laws °which were given to the Jews by the hand° of Moses, the [17]Commandements[17] of God? If they bee, why are not Christians taught to Obey them? If they be not, what others are so, besides the Law of Nature? For our Saviour Christ hath not given us new Laws, but Counsell to observe those wee are subject to; that is to say, the Laws of Nature, and the [18]Laws of our severall Soveraigns: Nor did he make any new Law to the Jews in his Sermon on the Mount, but onely expounded the Laws of Moses,[g] to which they were subject before. The Laws of God therefore are none but the Laws of Nature, whereof the principall is, that we should not violate our Faith, that is, a commandement to obey our Civill Soveraigns, which wee constituted over us, by mutuall pact one with another.[18] And this Law of God, that commandeth Obedience to the Law Civill, commandeth by consequence Obedience to all the Precepts of the Bible; which (as I have proved in the precedent Chapter) is there onely Law, where the Civill [19]Soveraign[19] hath made it so; and in other places but Counsell; which a man at his own perill, may without injustice [20]refuse to obey.[20] [323]

In the Faith of a Christian, who is the Person beleeved.

Knowing now what is the Obedience Necessary to Salvation, and to whom it is due; we are to consider next concerning Faith, whom, and why we beleeve; and what are the Articles, or Points necessarily to be beleeved by them that shall be saved. And first, for the Person whom we beleeve, because it is impossible to beleeve any Person, [21]before we know[21] what he saith, it is °necessary he be° one that wee have heard speak. °The Person therefore, whom° Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses and the Prophets beleeved, [22]was God himself,[22] that spake unto them supernaturally: And the Person, whom the Apostles and Disciples that [23]conversed[h] with Christ[23] beleeved, was our Saviour himself. But of them, to whom neither God °the Father,° nor our Saviour ever spake, it cannot be said, that [24]the Person whom they beleeved, was God. They beleeved[24] the Apostles, and after them the Pastors and Doctors of the Church, that recommended to [25]their faith[25] the History of the Old and New Testament: so that the Faith of Christians ever since our Saviours [26]time,[26]

Sed quaenam sunt Mandata illa Dei, quibus obedire necessarium est? Leges Mosaicae suntne omnes Leges Dei? Si sint, cur non docemur Christiani illis obedire? Si non sint, quaenam aliae sunt praeter Leges Naturae? Nam Servator noster non nobis novas tulit Leges, sed custodire docuit, quas habuimus, id est Leges Naturales & Civiles. Lex autem Dei, quae jubet Obedientiam Legibus Civilibus, jubet per consequens Obedientiam praestandam esse Praeceptis omnibus Scripturae Sacrae; quae Scripturae Sacrae (ut Capite praecedente ostensum est) ibi tantum Leges sunt, ubi à Potestate Civili in Leges sunt receptae. [h] Hobbes normally uses this verb in the sense of 'associate', 'consort' (OED, 'converse', v., 2); but it could also mean 'talk' (OED, 'converse', v., 4–5), which may be the sense suggested by his Latin translation here.

hath had for foundation, first, the reputation of their Pastors, and afterward, the authority of those that made the Old and New Testament °to be received for° the Rule of Faith; which none could do but Christian [27]Soveraignes;[27] who are therefore the Supreme Pastors, and the onely Persons, [28]whom Christians now hear speak from God; except such as[28] God speaketh to, in these days supernaturally. But because there be many false Prophets gone out into the world, [29]other men are[29] to examine °such Spirits (as St. Iohn adviseth us, 1 Epistle, Chap. 4. ver. 1.)° whether they be of God, or not. And therefore, seeing the Examination of Doctrines belongeth [30] to the Supreme Pastor, [31]the Person which all they that have no speciall revelation are to beleeve, is (in every Common-wealth) the Supreme Pastor, that is to say, the Civill Soveraigne.[31]

The causes of Christian Faith.

The causes why men beleeve °any° Christian Doctrine, are various: For Faith is the gift of God;[i] and he worketh it in [32]each severall man, by such[32] wayes, as it seemeth good unto himself. The most [33]ordinary immediate[33] cause of our beleef, concerning any point of Christian Faith, is, that wee [34] beleeve the Bible to be the Word of God. But why wee beleeve the Bible to be the Word of God, is much disputed, as all questions must needs bee, that are not well stated. For they make not the question to be, Why we Beleeve it, but, How wee Know it; as if Beleeving and Knowing were all one. And thence while one side ground their Knowledge upon the Infallibility of the Church, and the other side, on the Testimony of [35]the[35] Private Spirit, neither side concludeth what it pretends. For °how shall a man know° the Infallibility of the Church, [36]but by[36] knowing first the Infallibility of the Scripture? Or how shall a man know his own Private spirit to be other than [37]a beleef, grounded upon the Authority, and Arguments of his Teachers; or upon a Presumption of his own Gifts?[37] Besides, there is nothing in the Scripture, from which can be inferred the Infallibility of the Church; much lesse, of any particular Church; and least of all, the Infallibility of any particular man. Causae propter quas Doctrinam Christianam credimus, variae sunt. Est enim Fides donum Dei,[i] quam in diversis hominibus, viis diversis, pro ut sibi ipsi visum est, operatur. Causa propter quam Articulum aliquem Fidei credimus, frequentissima, & proxima est, quod Scripturas Sacras priùs crediderimus esse Verbum Dei. Quare autem Scripturas Sacras Verbum Dei esse credimus disputari solet, quemadmodum necessarium est multum disputari, quaestiones illas, quae non rectè proponuntur. Non enim quaerunt, cur credimus, sed, unde scimus; quasi idem esset credere, & scire. Dum ergo pars altera scientiam suam deducere conatur ab Infallibilitate Ecclesiae, altera à testimonio Spiritus sui privati, pars neutra id quod vult probat. Infallibilitas enim Ecclesiae, nisi Scripturarum Infallibilitate priùs cognitâ, sciri non potest. Spiritum autem suum privatum quis dignoscit, à Spiritu Doctorum illorum, quorum Authoritate ducitur, vel à Spiritu arrogantiae? Faith comes by Hearing.

It is manifest therefore, that Christian men doe not know, but onely beleeve the Scripture to be the Word of God; and that the [38]means of making them beleeve which God is pleased to afford men ordinarily, is according to the way of Nature, that is to say, from[38] their Teachers. It is the [39]Doctrine[39] of St. Paul concerning Christian Faith in generall, (Rom. 10. 17.) Faith cometh by Hearing, °that is, by Hearing our lawfull Pastors.° He saith also (ver. 14, 15. of the same Chapter) How shall they beleeve in him of whom they have not heard? and how shall they hear without a Preacher? and how shall they Preach, except they be sent? Whereby it is evident, that the °ordinary° cause of beleeving that the Scriptures are the Word of God, is the same with the cause of the beleeving of all other Articles °of our Faith,° namely, the Hearing of those that are by the Law °allowed and° appointed to Teach us, as our Parents in their Houses, and our Pastors in the Churches: Which also is made more manifest by experience. For what other cause can there bee assigned, why in Christian Common-wealths all men either beleeve, or at least professe the Scripture to bee the Word of God, and in other Common-wealths scarce any; but that in Christian Common-wealths they are taught it from their infancy; and in other places they are taught otherwise?[j]

But if Teaching be the cause of Faith, why doe not all beleeve? [40]It is certain therefore that[40] Faith is the gift of God,[k] and hee giveth it [41] to whom he will. Neverthelesse, because to them to whom he giveth it, he giveth it by the means of Teachers, the immediate cause of Faith is Hearing. In a School, where many are taught, and some profit, others profit not, the [42]cause of learning in them that profit, is the Master; yet it cannot be thence inferred, that learning is not the gift of God.[42] All good things proceed from God;[l] yet [43]cannot all that have them, say they are Inspired; for that implies a gift supernaturall, and the immediate hand of God; which he that pretends to, pretends to be a Prophet, and is[43] subject to the examination of the Church.

But whether men Know, or Beleeve, or Grant the Scriptures to be the Word of God; if out of such places of them, as are without obscurity, I shall shew what Articles of Faith are necessary, and onely necessary for [44] Salvation, those men must needs Know, Beleeve, or Grant the same.

Manifestum ergò est, homines Christianos, non scire, Scripturas esse Verbum Dei, sed tantum credere ita esse; & causam illis credendi frequentissimam esse Doctores suos. Hoc dicit S. Paulus universaliter de Fide Christiana, (Rom. 10. 17.) Fides est ex auditu; & (vers. 14, 15.) Quomodo autem credent, de quo non audierunt? Quomodo autem audient sine Praedicante? Quomodo autem praedicabunt nisi sint missi? Ex quo perspicuum est, causam credendi Scripturas esse Verbum Dei, eandem esse, propter quam credimus, Articulos alios omnes, nempe quod eos audimus, qui Lege constituti sunt (id est domi Parentes, in Ecclesiis Pastores) ut nos doceant. Quaenam enim causa alia reddi potest, quare in Civitatibus Christianis, Scripturas esse Verbum Dei, omnes credant, vel saltem credere se profiteantur, in Civitatibus caeteris, vix unus aut alter; nisi quod in Civitatibus Christianis, ab infantiâ id credere doceantur, in Civitatibus non Christianis doceantur contrarium.[j]

At si Fidei causa sit, doceri; cur non credunt omnes; nisi quod Fides sit donum Dei,[k] quod cui vult dat, & negat? Sed tamen quando dat, per Doctores dat; & proinde causâ Fidei immediata est auditus. Quemadmodum in ludo literarum, ubi docentur multi, quidam proficiunt, quidam non proficiunt, differentia non semper à Magistro est. Bona omnia à Deo quidem proficiscuntur,[l] sed per media [283] plerumque naturalia. Non est ergo temerè credendum illis, qui Doctrinis suis donum Dei praetendunt, supernaturale, doctrina enim eorum examinanda prius est ab Ecclesia.

Sed Scripturas esse Verbum Dei sive sciamus, sive credamus, sive concedamus; si ex illarum locis apertis, quinam Fidei Articuli ad Salutem aeternam sint necessarii & soli necessarii, ostendero; eos nec alios, necessarios esse Sciendum, Credendum vel Concedendum est.

The onely Necessary Article of Christian Faith;

The (Vnum Necessarium)[m] Onely Article of Faith, which the Scripture maketh °simply° Necessary to [45] Salvation, is this, that JESUS IS THE CHRIST. By the name of Christ, is understood the King, which God had before promised by the Prophets of the Old Testament, to send into the world, to reign (over the Jews, and over such of other nations as should beleeve in him) °under himself eternally;° and to give them that eternall life, which was lost [46]by the sin of[46] Adam. Which when I have proved °out of Scripture,° I will further shew [47]when, and in what sense[47] some other Articles may bee also called Necessary. [325]

Proved from the Scope of the Evangelists:

For Proof that the Beleef of this Article, Iesus is the Christ, is all the Faith required to Salvation, my first Argument shall bee from the Scope of the Evangelists; which was by the description of the life of our Saviour, to establish that one Article, Iesus is the Christ. The summe of St. Matthews Gospell is this, That Jesus was of the stock of David; Born of a Virgin; °which are the Marks of the true Christ:° That the Magi came to worship [48] him as King of the Jews: That Herod [49]for the same cause[49] sought to kill him: That John Baptist proclaimed him[50]: That he preached by himselfe, and his Apostles that he was that King: That he taught the Law, not as a Scribe, but as a man of Authority: That he cured diseases by his Word onely, and did °many° other Miracles, which [51]were[51] foretold the Christ should doe: That he [52]was saluted King when hee entred into Jerusalem: That he fore-warned them to beware of all[52] others that should pretend to be Christ: That he was taken, accused, and put to death, for saying, hee was King: That the [53]cause of his condemnation[53] written on the Crosse, was JESUS OF NAZARETH, THE KING OF THE JEWES. All which tend to no other end than this, that men should beleeve, that Iesus is the Christ. Such therefore was the [54]Scope[54] of St. Matthews Gospel. But the Scope of [55]all the Evangelists (as may appear by reading them)[55] was the same. °Therefore the Scope of the whole Gospell, was the establishing of that onely Article.° And St. John expressely makes it his conclusion[56], Iohn 20. 31. These things are written, that you may [57]know[57] that Iesus is the Christ, the Son of °the living° God.

Vnum necessarium,[m] nempe unicus articulus Fidei, quem ad Salutem aeternam necessarium, faciunt Scripturae Sacrae, hic est, Quod Iesus est Christus. Per nomen autem Christi, intelligitur Rex ille quem Deus per Prophetas Veteris Testamenti, missurum se esse in mundum, promiserat, ut regnaret in Iudaeos, & gentes alias in illum crediturus; & qui vitam aeternam, quam perdideramus in Adamo, restitueret. Quod cum probavero, ostendam, quatenus necessarii sunt etiam Articuli alii nonnulli.

Ad probandum, quod tota Fides ad Salutem necessaria continetur in uno hoc Articulo, Iesus est Christus; argumentum primum sumetur ab Euangelistarum Scopo. Scopus autem eorum is erat ut in Servatoris nostri vita describenda illum unum Articulum stabilirent. Euangelii S. Matthaei Summa haec est, Iesum fuisse ex stirpe Davidis; natum ex Virgine; venisse Magos ut eum pro Rege Iudaeorum agnoscerent & adorarent; Herodem, eum, ne regnaret, conatum esse interficere; Iohannem Baptistam illum Regem proclamasse; Christum ipsum Apostolosque ejus Regem illum esse praedicâsse; Legem docuisse non ut Scribae, sed ut qui haberet Authoritatem; morbos solo verbo sanâsse, aliaque Miracula fecisse, quae Christum facturum esse praedixerant Prophetae; monuisse Discipulos, ne aliis qui se Christos profiterentur, crederent; captum, accusatum & occisum, quod se Regem esse dixerit; titulum Cruci inscriptum fuisse Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum. Quae omnia eo spectaverunt ut crederent homines Iesum esse Christum. Summa haec est Euangelii scripti à Matthaeo. Euangelistarum autem reliquorum scopus idem erat. Iohannes autem de Euangelio suo in fine expressè dicit, (Ioh. 20. 31.) Haec scripta sunt, ut credatis Iesum esse Christum illum Filium Dei.

From the Sermons of the Apostles:

My second Argument is taken from the Subject of the Sermons of the Apostles, both whilest our Saviour lived on earth, and after his Ascension. The Apostles in our Saviours time were sent [58], Luke 9. 2. to Preach the Kingdome of God: °For neither there,° nor Mat. 10. 7. giveth he any Commission to them, other than this, As ye go, Preach, saying, the Kingdome of [59]Heaven[59] is at hand; that is, that Iesus is the Messiah, the Christ, the King which was to come. That their Preaching also after his ascension was the same, is manifest out of Acts 17. 6.[n] They drew (saith St. Luke) Iason and certain Brethren unto the Rulers of the City, crying, These that have turned the world upside down are come hither also, whom Iason hath received. And these all do contrary to the Decrees of Caesar, saying, that there is another King, one Iesus: And out of the 2. & 3. verses of the same Chapter, where it is said, that St. Paul as his manner was, went in unto them; and three Sabbath dayes reasoned with them out of the Scriptures; opening[p] and [60]alledging,[60] [q] that Christ must needs have suffered, and risen againe from the dead, and that this Iesus (whom [61]hee preached)[61] is Christ.

From the Easinesse of the Doctrine:

The third Argument is, from those places of Scripture, by which all the Faith required to Salvation is declared to be Easie. For if an inward assent of the mind to all the Doctrines concerning Christian Faith now taught, (whereof [62]the greatest[62] part are disputed,) were necessary °to Salvation,° there would be nothing in the world so hard, as to be a Christian. The Thief upon the Crosse °though repenting,° [326] could not have been saved for saying, Lord remember me when thou commest into thy Kingdome;[r] by which he testified no beleefe of any other Article, but this, That Iesus was the [63]King.[63] Nor could it bee said [64] (as it is Mat. 11. 30.) that Christs yoke is Easy, and his burthen Light: Nor that Little Children beleeve in him, as it is Matth. 18. 6. Nor could St. Paul have said (1 Cor. 1. 21.) It pleased God by the Foolishnesse of preaching, to save them that beleeve: Nor could St. Paul himself have [65]been saved,[65] much lesse have been so great a Doctor of the Church so suddenly, that never [66]perhaps thought[66] of Transubstantiation, nor Purgatory, nor many other Articles now obtruded.

Argumentum secundum est à Subjecto Concionum Apostolicarum, tùm ante, tùm post Ascensionem Christi. Ante Ascensionem suam misit Apostolos suos Luc. 9. 2. Regnum Dei praedicaturos; & (Matth. 10. 7.) mandavit illis hoc solum, Iter facientes proclamate dicentes, Appropinquavit, Regnum Dei, id est, Iesum esse Messiam, Christum, Regem, qui venturus erat. Item post Ascensionem Christi idem [284] praedicaverunt, ut patet ex Act. 17. 6.[n] Traxerunt Iasonem, & quosdam fratres ad Civitatis Magistratus, vociferando, Isti qui Orbis terrarum statum subverterunt, etiam hic adsunt: Quos excepit Iason: qui omnes contra Edicta Caesaris faciunt Regem alium dicentes esse, nempe Iesum. Et (vers. 2. 3. capitis ejusdem,) Paulus vero sicut consueverat introivit ad eos, & per Sabbatha tria disseruit cum iis ex Scripturis; explicans, & ob oculos ponens oportuisse Christum pati, & resurgere ex mortuis; & hunc Iesum, quem ego, inquit, annuncio vobis esse Christum illum.

Argumentum tertium sumitur ab iis locis Scripturae, quae Fidem omnem ad Salutem necessariam, dicunt esse facilem. Si enim assensus animi internus, ad omnes doctrinas Fidei, quae nunc docentur (quarum magna pars hodie disputatur) ut necessarius requireretur, nihil difficilius esse posset, quam esse Christianum. Latro in cruce propter verba haec, Domine memento mei cum veneris in Regnum tuum,[r] quibus alium Articulum confessus non est, praeter hunc Iesum esse Christum, salvari non potuerat. Nec potuerat dixisse Christus (Matth. cap. 11. vers. 30.) Iugum meum facile est, & onus meum leve est. Neque (Matth. 18. 6.) Parvos pueros in illum credere; nec potuerat dixisse Paulus (1 Cor. 1. 21.) Libuit Deo per stultitiam praedicationis servare credentes; Neque denique Paulus ipse tam subito Christianus multo minus Doctor Ecclesiae adeo eminens fieri potuerat, qui de Transubstantiatione, Purgatorio, aliisque Articulis multis quae nunc obtruduntur, nunquam quicquam audierat.

From formall and cleer texts.

The fourth Argument is taken from places °expresse, and° such as receive no controversie of Interpretation; as first, Iohn 5. 39. Search the Scriptures, for in them yee [67]thinke yee[67] have eternall life; and they are they that testifie of mee. [68]Our Saviour here speaketh of the Scriptures onely of the Old Testament; for the Jews at that time could not search the Scriptures of the New Testament, which were not[68] written. But the Old Testament hath nothing of Christ, but the Markes [69] by which men might know him when hee came; as that he should descend from David; be born at Bethlem, and of a Virgin; doe great Miracles, °and the like.° Therefore to beleeve that this Jesus was He, was sufficient to eternall life: but more than sufficient is not Necessary; and consequently no other Article is required. Again, (Iohn 11. 26.) Whosoever liveth and beleeveth in mee, shall not die eternally, °Therefore to beleeve in Christ, is faith sufficient to eternall life; and consequently no more faith than that is Necessary,° But to beleeve in Jesus, and to beleeve that Jesus is the Christ, is all one, as appeareth in [70]the verses immediately following. For when our Saviour (verse 26.) had[70] said to Martha, Beleevest thou this? she answereth °(verse 27.)° Yea Lord, I beleeve that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world: Therefore this Article alone is °faith° sufficient to [71]life eternall; and more than sufficient is not Necessary.[71] Thirdly, Iohn 20. 31. These things are written that yee might beleeve, That Iesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that beleeving yee might have life through his name. There, to beleeve that Iesus is the Christ, is [72]faith[72] sufficient to the obtaining of [73]life; and therefore no other Article is Necessary.[73] Fourthly, 1 Iohn 4. 2. Every spirit that confesseth that Iesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God. And 1 Ioh. 5. 1. Whosoever beleeveth that Iesus is the Christ, is born of God. And verse 5. Who is hee that overcommeth the world, but he that beleeveth that Iesus is the Son of God? Fiftly, Act. 8. ver. 36, 37. See (saith the Eunuch[74]) here is water, what doth hinder me to be baptized? And Philip said, If thou beleevest with all thy heart thou mayst. And hee answered and said, I beleeve that Iesus Christ is the Son of God. Therefore this Article beleeved, Iesus is the Christ, is sufficient to Baptisme, that is to say, to our Reception into the Kingdome of God, and by consequence, onely Necessary. And generally in all places where our Saviour saith to any man, Thy [327] faith hath saved thee,[s] the cause he saith it, is some Confession, which directly, or by consequence, [75]implyeth a beleef,[75] that Jesus is the Christ.

1 From] Form B 24 in] into B

Argumentum quartum sumitur à locis quibusdam, de quorum interpretatione nunquam extitit controversia, ut (Ioh. 5. 39.) Scrutamini Scripturas, quia videmini vobis in ipsis vitam aeternam habere; & illae sunt quae testantur de me. Scripturae autem illae, aliae non erant praeter Testamentum Vetus; Novum enim nondum scriptum erat. Sed in Testamento Vetere de Christo nihil invenitur, praeter Notas & signa per quae, cum veniret, agnosci posset; nimirum, quod esset ex stirpe Davidis; nasciturus in Bethlehem, ex Virgine, faceretque magna Miracula. Credere ergo Iesum esse illum, satis erat ad vitam aeternam; plusquam autem satis necessarium non est. Et per consequens Articulus ille solus necessarius est. Item Iohannes dicit (cap. 11. 26.) Quisquis vivit, & credit in me, non morietur in aeternum. Sed credere in Iesum, idem est quod credere Iesum esse Christum; ut apparet ex vers. 27, ubi Marthae dicit Christus, Credis hoc? Et illa respondet, Etiam Domine, ego credo te esse Christum illum Filium Dei, qui in mundum venturus erat. Solus ergo ad salutem sufficit Articulus ille unus. Item (Ioh. 20. 31.) Haec scripta sunt ut credatis Iesum esse Christum, Filium Dei, & ut credentes vitam habeatis [285] per nomen ejus.Vbi rursus credere Iesum esse Christum sufficere significatur ad vitam aeternam obtinendam. Rursus (1 Ioh. 4. 2.) Omnis Spiritus, qui confitetur Iesum Christum venisse in carne, ex Deo est, & (1 Ioh. 5. vers. 1.) Quicunque credidit Iesum esse Christum, ex Deo natus est. Et (vers. 5,) Quis est qui vincit mundum, nisi qui credit Iesum esse Filium Dei. Et (Act. 8. 36, 37.) Eunuchus dixit Philippo, En aquam; quid prohibet me baptizari? Dixit autem Philippus, si credis ex toto corde, licet. Respondens autem ille dixit, Credo Iesum Christum esse Filium Dei. Articulus ergo hic Iesus est Christus sufficit ad Baptismum, id est ad Receptionem in Regnum Dei, & per consequens, solus necessarius est. Etiam universaliter in locis omnibus ubi dicit cuiquam Christus, Fides tua te salvum facit,[s] causa dicti est confessio aliqua per quam directè vel ex consequentia intelligitur, Iesum esse Christum.

From that it is the Foundation of all other Articles.

The last Argument is from the places, where this Article is made the Foundation of Faith: For he that holdeth the Foundation shall bee saved. Which places are first, Mat. 24. 23.[t] If any man shall say unto you, Loe, here is Christ, or there, beleeve it not, for there shall arise false Christs, and false Prophets, and shall shew great signes and wonders, &c. Here wee see, this Article Jesus is the Christ, must bee held, though hee that shall teach the contrary should doe great miracles. The second place is, Gal. 1. 8. Though we, or an Angell from Heaven preach any other Gospell unto you, than that wee have preached unto you, let him bee accursed. But the Gospell which Paul, and the other Apostles, preached, was °onely° this Article, that Jesus is the Christ: Therefore °for the Beleef of this Article,° we are to reject the Authority of an Angell from heaven; much more of any mortall man, if he teach the contrary. This is therefore the Fundamentall Article of Christian Faith. A third place is, 1 Joh. 4. 1.[u] Beloved, beleeve not every spirit. Hereby yee shall know the Spirit of God; every spirit that confesseth that Iesus Christ is come in the flesh, is of God. By which it is evident, that this Article, is the measure, and rule, by which to estimate, and examine all other Articles; and is therefore onely Fundamentall. A fourth is, Matt. 16. 18. where after St. Peter had [76]professed this Article, saying[76] to our Saviour, Thou art Christ the Son of the living God, Our Saviour answered, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church: from whence I inferre, that this Article is that, on which all other Doctrines of the Church are built, as on their Foundation. A fift is (1 Cor. 3. ver. 11, 12, &c.)[v] Other Foundation can no man lay, than that which is laid, Jesus is the Christ. Now if any man build upon this Foundation, Gold, Silver, pretious Stones, Wood, Hay, Stubble; Every mans work shall be made manifest; For the Day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every mans work, of what sort it is. If any mans work abide, which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward: If any mans work shall bee burnt, he shall suffer losse; but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire. Which words, being partly plain and easie to understand, and partly allegoricall and difficult; out of that which is plain, may be inferred, that Pastors that teach this Foundation, that Jesus is the Christ, though they draw from it false consequences, [77](which all men are sometimes subject to,) they may neverthelesse[77] bee saved; much more that they may bee saved, who °being no Pastors, but Hearers,° beleeve that which is by their lawfull Pastors taught them. Therefore °the beleef of° this Article is sufficient; and by consequence, [78]there is no other Article of Faith Necessarily required[78] to Salvation. [328]

3–4 Articles] om. B 32 false] self B

Argumentum ultimum sumitur à locis illis Scripturae, ubi Articulus hic dicitur esse Fundamentum Fidei; salvabitur enim, qui tenet Fundamentum. Locus primus est Matth. 24. 23.[t] Si quis vobis dixerit, Ecce, hic est Christus, aut hic: ne credite. Excitabuntur enim Pseudochristi, & Pseudoprophetae, & edent signa magna & miracula, &c. Videmus hic Articulum illum Iesum esse Christum tenendum esse, etsi Miracula magna fecerint qui docent contrarium. Locus secundus est Gal. 1. 8. Etiam si nos, aut Angelus è Coelo Euangelizet vobis praeter id, quod vobis Euangelizavimus, Anathema sit. Id autem quod Paulus & Apostoli reliqui euangelizaverunt, Articulus erat hic, Iesus est Christus. Authoritas ergo Angeli è Coelo, multò magis hominis mortalis, si contrarium doceant negligenda est. Est ergo Articulus ille Fidei Christianae Fundamentum. Tertius locus est 1 Ioh. 4. 1.[u] Dilecti, ne cuivis Spiritui credite. Ex hoc cognoscite Dei Spiritum: quicunque Spiritus profitetur Iesum Christum in carne venisse, ex Deo est. Perspicuum hinc est Articulum illum mensuram & regulam esse, per quam omnes alii Articuli examinandi & judicandi sunt, & per consequens solum esse Fundamentalem. Locus quartus est Matth. 16. 18. Vbi postquam S. Petrus Christo dixisset, tu es Christus, Filius Dei viventis, respondit Christus, tu es Petrus, & super hanc petram aedificabo meam Ecclesiam. Articulus ergo ille Fundamentum est, cui innituntur reliqui omnes Ecclesiae Articuli. Locus quintus est, 1 Cor. 3. vers. 11, 12, &c.[v] Fundamentum aliud nemo potest statuere praeter id quod positum est, quod Iesus est Christus. Quod si quis superaedificet super Fundamentum hoc, aurum, argentum, Lapides pretiosos, ligna, foenum, stipulam, cujusque opus manifestum fiet: dies enim id declarabit; nam per ignem revelabitur: & cujusque opus quale sit, ignis probabit: si cujus opus manserit quod superaedificaverit, mercedem accipiet. Si cujus opus exustum fuerit, damnum faciet. Ipse [286] vero servabitur: ita tamen ut per ignem. Quae verba cum sint partim perspicua, & intellectu facilia, & partim allegorica & difficilia; concludo ex perspicuis, Pastores, si fundamentum doceant, nempe Iesum esse Christum, quanquam falsas inde consequentias aliquas deducant (ut hominibus quibuscunque pronum est errare) salvandos tamen esse; multo magis salvari posse illos qui ea credunt, quae à Pastoribus suis legitimis didicere. Now for the part which is Allegoricall, as That the fire shall try every mans work, and that They shall be saved, but so as [79]by fire, or through fire, (for the originall is διὰ πυρός,)[w] it maketh nothing against this conclusion which I have drawn from the other words, that are plain. Neverthelesse, because upon this place there hath been an argument taken, to prove the fire of Purgatory,[x] I will also here offer you my conjecture concerning the meaning of this triall of Doctrines, and saving of men as by Fire. The Apostle here[79] seemeth to allude to the words of the Prophet Zachary,[y] Ch. 13. 8, 9. [80]who speaking of the Restauration of the Kingdome of God, saith thus,[80] Two parts therein shall be cut off, and die, but the third shall be left therein; And I will bring the third part through the Fire, and will refine them as Silver is refined, and will try them as Gold is tryed; they shall call on the name of the Lord, and I will hear them. The day of Judgment, is the day of the Restauration of the Kingdome of God; and at that day it is, that St. Peter tells us * shall be the Conflagration of the world, wherein the wicked shall perish; but the remnant which God will save, shall passe through that Fire, unhurt, and be therein (as Silver and Gold °are refined by the fire from their drosse°) tryed, and [81]refined from[81] their Idolatry, and °be made to° call upon the name of the true God. Alluding whereto St. Paul here saith, That the Day (that is, the Day of Judgment, the Great Day of [82]our Saviours comming to restore the Kingdome of God in Israel)[82] shall try every [83]mans[83] doctrine, by Judging, [84]which are Gold, Silver, Pretious Stones, Wood, Hay, Stubble;[84] And then they that have built false [85]Consequences[85] on the true Foundation, shall see their Doctrines condemned; neverthelesse they themselves shall be saved, and passe unhurt through this °universall° Fire, and live eternally, to call upon the name of the true °and onely° God. In which sense there is nothing that [86]accordeth not with the rest of Holy Scripture, or any glimpse of the fire[86] of Purgatory.

sarius est. Quod attinet ad verba illa Allegorica, uniuscujusque opus per ignem probandum esse, & salvandos esse, ita tamen ut per ignem, videntur alludere ad verba Prophetae Zachariae cap. 13. 8, 9. Dictum Iehovae, ut partibus duabus in terra excisis & expirantibus, tertia relinquatur in ea: & inducam tertiam istam in ignem, conflansque eos, ut conflatur argentum, probabo eos, quemadmodum probatur aurum: & invocabunt nomen meum, & ego exaudiam eos. Dies Iudicii est dies restitutionis Regni Dei; & illo die futuram esse mundi conflagrationem dicit S. Petrus (2 Pet. 3. 7, &c.) In qua conflagratione peribunt quidem improbi, reliqui autem, quos Deus salvos esse vult, transibunt per ignem illaesi, & in eo igne (sicut aurum & argentum) probabuntur, & purgati ab Idololatria, nomen invocabunt Dei veri. Ad haec verba alludens S. Paulus Diem (inquit) id est diem Iudicii, diem Magnum restitutionis Regni Dei, Pastorum doctrinas probaturum esse, an sint purae, ut aurum, argentum &c. an inutiles ut lignum, foenum, &c. tunc autem, qui super fundamentum verum falsa aut nugatoria aedificaverunt, ea videbunt condemnata; ipsi tamen salvabuntur, & transibunt per ignem hunc illaesi ad vitam aeternam, nomen veri Dei invocaturi. In qua interpretatione nihil est, quod Fidei Christianae sit contrarium; sed ne scintilla quidem Purgatorii.

In what sense other Articles may be called Necessary.

But a man may here aske, whether it bee not as necessary to Salvation, to beleeve, that God is Omnipotent; Creator of the world; that Jesus Christ is risen; and that all men else shall rise again from the dead at the last day; as to beleeve, that Jesus is the Christ. To which I answer, they are[87]; and so are many more Articles: but [88]they are such, as[88] are contained in this one, °and may be deduced from it, with more, or lesse difficulty.° For who is there that does not see, that they who beleeve Jesus to be the Son of the [89]God of Israel, and that the Israelites had for God the Omnipotent Creator of all things, doe therein[89] also beleeve, that God is the Omnipotent Creator of all things? Or how can a man beleeve, that Jesus is the King that shall reign eternally, unlesse hee beleeve him also risen again from the dead? For a dead man cannot [90]exercise the Office of a King.[90] In summe, he that holdeth this Foundation, Jesus is the Christ, holdeth [91]Expressely all that hee seeth rightly deduced from it, and Implicitely all that is consequent thereunto, though he have not skill enough to discern the consequence.[91] And [329] therefore it holdeth still good, that the beleef of this one Article is sufficient faith to obtaine remission of sinnes to the Penitent, and consequently [92]to bring them into the Kingdome of Heaven.[92]

That Faith, and Obedience are both of them Necessary to Salvation.

Now that I have shewn, that all the Obedience required to Salvation, consisteth in the will to [93]obey[93] the Law of God, that is to say, in Repentance[94]; and all the Faith required to the same, is comprehended in °the beleef of° this Article Jesus is the Christ; I will further alledge[z] those places of [95]the Gospell,[95] that prove, that all that is [96] Necessary to Salvation is contained in both these joined together. The men [97]to whom St. Peter preached[97] on the day of Pentecost, next after the Ascension of our Saviour, asked him, and the rest of the Apostles, saying, (Act. 2. 37.) Men and Brethren what shall we doe? To whom St. Peter answered (in the next verse) Repent, and be Baptized [98] every one of you, for the remission of sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. Therefore Repentance, and Baptisme, [99]that is, beleeving that Jesus is the Christ, is[99] all that is Necessary to Salvation. Again, our Saviour being asked by a certain Ruler, (Luke 18. 18.) [100] What shall I doe to [101]inherite[101] eternall life? Answered (verse 20.) Thou knowest the Commandements, Doe not commit Adultery, Doe not Kill, Doe not Steal, Doe not bear false witnesse, Honor thy Father, and thy Mother: which when he said he had observed, our Saviour added, Sell all thou hast, give it to the Poor, [102] and °come and° follow me: which Quaeret fortasse aliquis an aequè necessarium ad salutem non sit, credere Deum esse Omnipotentem; Creatorem mundi; Iesum Christum resurrexisse; & homines in die ultimo resurrecturos esse omnes; ac credere Iesum esse Christum. Respondeo hos omnes multosque alios Articulos necessarios quidem aequè esse, sed ideò, quia in illo uno continentur. Quis enim est, qui non vidit, credentes Iesum esse Filium Dei Omnipotentis, necessariò simul credere Deum esse rerum omnium Creatorem Omnipotentem? Aut quomodo credi potest Iesum Regem esse in aeternum regnaturum, ab eo qui illum non credit resurrexisse à mortuis. Mortuus enim regnare non potest. Quicunque autem Fundamentum tenet, Iesum esse Christum, omnia tenet quae inde inferri possunt, sive illationis vim ipse intelligit sive non intelligit. Firmum ergo restat unum hunc Articulum creditum, Poenitentibus ad remissionem peccatorum, Fidei satis esse, & proinde solum necessarium. [287]

Ostensum antè est, Obedientiam, quanta ad salutem aeternam requiritur, consistere in voluntate implendi Legem Dei, quatenus possumus, id est in Poenitentia peccantium. Ostensum item est Fidem, quanta ad salutem necessaria est, contineri in hoc Articulo, Iesus est Christus. Loca Scripturae nunc proferam aliqua quibus probatur, omnia simpliciter ad vitam aeternam necessaria contineri in illis simul conjunctis. Homines illi, quos Sanctus Petrus, die Pentecostes, post Ascensionem Servatoris nostri proximo, praedicatione sua, ad Fidem Christianam converterat, Petrum caeterosque Apostolos interrogaverunt (Act. 2. 37.) Quid faciemus viri fratres? Quibus (proximo versu) respondit Petrus, Resipiscite, & Baptizetur unusquisque vestrûm in nomen Iesu Christi, in remissionem peccatorum: & accipietis donum Spiritus Sancti. Baptizari ergo in nomen Iesu Christi, una cum poenitentia, omnia continet ad salutem necessaria. Rursùs cum à quodam ex primoribus interrogaretur Christus (Luc. 18. 18.) Magister bone, quid faciendo vitam aeternam possidebo? Respondit illi Servator noster (vers. 20.) Praecepta nosti, Ne moechare, Ne occidito, Ne furare, Ne falsum testimonium dicito: Honora Patrem tuum & Matrem tuam. Quae cum observâsse se dixisset, adjecit Christus, Omnia quae habes vende, & distribue pauperibus, & habebis Thesaurum in coelo: & sequere me, was as much as to say, Relye on me that am the King: Therefore to fulfill the Law, and to beleeve that Jesus is the King, is all that is required [103]to bring a man to[103] eternall life. Thirdly, St. Paul saith (Rom. 1. 17.) The Just shall live by Faith; not every one, but the Just; therefore Faith and Justice [104](that is, the will to be Just, or Repentance) are all that is Necessary to life eternall.[104] And (Mark 1. 15.) °our Saviour preached, saying, The time is fulfilled, and° the Kingdom of God is at hand, Repent and Beleeve the Evangile, that is, the Good news that the Christ was come. Therefore to Repent, and to Beleeve that Jesus is [105]the Christ,[105] is all that is required to Salvation.

What each of them contributes thereunto.

Seeing then °it is Necessary° that Faith, and Obedience [106](implyed in the word Repentance) do both concurre to[106] [aa] our Salvation; the question by which of the two we are Justified, is [107]impertinently[107] [ab] disputed. Nevertheless, it will not be [108]impertinent,[108] to make manifest in what °manner each of them contributes thereunto; and in what° sense it is said, that we are to be Justified by the one, and by the other. And first, if by Righteousnesse be understood the Justice of the Works themselves, [109]there is no man that can be saved; for there is none that hath not[109] transgressed the Law of God. And therefore [110]when wee are said to be Justified by Works, it is to be understood of the Will, which God doth alwaies accept for the Work it selfe, as well in good, as in evill men.[110] And in this sense onely it is, that a man is called Iust, °or Vnjust;° and that his Justice Justifies him, °that is, gives him the title, in Gods acceptation, of Just; and renders him capable of living by his Faith, which before he was not.° So that Justice Justifies [330] [111]in that sense, in which to Justifie, is the same that to Denominate a man Iust; and not in the signification of discharging the Law; whereby the punishment of his sins should be unjust.[111]

But a man is then also said to be Justified, when his Plea, though °in it selfe° unsufficient, is accepted[112]; as when we Plead [113] our Will, our Endeavour to fulfill the Law, and [114]Repent us of our failings, and God accepteth it for the Performance it selfe:[114] And because God accepteth not the Will for the Deed, but onely in [115]the Faithfull; it is therefore Faith that makes good our Plea; and in this sense it is,[115] that Faith onely Justifies: So that Faith and Obedience [116]are both Necessary to Salvation; yet in severall senses each of them is said[116] to Justifie.

id est, confide in me, qui sum Rex. Itaque Legem implere, & credere Iesum esse Regem, totum est quod requiritur ad vitam aeternam. Praeterea, Sanctus Paulus dicit (Rom. 1. 17.) Iustus ex Fide vivit; non dicit unusquisque, sed Iustus. Fides ergo & Iustitia conjunctim, omnia continent ad salutem necessaria. Postremò (Marc. 1. 15.) Appropinquavit Regnum Dei; resipiscite, & credite Euangelio. Itaque resipiscere & credere Iesum esse Regem, sufficiunt ad Salutem.

Cum ergo Fides & Obedientia utraque necessaria sit ad salutem, quaestio, utra earum justificet, frustra disputatur. Quo autem sensu justificare dicatur una & altera, explicare non inutile erit. Si per Iustitiam intelligatur Iustitia operum; Iustificari qui Legem Dei semel transgressus est, potest nemo. Intelligenda ergo est Iustitia hominis, Legem Dei observare conantis. Voluntatem enim accipit Deus pro ipso opere. Atque hoc sensu solo est, quod homo aliquis dici potest Iustus; & quod per Iustitiam suam justificatus sit. Iustitia ergo justificat, quatenus Iustum denominat, non quatenus Legem ita impleverit, ut puniri justè non possit.

Sed justificari etiam dicitur is, cujus Defensio, quanquam non sufficiens, recipitur tamen, & approbatur; ut cum pro defensione allegamus, quod Voluimus, quod conati sumus Legem implere, & quod peccata nostra ipsi condemnavimus. Quoniam ergo Deus voluntatem [288] pro ipso opere eorum tantum accipit, qui credunt in Iesum Christum; Fides sola, in hac verbi acceptatione justificare dici potest; adeo ut Fides & Obedientia utraque justificent; sed in diversa significatione vocis Iustificare.

Obedience to God and to the Civill Soveraign not inconsistent, whether Christian,

Having thus shewn what is Necessary to Salvation; it is not hard to reconcile our Obedience to God, with our Obedience to the [117]Civill Soveraign;[117] who is either Christian, or Infidel. If he bee a Christian, he [118]alloweth the beleefe of[118] this Article, that Iesus is the Christ; [119]and of all the Articles that are contained in, or are by evident consequence deduced from it: which is all the Faith Necessary to Salvation. And because he is a Soveraign, he requireth Obedience to all his owne, that is, to all[119] the Civill Laws; in which also are contained all the Laws of Nature, °that is, all the Laws of God: for besides the Laws of Nature, and the Laws of the Church, which are part of the Civill Law, (for the Church that can make Laws is the Common-wealth,) there bee no other Laws Divine.° Whosoever therefore obeyeth his Christian [120]Soveraign,[120] is not thereby hindred, °neither from beleeving, nor° from obeying God. But suppose that a Christian King should from this Foundation Iesus is the Christ, draw some [121]false consequences, that is to say, make some superstructions of Hay, or Stubble, and command the teaching of the same; yet seeing St. Paul says, he shal be saved;[ac] much more shall he be saved, that teacheth them by his command; and much more yet, he that teaches not, but onely beleeves his lawfull Teacher. And in case[ad] a Subject be forbidden by the Civill Soveraign to professe some of those his opinions, upon what just ground can he disobey? Christian Kings may erre in deducing a Consequence, but who shall Judge? Shall a private man Judge, when the question is of his own obedience? Or shall any man Judg but he that is appointed thereto by the Church, that is, by the Civill Soveraign that representeth it? or if the Pope, or an Apostle Judge, may he not erre in deducing of a consequence? did not one of the two, St. Peter, or St. Paul erre in a superstructure, when St. Paul withstood St. Peter to his face?[ae] There can therefore be no contradiction between the Laws of God, and the Laws of a Christian Common-wealth.[121]

Cum ostensum jam sit, quaenam ea sint quae necessariò requiruntur ad Salutem; Obedientiam erga Deum, cum Obedientia erga Reges reconciliare difficile non est. Rex enim aut Christianus est, aut Infidelis. Si Christianus, Articulum hunc Iesum esse Christum, neminem negare cogit. Legibus autem Civilibus, in quibus continentur Leges omnes Naturales, rectè & jurè obedire cogit. Qui ergo Regi suo Christiano, obedientiam praestat, obedire Deo non impeditur. Sed si Rex Christianus qui Fundamentum tenet Iesum esse Christum, Doctrinas aliquas per imperitiam inde deducens, doceri & teneri imperet, imperato obediendum est. Obediri enim sine animae periculo potest. Iudicare autem, in Quaestione de sua ipsius obedientia Civili, jure nemo potest. Iudicat enim de doctrinis Fidei nemo praeter Ecclesiam, id est praeter illum, qui personam gerit Ecclesiae, id est praeter Regem, si sit Christianus.

Or Infidel. And [122]when the Civill Soveraign[122] is an Infidel, every one of his own Subjects that resisteth him, sinneth against [123]the Laws of God (for such are the Laws of Nature,) and rejecteth[123] the counsell of the Apostles, that admonisheth all Christians to obey their Princes, and all Children and Servants to obey their Parents, and Masters, in all [331] things.[af] And for [124]their Faith,[124] it is internall, and invisible; [125]They have the licence[125] that Naaman had,[ag] and need not put themselves into danger for it. But if they do, they ought to expect their reward in [126]Heaven,[126] and not complain of their Lawfull [127]Soveraign; much lesse[127] make warre upon him. °For he that is not glad of any just occasion of Martyrdome, has not the faith he professeth, but pretends it onely, to set some colour upon[ah] his own contumacy.°[ai] But what Infidel King is so unreasonable, as knowing he has a Subject, that waiteth for [128]the second comming of Christ, after the present world shall bee burnt, and intendeth then to obey him (which is the intent of beleeving that Iesus is the Christ,) and in the mean time thinketh himself bound to obey the Laws of that Infidel King, (which all Christians are obliged in conscience to doe,) to put to death, or to persecute such a Subject?[128]

And thus much shall suffice, concerning the Kingdome of God, and Policy[aj] Ecclesiasticall. [129]Wherein I pretend not to advance any Position of my own, but onely to shew what are the Consequences that seem to me deducible from the Principles of Christian Politiques, (which are the holy Scriptures,) in confirmation of the Power of Civill Soveraigns, and the Duty of their Subjects. And in the allegation[ak] of Scripture, I have endeavoured to avoid such texts as are of obscure, or controverted Interpretation; and to alledge none, but in such sense as is most plain, and agreeable to the harmony and[129] scope of the whole Bible; which was written for the re-establishment of the Kingdome of God in Christ. For it is not the bare Words, but the Scope of the writer that giveth the true light, by which [130]any writing is[130] to bee interpreted; and they that [131]insist upon[131] single Texts, without considering the [132]main Designe, can derive[132] nothing from them cleerly; but rather by casting atomes of Scripture, as dust °before mens eyes,° make every thing more obscure than it is; an ordinary artifice of those that seek not the truth, but their own advantage.

Sed etsi Rex Infidelis sit, suorum tamen subditorum quicunque illi restiterit, peccat contra Deum, quia contra Leges Naturae peccat, quae sunt Divinae. Peccat etiam contra Consilium Apostolorum, Christianos omnes Principibus suis, Filios omnes Parentibus suis, & Servos omnes Dominis suis obedire praecipientium, idque in Omnibus.[af] Quod autem attinet ad Conscientiam hominum, quae interna & invisibilis est, Potestatem habent omnes eandem, quam habuit Naaman;[ag] neque ad pericula se offerre opus habent. Caeterum si id faciant, praemium suum in regno Dei expectare debent, nec Regem suum legitimum accusare, multo minus occidere, aut bello persequi. Besides these Soveraign Powers, Divine, and Humane, of which I have hitherto discoursed, there is mention in Scripture of another Power, namely, * that of [1]the Rulers of the Darknesse of this world, * the Kingdome of Satan, and * the Principality of Beelzebub over Daemons, that is to say, over[1] Phantasmes that appear in the Air: For which cause Satan is also called * the Prince of the Power of the Air; and (because he ruleth in the darknesse of this world) * The Prince of this world: And in consequence hereunto, they who are under his Dominion, [2]in opposition to[2] the faithfull (who are the Children of the Light) are called the Children of Darknesse. DE REGNO TENEBRARVM.

CAPVT XLIV.

De Tenebris Spiritualibus ab Interpretatione non recta Scripturarum.

Praeter Summas Potestates, Divinam, & Humanam, de quibus hactenus disseruimus, legimus in Scripturis Sacris de Potestate adhuc alia, nempe ea quàm dicit Sanctus Paulus Eph. 6. 12, Quoniam non est nobis lucta adversus sanguinem & carnem, sed adversus Imperia, adversus Potestates, adversus Mundi hujus Principes Tenebrarum, adversus Spirituales improbitates in rebus coelestibus; & Matth. 12. 26, Sed si Satanas Satanam ejicit, adversùs seipsum dissidet: quomodo ergò stabit regnum ejus; & Matth. 9. 34, Per Principem Daemoniorum ejicit Daemonia, id est Phantasmata, quae apparent in Aëre; unde Satanas dicitur Eph. 2. 2, Princeps Potestatis Aëris; & (quia regnat in mundi hujus tenebris) Princeps hujus mundi, Ioh. 16. 11. Et propterea, qui Principatui ejus Subjecti sunt filii vocantur Tenebrarum; nimirum, ut distinguantur à fidelibus, qui Filii Lucis appellantur. Cum enim Beelzebub sit Rex Phantasmatum, quae Aërem & Tenebras incolunt; Filii Tenebrarum, Phantasmata, & Spiritus Illusionis idem significant. Regnum ergo Tenebrarum (prout in locis supra citatis, aliisque Sacrae Scripturae textibus intelligitur) definiri potest, Impostorum confoederatio, qui ut in alios in praesenti mundo dominentur, Lumen tùm Rationis naturalis, tùm Euangelii per doctrinas erroneas & obscuras extinguere, & in viam salutis aeternae Tenebras inducere conantur Spirituales.

The Church not yet fully freed of Darknesse.

As men that are utterly deprived from their Nativity, of the light of the °bodily° Eye, have no Idea at all, of any such light; and no man conceives in his imagination any greater light, than he hath at some time, or other, perceived °by his outward Senses:° so also is it of the light of the Gospel, and of the light of [8]the Understanding, that no man can conceive[8] there is any greater degree of it, than that which he hath already attained unto. And from hence it comes to passe, that men have no other means to acknowledge their owne Darknesse, but onely by reasoning from [9]the un-foreseen mischances, that befall them in their ways;[9] The Darkest part of the Kingdom of Satan, is that which is without[b] the Church of God; that is to say, [10]amongst them that beleeve not in Jesus Christ.[10] But we cannot say, that therefore the Church enjoyeth (as the land of Goshen) all the light, which to the performance of [11]the[11] work enjoined us by God, is necessary.[c] Whence comes it, that in Christendome there has been, almost from the time of the Apostles, such justling[d] of one another out of their places, both by forraign, and Civill war? such [12] stumbling at every °little° asperity of their own fortune, and every °little° eminence of that of other men? and such diversity of ways in running to the same mark,[e] Felicity, if it be not Night amongst us, or at least a [13] Mist? wee are therefore yet in the Dark.

Four Causes of Spirituall Darknesse.

The Enemy has been here in the [14] Night of our naturall Ignorance, and sown the tares of Spirituall Errors;[f] and that, First, by °abusing, and° putting out the light of the Scriptures: For we erre, not knowing the [15] Scriptures.[g] Secondly, by introducing the Daemonology of the Heathen Poets, that is to say, their °fabulous° Doctrine concerning Daemons, which are but Idols, or Phantasms °of the braine, without any reall nature of their own, distinct from humane fancy; such as are° dead mens Ghosts, °and Fairies,° and other matter of old Wives tales. Thirdly, by mixing with the Scripture divers reliques of the Religion, and [16]much of the vain and erroneous[16] Philosophy of the Greeks, especially of Aristotle. Fourthly, by mingling with both these, false, [17] or uncertain Traditions, and °fained, or uncertain° History. And so we come to erre, by giving heed to seducing Spirits, and the [18]Daemonology[18] of such as speak lies in Hypocrisie, °(or as it is in the Originall, 1 Tim. 4. 1, 2. of those that play the part of lyars)° [h] with a seared conscience, that is, contrary to their own knowledge. Concerning the [19]first of these, which is the Seducing of men by abuse[19] of Scripture, I intend to speak briefly in this Chapter.

Errors from misinterpreting the Scriptures, concerning the Kingdome of God.

The greatest, °and main° abuse of Scripture, and to which °almost° all the rest are either consequent, or subservient, is the wresting of it, to prove that the Kingdome of God, mentioned so often in the Scripture, is the present Church, °or multitude° of Christian men now living, [20]or that being dead, are to rise again at the last day: whereas[20] the Kingdome of God was first instituted by the Ministery of Moses, over the Jews onely; who were therefore called [21] his Peculiar People; and ceased afterward, in the election of Saul, °when they refused to be governed by God any more, and demanded a King after the [335] manner of the nations; which God himself consented unto,[j] as I have more at large proved before, in the 35. Chapter.° After that time, there was no other Kingdome of God in the world, by any Pact, °or otherwise, than he ever was, is, and shall be King, of all men, and of all creatures, as governing according to his Will, by his infinite Power.° Neverthelesse, he promised by his Prophets to [22]restore this his Government to them again, when[22] the time he hath in his secret counsell appointed for it °shall bee fully come,° and when they shall turn unto him by repentance, °and amendment of life: and not onely so, but° he invited also the Gentiles °to come in, and enjoy the happinesse of his Reign,° on the same conditions of conversion °and repentance;° and hee promised also to send his Son into the world, to expiate the sins of them all by his death, and to prepare them by his Doctrine, [23]to receive him at his second coming: Which second coming not yet being, the Kingdome of God is not yet come, and wee are not now under any other Kings by Pact, but our Civill Soveraigns; saving onely, that Christian men are already in the Kingdome of Grace,[k] in as much as they have already the Promise of being received at his comming againe.[23]

As that the Kingdome of God is the present Church:

Consequent to this Errour, that the present Church is Christs Kingdome, there ought to be some one Man, or Assembly, by whose mouth our Saviour (now in heaven) speaketh[24], and giveth law, and which representeth his Person to all Christians, [25]or divers Men, or divers Assemblies that doe the same to divers parts of Christendome. This[25] power Regal under Christ, [26]being[26] challenged,[l] universally by the Pope, and in particular Common-wealths by Assemblies of the Pastors [27]of the place, (when the Scripture gives it to none but to Civill Soveraigns,) comes to be so passionately disputed, that it putteth out the Light of Nature, and causeth[27] so great a Darknesse in mens understanding, that [28]they[28] see not who it is to whom they have engaged their obedience.

Manifestum autem est, in contrarium, Regnum Dei, institutum fuisse à Deo, (ministrante Mose) super Iudaeos solos, qui eam ob causam appellantur in Scripturis, populus Dei peculiaris; idemque regnum in electione Sauli Regis, desiisse. Post id tempus regnum Dei per Pactum in terris nullum fuisse. Promisisse tamen per Prophetas Deum, in Regnum suum Iudaeos iterum admittere, (tempore quod ipse secum determinaverat) cum per poenitentiam ad Deum se converterent. And that the Pope is his Vicar generall:

Consequent to this claim of the Pope to be Vicar Generall of Christ in the present Church, °(supposed to be that Kingdom of his, to which we are addressed in the Gospel,)° is the Doctrine, that it is necessary for a Christian King, to receive his Crown by a Bishop; as if it were from that Ceremony, that he [29] derives the clause of Dei gratiâ[m] in his title; and that [30]then onely he is made King by the favour of God, when he is crowned by the authority of Gods universall Vicegerent[n] on earth;[30] and that every Bishop [31]whosoever be his Soveraign,[31] taketh at his Consecration an oath of absolute Obedience to the Pope. Consequent to the same, is the Doctrine of the °fourth° Councell of Lateran, held under Pope Innocent the third, (Chap. 3. de Haereticis.) That if a King at the Popes admonition, doe not purge his Kingdome of Haeresies, and being excommunicate for the same, doe not give satisfaction within a year, his Subjects are absolved of the bond of their obedience.[p] °Where, by Haeresies are understood all opinions which the Church of Rome hath forbidden to be maintained.° And by this means, as often as [336] there is any repugnancy between the °Politicall° designes of the Pope, and other Christian Princes, as there is very often, there ariseth such a [32]Mist amongst their[32] Subjects, that they know not a stranger that thrusteth himself into the throne of their lawfull Prince, from him whom they had themselves placed there; and in this Darknesse of mind, °are made to° fight one against another, without discerning their enemies from their friends, °under the conduct[q] of another mans ambition.°

And that the Pastors are the Clergy.

From the same opinion, that the present Church is the Kingdome of God, it proceeds that Pastours, [33]Deacons, and all other[33] Ministers of the Church, take the name to themselves of the Clergy; giving to other Christians the name of Laity, that is, simply People. For Clergy signifies [34] those, whose maintenance is that [35]Revenue,[35] which God having reserved to himselfe during his Reigne over the Israelites, assigned to the tribe of Levi [36](who were to be his publique Ministers, and had no portion of land set them out to live on, as their brethren) to be their inheritance.[36] [r] The Pope therefore, [n] A 'vicegerent' was a person appointed by a ruler to administer in his place. The title 'vicegerent of God' was claimed by the Pope; it was also commonly applied to kings and magistrates by Protestant writers (OED, 'vicegerent', n. and a., 1–2).

[p] See above, Ch. 42, note ik. The marginal reference in the MS here (see the textual apparatus) suggests that Hobbes's source may have been Tractatus universi juris, duce & auspicio Gregorio XIII, xi(2), fo. 315v (C. Brunus, De haereticis, et schismaticis, IV.xiv.10).

[37](pretending the present Church to be, as the Realme of Israel, the Kingdome of God)[37] challenging[s] to himselfe and his °subordinate° Ministers, the like revenue, [38]as the Inheritance of God,[38] the name of Clergy was sutable to that claime. And thence it is, that Tithes, °and other tributes° paid to the Levites, as in Gods Right, [39]amongst the Israelites,[39] have a long time been demanded, and taken of Christians, by Ecclesiastiques, [40]Iure divino, that is, in[40] Gods Right. By which meanes, the people [41]every where[41] were obliged to a double tribute; one to the State, another to the [42] Clergy; °whereof, that to the Clergy, being the tenth of their revenue, is double to that which a King of Athens (and esteemed a Tyrant) exacted of his subjects for the defraying of all publique charges:[u] For he demanded no more but the twentieth part; and yet abundantly maintained therewith the Commonwealth.[v] And in the Kingdome of the Iewes, during the Sacerdotall Reigne of God, the Tithes and Offerings were the whole Publique Revenue.°

From the same mistaking of the present Church for the Kingdom of God, came in the distinction betweene the Civill and the Canon Laws: The Civil Law being the Acts of Soveraigns in their own Dominions, and the Canon Law being the Acts of the Pope in the same Dominions. Which Canons, [43]though they were but Canons, that is, Rules Propounded, and but voluntarily received by Christian Princes,[43] till the translation of the Empire to Charlemain;[w] yet afterwards, as the [44]power of the Pope encreased, became Rules Commanded, and[44] the Emperours themselves (to avoyd greater mischiefes, which the people blinded might be led into) were forced to let them passe for Laws.

From hence it is, that in [45]all[45] Dominions, where the Popes Ecclesiasticall power is entirely received, Jewes, [46]Turkes,[x] and Gentiles, are in the Roman Church tolerated in their Religion, as farre forth, as in the exercise and profession thereof[46] they offend not against the civill power:[y] whereas [47]in a Christian, though a stranger, not to be of the Roman Religion, is Capitall;[47] [z] quod erat in Regno Dei, id est in Israële, Summus Sacerdos, reditus similes à Christianis postulat sibi, & Sacerdotibus suis à Christianis;[t] ad quam rem expediebat, ut Sacerdotes appellarentur Clerus. Decimae itaque quae Levitis jure Divino debebantur in regno Dei, requiruntur & sumuntur jam diu ab Ecclesiasticis, non jure Civili, sed Divino; & populus ubique per Ecclesiam Romanam pensiones publicas duplas solvunt, alteras Civitati suae, alteras Clero Romano. [292]

Ab eodem errore, quod Ecclesia praesens est Regnum Dei, introducta est distinctio inter Leges Civiles & Canonicas: sunt autem Leges Civiles Acta Imperantium in Dominiis propriis; & Leges Canonicae acta Pontificis in Dominiis iisdem; sed hae ante Imperii translationem in Carolum Magnum,[w] Leges non erant, quanquam posteà, procedentibus indies Tenebris, Imperatores ipsi eas pro Legibus (metu majoris mali à caecitate populi) admittere coacti sunt.

[t] The Latin duplicates 'à Christianis' ('from Christians'). Possibly Hobbes wished to emphasize that the revenues were claimed from Christians for the Pope and again from Christians for his priests; but it is also very possible that the duplication was an error.

[u] = expenses, costs (OED, 'charge', n., 10).

[v] Hobbes draws here on a passage in Thucydides, Peloponnesian War, VI.54, which refers to Peisistratos (d. 528 or 527 BC) and his son Hippias (r. 527–510 BC). In Hobbes's translation: 'these Tyrants held vertue and wisdome in great account for a long time; and taking of the Athenians but a twentieth part of their reuenues, adorned the Citie, mannaged their Warres, and administred their religion worthily' (Eight Bookes, p. 380). [w] See above, Ch. 42, note il. [x] = Muslims (OED, 'Turk', n.[1], 3.a).

[y] Jews and Muslims were tolerated in the Papal States (primarily for commercial reasons), and the latter were promised freedom of religion there by a Bull of 1573: see Bussi, 'La condizione giuridica dei musulmani', p. 493.

[z] Hobbes exaggerates here in the English (as his revision in the Latin seems to recognize). Catholics who converted to Protestantism and persisted in it could be condemned to death by the Roman Inquisition, but foreign Protestants were executed only in exceptional cases (e.g., the Scot Walter Merse, burnt alive in 1591 for disrupting a Mass in Rome). However, no Protestant worship was permitted; and in Sicily the Spanish Inquisition did commonly arrest English and other Protestant sailors. See Black, Italian Inquisition, esp. pp. 91, 132.

because the Pope pretendeth that all [337] Christians are his Subjects. [48]For otherwise it were as much against the law of Nations, to persecute a Christian stranger, for professing the Religion of his owne country, as an Infidell; or rather more, in as much as[48] they that are not against Christ, are with him.[aa]

From the same it is that in every Christian State [49] there are certaine men, that are exempt, °by Ecclesiasticall liberty,° from the tributes, and from the tribunals of the Civil State; for so are [50]the secular Clergy, besides[50] Monks and Friars, which in many places, bear so great a proportion to the [51]common[51] people, as if need were, there might be raised out of them alone, an Army, sufficient for any warre the Church militant should [52]imploy them in, against their owne, or other Princes.[52]

Error from mistaking Consecration for Conjuration.

A second °generall° abuse of Scripture, is the turning of Consecration into Conjuration,[ab] or Enchantment. To Consecrate, is in Scripture, to Offer, Give, or Dedicate, in pious and decent language [53]and gesture, a man, or any other thing[53] to God, by separating of it from common use[54]; that is to say, to Sanctifie, or make it Gods, and to [55]be used only by[55] those, whom God hath appointed to be his Publike Ministers, (as I have already proved at large in the 35. Chapter;) and thereby to change, not the [56] thing Consecrated, but onely the use of it, from being Profane and common, to be Holy, and peculiar to Gods service. But when °by such words,° the nature or qualitie of the thing it selfe, is pretended to be changed, it [57]is not[57] Consecration, but either [58]an extraordinary[58] worke of God, or a vaine and impious Conjuration. But seeing (for the [59]frequency of[59] pretending the change of Nature in their Consecrations,) it cannot be esteemed a [60]work extraordinary,[60] it is no other than a Conjuration or Incantation, whereby they would have men to beleeve an alteration of Nature that is not, contrary to the testimony of mans Sight, and of all the rest of his Senses. As for example, when the Priest, in [61]stead

[48] This, however, is iniquitous. For if a Christian prince treats a Christian more harshly than he does an infidel, he acts iniquitously; for

permittantur. Quare autem? Quia Papa Christianos omnes sibi subditos esse postulat. Quod tamen iniquum est. Nam si Christiano duriorem se praebeat Princeps Christianus, quam Infideli, iniquè facit; pro Christo enim sunt, qui non sunt contra Christum.[aa]

Praeterea, hinc est, quod in omni Civitate Christianâ Potestatem Papae Ecclesiasticam admittente, sint homines quidam à Tributis & Tribunalibus Potestatis Civilis exempti; ut Ecclesiastici omnes, & Monachi, & Fratres, quorum numerus in multis locis ad numerum reliqui populi, adeò magnam habet proportionem, ut ex illis solis, si opus esset, conscribi exercitus posset, qui Ecclesiae Militanti sufficere valeret contra quemcunque Principem Christianum, qui Papae adversaretur.

Scripturarum abusus alius est, eorum qui Consecrationem convertunt in Conjurationem sive Incantationem. Consecrare, in Scripturis Sacris significat rem quamcunque Deo Offerre, Dare sive Dedicare, id est ab usu communi, piis & decoris verbis, ad cultus Divini usum, separare, id quod est sanctificare, ita ut Dei, eorumque sit quos Deus sibi fecit Ministros publicos; ut supra Capite 35 fusiùs dictum est. Consecratione autem illa, non rei consecratae natura, sed solus usus mutatus est, nempe, ut qui prophanus & communis fuerat, jam Sanctus sit, & cultui Divino proprius. Sed quando naturam qualitatemque ipsius rei mutatam esse dicunt, non Consecratio dicenda est, sed vel opus Dei supernaturale, vel vana & impia Incantatio. Quoniam autem mutationem hujusmodi naturae rerum quam profitentur, quotidianam esse dicunt, pro opere Divino supernaturali haberi non potest. Restat ergò, ut alia non sit, quam Conjuratio sive Incantatio; per quam, mutationem naturae ubi non est, credi esse volunt, contra oculorum, caeterorumque omnium Sensuum testimonium. of Consecrating Bread and Wine to Gods peculiar service in the Sacrament of[61] the Lords Supper, (which is but a [62]separation of it from the common use, to signifie, that is, to put men in mind of their Redemption, by the Passion of Christ, whose body was broken, and blood shed upon the Crosse for our transgressions,)[62] pretends, that by saying of the words of our Saviour, This is my Body, and This is my Blood,[ac] the nature of Bread [63]is no more there, but his very Body;[63] notwithstanding there appeareth not to the Sight, or other Sense of the Receiver, any thing that appeared not before [64]the Consecration.[64] The Egyptian Conjurers,[ad] [65]that are said to have[65] turned their Rods to Serpents, and the Water into Bloud, are thought but to have deluded the senses of the Spectators by a false shew of things, yet are [66]esteemed[66] Enchanters:[ae] But what [67]should wee have thought of[67] them, if there had appeared in their Rods nothing like a Serpent, and in the Water enchanted, nothing like Bloud, °nor like any thing else but Water,° but that they had faced down[af] the King, that [68]they were Serpents that looked like Rods,[68] and that it was Bloud that seemed [69]Water? That had been both Enchantment, and Lying. And yet in this daily act of the Priest, they[69] doe the very same, by [338] turning the holy words into the manner of a Charme, which produceth nothing new to the Sense; but they face us down, that it hath turned the Bread into a Man; nay more, into a God; and require men to worship it, as if it were our Saviour himself °present° God and Man, and thereby to commit most grosse Idolatry. For if it bee enough to °excuse it of Idolatry, to° say it is no more Bread, but God; why should not the same excuse serve the Egyptians, [70]in case they had the faces to say,[70] the Leeks, and Onyons they worshipped,[ag] were [71]not very[ah] Leeks, and Onyons, but a Divinity under their species, or likenesse.[71] The words, This is my Body, [72] are aequivalent to these, This signifies, or represents my Body[73]; and it is an [74] ordinary figure of Speech: but to take it literally, is an abuse[75]; nor though so taken, can it [76]extend any further, than to the Bread[76] which Christ himself with his own hands Consecrated. Incantatores Aegyptii, cum Virgas suas in Serpentes, & Aquam in Sanguinem convertissent, spectatorum Sensibus falsa rerum specie illusisse tantùm existimantur, vocantur tamen in Scriptura Sacra Incantatores.[ae] Sed quo nomine appellandi fuissent, si in Virgis suis ne species quidem Serpentium, neque in aquis illis species sanguinis, ulla apparuisset, sed coram Rege impudenter asseruissent Virgas quae Regi ut Virgae apparuerunt Serpentes esse, & Sanguinem esse, quae Regi Aqua videbatur? Appellandi certè erant non modo Incantatores, sed etiam impudenter Mendaces. Hoc tamen in Consecrationibus quotidianis faciunt Ecclesiae Romanae Sacerdotes, verba sacra in Incantamentum mutantes, quod nihil ad sensum producit novi; impudenter tamen Panem in Hominem, & quod magis est in Deum convertisse se affirmantes, & proinde adorandum esse jubentes tanquam esset Servator noster ipse Deus & Homo; quae Idololatria est crassissima. Siquidem enim dicere sufficeret, non amplius Panem, sed Deum esse, quare similiter excusare se non potuissent Aegyptii affirmando, Porrum & Cepe quae adorabant,[ag] Porrum & Cepe amplius non esse post Incantationem, sed Deum ipsum sub olerum illorum specie. Verba illa, Hoc est corpus meum, & Hic est sanguis meus, aequivalent his, hoc significat, sive repraesentat, Corpus & Sanguinem meum; & Figura quidem sermonis est usitatissima; quem secundum literam interpretari Scripturae abusus esset. Incantation in the Ceremonies of Baptisme.

The like Incantation, [80]in stead of Consecration, is used also[80] in the Sacrament of Baptisme: Where [81]the abuse of Gods name in each severall Person, and in the whole Trinity, with the sign of the Crosse at each name, maketh up the Charm:[81] As first, when they make the Holy water, the Priest saith, I Conjure[ak] thee, thou Creature of Water, in the name of God the Father Almighty, and in the name of Iesus Christ his onely Son our Lord, and in vertue of the Holy Ghost, that thou become Conjured water, to drive away [82]all the Powers of the Enemy, and to eradicate, and supplant[82] [al] the Enemy, &c. And the same in the Benediction of the Salt to be mingled with it; That thou become Conjured Salt, that all Phantasmes, and Knavery of the Devills fraud may fly and depart from the place wherein thou art sprinkled; and every unclean Spirit bee Conjured by Him that shall come to judg the quicke and the dead. The same in the Benediction of the Oyle, That all the Power of the Enemy, all the Host of the Devill, all °Assaults and° Phantasmes of Satan, may be driven away by this Creature of Oyle. And for the Infant that is to be Baptized, he is subject to many Charms: First, at the Church dore the Priest blows thrice in the Childs face, and sayes, Goe out of him unclean Spirit, and give place to the Holy Ghost the Comforter. As if all Children, till blown on by the Priest were Daemoniaques: Again, before his entrance into the Church, he saith as before, I Conjure thee, &c. to goe out, and depart from this Servant of [339] God: And again the same Exorcisme is repeated once more before he be Baptized.[am] °These, and some other Incantations, are those that are used in stead of Benedictions, and Consecrations, in administration of the Sacraments of Baptisme, and the Lords Supper; wherein every thing that serveth to those holy uses (except the unhallowed Spittle of the Priest) hath some set form of Exorcisme.°

And in Marriage, in Visitation of the Sick, and in Consecration of Places.

Nor are the other rites, as of Marriage, of Extreme Unction, of Visitation of the Sick, of Consecrating Churches, and Church-yards, °and the like,° exempt from Charms; in as much as there is in them the use of Enchanted Oyle, and Water, with the abuse of the [83] Crosse, and of the [84]holy word of David,[84] Asperges me Domine Hyssopo,[an] [85]as things of[85] efficacy to drive away Phantasmes, and Imaginary Spirits.[ao]

Errors from mistaking Eternall Life, and Everlasting Death:

[86] Another generall Error, is from the Misinterpretation of the words Eternall Life, Everlasting Death, and the Second Death. For though we read plainly in holy Scripture, that God [87]created Adam in an estate of Living for Ever, which was conditionall, that is to say, if he disobeyed not his Commandement; which[87] was not essentiall to Humane Nature, but consequent to [88]the vertue[88] of the Tree of Life; °whereof hee had liberty to eat, as long as hee had not sinned; and that hee was thrust out of Paradise after he had sinned, lest hee should eate thereof, and live for ever; and that Christs Passion is a Discharge of sin to all that beleeve on him; and by consequence, a restitution of Eternall Life, to all the Faithfull, and to them onely:° yet the Doctrine is now, and hath been a long time far otherwise; namely, that every man hath Eternity of Life by Nature, in as much as his Soul is Immortall: So that the °flaming° Sword at the entrance of Paradise,[ap] though it [89]hinder a man from coming to the Tree of Life, hinders him not from the Immortality which God took from him for his Sin; nor makes him to need the sacrificing of Christ, for the recovering of the same;[89] and consequently, not onely the faithfull °and righteous,° but also the wicked, and the Heathen, shall enjoy Eternall Life, °without any Death at all; much lesse a Second, and Everlasting Death.° To salve[aq] this[90], it is said, that by °Second, and° Everlasting Death, is meant °a Second, and° Everlasting Life, but in Torments; a Figure never used, but in this very Case.

[87] placed Adam in such a state that he could have lived for ever, if he had kept God's commandment; which immortality [88] eating

All which Doctrine is founded onely on some of the obscurer places of the New Testament; which nevertheless, the whole scope of the Scripture considered, are cleer enough in a different sense, [91]and is unnecessary to the Christian Faith.[91] For supposing that when a man dies, there remaineth nothing of him but his carkasse; cannot God that [92]raised inanimated dust and clay[ar] into[92] a living creature by his Word, as easily raise a dead carkasse to life again, and continue him alive for Ever, [93]or make him die again, by another[93] Word? The Soule in Scripture, signifieth alwaies, either the Life, or the Living Creature; and the Body and Soule jointly, the Body [340] alive. In the fift day of the Creation, God said, Let the waters produce Reptile animae viventis, the creeping thing that hath in it a Living Soule; °the English translate it, that hath Life:°[as] And again, God created [94] Whales, & omnem animam viventem; which in the English is, every Living Creature:[at] And likewise of Man, God made him of the dust of the earth, and breathed in his [95]face[95] the breath of Life, & factus est Homo in animam viventem, that is, and Man was made a Living Creature:[au] And after Noah came out of the Arke, God saith, hee will no more smite omnem animam viventem, that is, every Living Creature:[av] And Deut. 12. 23. [96]Eate not the Bloud, for the Bloud is the Soule; that is, the Life. From which places, if by Soule were meant a Substance Incorporeall, with an existence separated from the Body, it might as well be inferred of any other living Creature, as of Man.[96] But that the Souls of the Faithfull, are not of their own Nature, but by Gods speciall Grace, to remaine in their Bodies, from the Resurrection to all Eternity, I have already I think sufficiently proved out of the Scriptures, in the 38. Chapter. And for the places of the New Testament, where it is said that [97]any man[97] shall be cast Body and Soul into Hell fire,[ax] [98]it is no more than Body and Life; that is to say, they shall be cast alive into the perpetuall fire of Gehenna.[98] [ay]

[Junius–Tremellius] Also, in the Mosaic law anyone who had touched a 'dead soul', that is, a dead body, was regarded as unclean.[aw] Neither here nor in other passages of the Scriptures does 'soul' mean anything other than the animal itself, or its life; nowhere do we read of an immortal soul, or of an incorporeal substance, separated from the body. But we often read of 'spirit', and 'eternal life'. [97] there are some who [98] 'body and soul' means the same as 'animated body'.

Doctrina autem haec fundatur in quibusdam locis obscurioribus Testamenti Novi; quae tamen loca totius Scripturae Scopum considerantibus, in sensu diverso facile explicari possunt. Vtrovis autem modo intelligantur, quatenus ad salutem Christiani hominis attinet, non multum interest. Supposito enim morientis hominis restare nihil praeter cadaver ejus, nonne Deus qui hominem ex terra, verbo suo fecit vivere, eadem facilitate facere poterit ut cadaver mortuum reviviscat, & vivat in aeternum, eodem verbo? Anima in Scripturis Sacris, semper significat aut vitam, aut creaturam viventem. Corpus autem & anima conjunctim idem significat quod corpus vivens. Creationis die quinto, dixit Deus, producant aquae reptile animae viventis.[as] Et creavit Deus cetos maximos & omnem Animam viventem.[at] Item de homine, creavit eum Deus de pulvere terrae, sufflavitque in nares ipsius spiraculum vitae: sic factus est homo anima vivens.[au] Et postquam Noah exiisset ex Arca, promisit Deus non amplius percutere omnem animam viventem.[av] Et Deut. 12. 23. Sanguis cujusque est ejus anima. Etiam immundus habebatur Lege Mosaica qui tetigerat animam mortuam, id est cadaver mortuum.[aw] Nihil hic neque in aliis locis Scripturarum, aliud significat Anima, praeter ipsum Animal, aut Vitam ejus; Anima immortalis nusquam legitur, neque Substantia Incorporea, à corpore separata. Spiritus autem & Vita aeterna passim leguntur. Quod animae Fidelium, non sua natura, sed gratia Dei speciali unà cum corporibus à Resurrectione mansurae sunt in aeternum, ex Scripturis Sacris ostensum est Cap. 38. As the Doctrine of Purgatory, and Exorcismes, and Invocation of Saints.

This window it is, that gives entrance to the Dark Doctrine, first, of Eternall Torments; and afterwards of [99] Purgatory, and consequently of the walking abroad, °especially° in places Consecrated, Solitary, or Dark, of the Ghosts of men deceased; and thereby to °the pretences of° Exorcisme and Conjuration[az] of Phantasmes; as also of Invocation of men dead; and to °the Doctrine of° Indulgences; that is to say, of exemption °for a time, or for ever,° from the fire of Purgatory, wherein these Incorporeall Substances are pretended °by burning° to be cleansed, and made fit for Heaven. For men being generally possessed before the time of our Saviour, by [100]contagion of the[100] Daemonology of the Greeks, of an opinion, that the Souls of men were substances distinct [101] from their Bodies, and therefore that when [102]the Body was dead,[102] the Soule of every man, whether [103]godly,[103] or wicked, must subsist somewhere by vertue of its own nature, without acknowledging therein any [104]supernaturall gift of Gods;[104] the Doctors of the [105] Church doubted a long time, what was the place, which they were to abide in, till they should be re-united to their Bodies in the Resurrection; [106]supposing for a while,[106] they lay under the Altars:[ba] but afterward the Church of Rome found it more profitable, to build for them this [107] place of Purgatory; °which by some other Churches in this later age, has been demolished.°

The Texts alledged for the Doctrines aforementioned have been answered before.

Let us now consider, what texts of Scripture seem most to confirm these three °generall° Errors, I have here touched. As for those which Cardinall Bellarmine hath alledged,[bb] [108]for the present Kingdome of God administred by the Pope, (than which there are none that make a better shew[bc] of proof,)[108] I have already answered [341] them; and made it evident, that the Kingdome of God, instituted by Moses, ended in the election of [109] Saul: After which time the [110] Priest of his own authority never deposed any King[111].[bd]

Per hanc fenestram est, quod doctrina illa Tenebrosa intravit, de Cruciatibus aeternis, & de poenis Purgatorii, & consequenter de mortuorum Spiritibus in locis Consecratis, Solitariis, & Tenebrosis ambulantibus; & proinde etiam de Exorcismo & Conjuratione Phantasmatum; item de Invocatione mortuorum; & de Indulgentiis, id est, de exemptione ex igne Purgatorii, ubi Substantiae Incorporeae illae purgari, & coelo praeparari igne supponuntur. Nam ante tempus in quo versatus est in terris Servator noster, maxima pars hominum, ad quos pervenerat doctrina Daemoniorum sive Daemonologia Graeca, in ea opinione erat, Animas humanas, substantias à corporibus distinctas esse & separabiles; & per consequens, mortuo homine; sive [296] bono sive malo; animam ejus per virtutem naturae propriae (sine recognitione ulla divinae Gratiae) debere subsistere alicubi. Itaque Doctores Ecclesiae primitivae aliquamdiu dubitarunt, quo loco, antequam cum corporibus in resurrectione denuo unirentur, mansurae essent; putaruntque aliqui quod requiescebant sub Altaribus.[ba] Sed Ecclesiae Romanae utilius tandem visum est, mansionem illis hanc aedificare Purgatorii.

Consideremus jam loca Scripturae illa quibus maximè innituntur errores, illi tres proximè superiores. Argumentis enim Bellarmini, quibus probare conatus est Regnum Dei esse Ecclesiam administratam à Pontifice Romano in hoc mundo, responsum est ante; & demonstratum, Regnum Dei institutum sub Mose, desiisse in electione Regis Sauli; & post illud tempus Sacerdotem Summum, Authoritate propriâ Regem Israëlis nullum deposuisse.[bd]

That which the High Priest did to Athaliah, was not done in his owne right, but in the right of °the young° King Joash her Son:[be] But Solomon in his own right deposed the High Priest Abiathar, and set up another in his place.[bf] The most difficult place to answer, of all those that can be brought, to prove the Kingdome of God °by Christ° is already in this world, is alledged, °not by Bellarmine, nor any other of the Church of Rome; but° by Beza; that will have it to begin from the Resurrection of Christ.[bg] [112]But whether hee intend thereby, to entitle the Presbytery to the Supreme Power Ecclesiasticall in the Common-wealth of Geneva, (and consequently to every Presbytery in every other Common-wealth,) or to Princes, and other Civill Soveraigns, I doe not know. For the Presbytery hath challenged[bh] the power to Excommunicate their owne Kings, and to bee the Supreme Moderators[bi] in Religion, in the places where they have that form of Church government,[112] no lesse then the Pope challengeth it universally.

Answer to the text on which Beza inferreth that the Kingdome of Christ began at the Resurrection.

The words are (Marke [113]9. 1.)[113] Verily I say unto you, that there be some of them that stand here, which shall not tast of death, till they have seene the Kingdome of God come with power. Which words, if taken grammatically,[bk] [114]make it certaine,[114] that either some of those men that stood by Christ °at that time,° are yet alive; or else, that the Kingdome of God must be now in this present world. And then there is another place [115]more[115] difficult: For when the Apostles after our Saviours Resurrection, and immediately before his Ascension, asked our Saviour, saying, (Acts 1. 6.) [116] Wilt thou at this time restore again the Kingdome to Israel, he answered them, It is not for you to know the times and the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power; But ye shall receive power by the comming of the Holy Ghost upon you, and yee shall be my (Martyrs) witnesses both in Ierusalem, & in all Iudaea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the Earth:[bl] Which is as much as to say, My King-

[112] , and thence claims the supreme ecclesiastical power in Christian commonwealths for the presbyteries of those commonwealths. And it is known that those presbyteries have in some places excommunicated their own kings, and that they have claimed for themselves the supremacy in religion in those places,

Id enim quod Athaliae fecit Sacerdos Summus, non Iure suo fecit, sed Iure Regis Ioashi, Athaliae filii.[be] Sed Rex Solomon Iure suo Abiatharum deposuit Sacerdotem Summum, & in locum ejus collocavit alium.[bf] Locus autem difficillimus eorum, quae adducuntur ad probandum quod Regnum Dei in hoc mundo nunc existit, adducitur à Beza, qui Regnum Dei incepisse dicit à Resurrectione Christi,[bg] atque inde Potestatem Supremam Ecclesiasticam in Civitatibus Christianis, Civitatum illarum Presbyteriis asserens. Et notum est Presbyteria illa in aliquibus locis Reges suos excommunicâsse; & Suprematum in Religione non minus in illis locis sibi arrogasse quam eandem Potestatem sibi attribuit universaliter Pontifex Romanus.

[bg] Beza, Annotationes maiores, p. 199 (Mark 9: 1): 'But he [sc. Christ] calls "the Kingdom of God" that time in which God would, as it were, begin to establish his kingdom in his Church, when the Gospel became known – which began to happen immediately after the resurrection' ('Regnum autem Dei vocat tempus illud quo Deus in Ecclesia sua patefacto Euangelio regnum suum veluti inchoaturus erat: quod statim à resurrectione fieri coepit'). Theodore Beza (1519–1605) was the leading theologian and minister in Geneva in the decades after Calvin's death. [bh] See above, note l.

[bi] 'Moderator' meant ruler, governor, or arbitrator; in presbyterian Churches, it was the title given to the minister who presided over a congregation, presbytery, or synod (OED, 'moderator', n., 1–3).

[bj] This verse, 9: 1 in Beza and AV, is 8: 39 in Vulg (the version cited here).

dome is not yet come, nor shall you foreknow when it shall come; for it shall come as a theefe in the night;[bm] But [117]I will send you the Holy Ghost, and by him you shall have power to[117] beare witnesse to all the world (by your preaching) of my Resurrection, and the workes I have done, and the doctrine I have taught, that they may beleeve in me, and expect eternall life, at my comming againe: [118]How does this[118] agree with the comming of Christs Kingdome at the [119]Resurrection? And[119] that which St. Paul saies (1 Thessal. 1. 9, 10.) [120]That they turned[120] from Idols, to serve the living and true God, and to waite for his Sonne from Heaven; Where to waite for [121]his Sonne[121] from Heaven, is to wait for his comming to be King in [122]power;[122] which were not necessary, if his Kingdome had beene then present. Againe, if the Kingdome of God began °(as Beza on that place (Mark 9. 1.) would have it)° at the Resurrection of Christ;[bn] what reason is there for Christians [123]ever since his[bo] Resurrection[123] to say in their prayers, Let thy Kingdome Come?[bp] It is therefore manifest, that the words of St. [124]Mark[124] are not so [342] to be interpreted. There be some of them that stand here (saith our Saviour) that shall not tast of death till they have seen the Kingdome of God come in power. If then this Kingdome were to come at the Resurrection of Christ, why is it said, some of them[125], rather than all? For they all lived till after Christ was risen.

ture at their meaning, by that which immediately followes, [129]both here, and in St. Luke, where the same is againe repeated,[bs] it is not unprobable, to say they have relation to the [129] Transfiguration, which is described in the verses immediately following; [130]where it is said, that After six dayes Iesus taketh with him Peter, and Iames, and Iohn (not all, but some of his Disciples) *and leadeth them up into an high mountaine apart by themselves, and was transfigured before them. And his rayment became shining, exceeding white as snow; so as no Fuller on earth can white them. The manner of Consecrations in the Scripture, was without Exorcisms.

As for the rites of Consecration, though they depend for the most part upon the °discretion and° judgement of the governors of the Church, and not upon the Scriptures; yet those governors are obliged [343] to [145]such direction,[145] as the nature of the action it selfe requireth; as that the ceremonies, words, and gestures, be both decent, and significant, or at least conformable to the [146]action.[146] When Moses consecrated the Tabernacle, the Altar, and the Vessels belonging to them, (Exod. 40.)[ca] he anointed them with the Oyle which God had commanded to bee made for that purpose; and they were holy: There was nothing Exorcized[147], to drive away Phantasmes. The same Moses (the °civill° Soveraigne of Israel) when he consecrated [148] Aaron (the High Priest,) and his Sons, did wash them with Water, (not Exorcized water,) put their Garments upon them, and anointed them with Oyle; and they were sanctified, to minister unto the Lord in the Priests office; which was a simple and decent cleansing, and adorning them, before hee presented them to God, °to be his servants.° [cb] When King Solomon, (the °civill° Soveraigne of Israel) consecrated the Temple hee had built, (2 Kings 8.)[cc] he stood before all the Congregation of Israel; and having blessed them, he gave thankes to God, for putting into the heart of his father, to build it; and for giving to himselfe the grace to accomplish the same; and then prayed unto him, first, to accept that House, though it were not sutable to his infinite Greatnesse; and to hear the prayers of his Servants that should pray therein, or (if they were absent,) towards it; and lastly, he offered a sacrifice °of Peace-offering,° and the House was dedicated. Here was no Procession; the King stood still in his first place; no Exorcised Water; no Asperges me,[cd] nor other impertinent[ce] application of words spoken [149]upon another occasion;[149] but a decent, and rationall speech, and such as °in making to God a present of his new built House,° was most conformable to the occasion.

The immortality of mans Soule, not proved by Scripture to be of Nature, but of Grace.

To prove that the Soule separated from the Body, liveth eternally, not onely the Soules of the Elect, by especiall grace, °and restauration of the Eternall Life which Adam lost by Sinne, and our Saviour restored by the Sacrifice of himself, to the Faithfull;° but also the Soules of Reprobates, as a property naturally consequent to the essence of mankind, °without other grace of God, but that which is universally given to all mankind;° there are divers places, which at the first sight seem sufficiently to serve the turn: °but such, as when I compare them with that which I have before (Chapter 38.) alledged[ci] out of the 14 of Iob,[cj] seem to mee much more subject to a divers interpretation, than the words of Iob.°

And first there are the words of Solomon (Ecclesiastes 12. 7.) [150]Then shall the Dust return to Dust, as it was, and the Spirit shall [344] return[150] to God that gave it.Which may bear °well enough (if there be no other text directly against it)° this interpretation, that God onely knows, (but Man not,) what becomes of a mans spirit, [151]when he expireth;[151] and the same Solomon, in the same Book, (Chap. 3. ver. 20, 21.) [152]delivereth the same sentence in the sense I have given it: His words are, All goe (man and beast) to the same place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again; who knoweth that[152] the spirit of Man goeth upward, and that the spirit of the Beast goeth downward °to the earth? That is, none knows but God; Nor is it an unusuall phrase to say of things we understand not, God Knows what, and God Knows where.° That of Gen. 5. 24. Enoch walked with God, and he was not; for God took him; [153]which is expounded[153] Heb. 11. 5. [154]He[154] was translated, that he should not die; and was not found, because God had translated him. °For before his Translation, he had this testimony, that he pleased God,° making as much for the Immortality of the Body, as of the Soule, proveth, that this his translation was peculiar to them that please God; °not common to them with the wicked;° and depending on Grace, not on Nature. But on the contrary, what [155]interpretation shall we give, besides the literall sense of[155] the words of Solomon (Eccles. 3. 19.) [156]That[156] which befalleth the Sons of Men, befalleth Beasts, [157]even one thing befalleth them; as the one dyeth, so doth the other;[157] yea, they have all one breath °(one spirit;)° so that a Man hath no praeeminence above a Beast, [158]for all is vanity. By the literall sense, here is no Naturall Immortality of the Soule; nor yet any repugnancy with the Life Eternall, which the Elect shall enjoy by Grace. And (chap. 4. ver. 3.) Better is he that hath not yet been, than both they; that is, than they that live, or have lived; which, if the Soules of all them that have lived, were Immortall, were a hard saying; for then to have an Immortall Soule, were worse than to have no Soule at all. And againe, (Chapt. 9. 5.) The living know they shall die, but the dead know not any thing; that is, Naturally, and before the resurrection of the body.[158]

Another place which seems to make for a Naturall Immortality of the Soule, is that, where our Saviour saith, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are living:[cn] [159]but this is spoken of the promise of God, and of their certitude to rise again, not of a Life then actuall; and in the same sense that God said to Adam, that on the day hee should eate of the forbidden fruit, he should certainly die;[cp] from that time forward he was a dead man by sentence; but not by execution, till almost a thousand years after.[cq] So Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were alive by promise, then, when Christ spake; but are not actually till the Resurrection. And the History of Dives and Lazarus,[cr] make nothing against this, if wee take it (as it is) for a Parable.[159]

But there be other places of the New Testament, where an Immortality seemeth to be °directly° attributed to the wicked. For it is [160]evident, that they shall all rise to Judgement. And it is said besides in many places, that[160] they shall goe into Everlasting fire, Everlasting [345] torments, Everlasting punishments; and that the worm of conscience never dyeth[161];[cs] and all this is comprehended in the word Everlasting Death, [162]which is ordinarily interpreted Everlasting Life in torments:[ct] And yet I can find no where that any man shall live in torments Everlastingly. [157] etc.; [158] . These words are a denial of the immortality of the soul by nature, but not by grace. 'I praised the dead more than the living; and I judged more fortunate than either of them him who is not yet born, and has not seen the evils that are done under the sun.' [Vulg][cm] This would be a hard saying, if he who has not been born is more fortunate than him who enjoys eternal felicity. Again, 9: 5: 'The living know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing more, nor do they have a reward any more.' [Vulg] That is evidently the case with dead men, before the resurrection of their bodies; but if it is understood of the immortality of the elect after the Day of Judgement, it is not true.

[166]I have shewed already, that the Kingdome of God by Christ beginneth at the day of Judgment: That in that day, the Faithfull shall rise again, with glorious, and spirituall Bodies, and bee his Subjects in that his Kingdome, which shall be Eternall: That they shall neither marry, nor be given in marriage, nor eate and drink, as they did in their naturall bodies; but live for ever in their individuall persons, without the specificall[cu] eternity of generation: And that the Reprobates also shall rise again, to receive punishments for their sins: As also, that those of the Elect, which shall be alive in their earthly bodies at that day, shall have their bodies suddenly changed, and made spirituall, and Immortall.[cv] But that the bodies of the Reprobate, who make the Kingdome of Satan, shall also be glorious, or spirituall bodies, or that they shall bee as the Angels of God, neither eating, nor drinking, nor engendring; or that their life shall be Eternall in their individuall persons, as the life of every faithfull man is, or as the life of Adam had been if hee had not sinned, there is no place of Scripture to prove it; save onely these places concerning Eternall Torments; which may otherwise be interpreted.[166]

°From whence may be inferred, that as the Elect after the Resurrection shall be restored to the estate, wherein Adam was before he had sinned; so the Reprobate shall be in the estate, that Adam, and his posterity were in after the sin committed; saving that God promised a Redeemer to Adam, and such of his seed as should trust in him, and repent; but not to them that should die in their sins, as do the Reprobate.°

[166] For although we read that the faithful will rise again with spiritual and glorious bodies, and will live to eternity, neither eating nor drinking, and without marriage,[cv] yet we do not read the same about the reprobate, but we read that they will die again, and by the 'second death', which will be eternal.

[cu] 'Specificall' here apparently means special, peculiar (OED, 'specifical', a. and n.; 'specific', a. and n., 1–2), i.e., an eternity of a special kind; Hobbes cannot have meant 'pertaining to the human species', as that use of 'species' had not yet developed.

Eternall Torments what.

[167]These things considered, the texts that mention Eternall Fire, Eternall Torments, or the Worm that never dieth, contradict not the Doctrine of a Second, and Everlasting Death, in the proper and naturall sense of the word Death. The Fire, or Torments prepared for the wicked in Gehenna, Tophet,[cw] or in what place soever, may continue to the end of this World;[cx] and there may never want [346 (B)] wicked men to be tormented in them; though not every, nor any one Eternally.[167 cy] For St. Paul, speaking of the Resurrection (1 Cor. 15.)[cz] understandeth it onely of the Resurrection to Life Eternall; and not [168]the Resurrection to Punishment. And of the first,[168] he saith that the Body is Sown in Corruption, raised in Incorruption; sown in Dishonour, raised in [169]Honour;[169] sown in Weaknesse, raised in Power; sown a Naturall body, raised a Spirituall body: There is no such thing can be said of the [170]bodies of them that rise to Punishment.[170] So also our Saviour, when hee speaketh of the °Nature of Man after the° Resurrection, meaneth, the Resurrection to Life Eternall, °not to Punishment.° The text is Luke 20. verses 34. 35, 36. °a fertile text.° The Children of this world marry, and are given in marriage; but they that shall be counted worthy to obtaine that world, and the Resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor [171]are given in marriage:[171] Neither can they die any more; for they are equall to the Angells, and are the Children of God, being the

5 to the . . . this World B] for euer MS; for ever H 7 Eternally B] eternally. For the wicked being left in the estate they were in after Adams sinne, may at the Resurrection liue as they did, marry and giue in marriage, and haue grosse and corruptible bodies as all mankind now haue; and consequently may engender perpetually after the resurrection, as they did before. For there is no place of scripture to the contrary MS; Eternally. For the wicked being left in the estate they were in after Adams sin, may at the Resurrection live as they did, marry, and give in marriage, and have grosse and corruptible bodies, as all mankind now {346 (H)} have; and consequently may engender perpetually, after the Resurrection, as they did before: For there is no place of Scripture to the contrary H

[167] What is said about eternal torments and fire, and about the worm of conscience, does not go against this second death. Therefore 'eternal' in those passages seems to mean the same as 'until the end of the age [seculum]'. Now the Latin 'seculum' is not the same as the Greek αἰών. And the Jews did not think of 'seculum' (as the Romans did) as a period of 100 years, which is the 'age' of a man in the sense that there is no one [alive now] who lived in the previous age. They thought of an age as an era of the world – that is, that there was one age from the Creation to the Flood, another from the Flood to the conflagration of the world (at the coming of the Messiah), and a third age from the coming of the Messiah to eternity. Thus this third age should be called 'the age of ages', or αἰών αἰώνων. And so it is that until the end of this [third] age (that is, of this world) the reprobate can be punished until they undergo the second death – a punishment which, for that reason, can be called αἰώνιος ['eternal'].

Children of the Resurrection: [172]The Children of this world, that are in the estate which Adam left them in, shall marry, and be given in marriage; that is, corrupt,[da] and generate successively; which is an Immortality of the Kind, but not of the Persons of men: They are not worthy to be counted amongst them that shall obtain the next world, and an absolute Resurrection from the dead; but onely a short time, as inmates of that world; and to the end onely to receive condign[db] punishment for their contumacy.[dc] The Elect are the onely children of the Resurrection; that is to say, the sole heirs of Eternall Life: they only can die no more: it is they that are equall to the Angels, and that are the children of God; and not the Reprobate. To the Reprobate there remaineth after the Resurrection, a Second, and Eternall Death: between which Resurrection, and their Second, and Eternall death, is but a time of Punishment and Torment; and to last by succession of sinners thereunto, as long as the kind of Man by propagation shall endure; which is till the end of the world.[172] [dd]

Answer of the Texts alledged for Purgatory.

Upon this Doctrine of the Naturall Eternity of separated Soules, is founded (as I said) the Doctrine of Purgatory. For [173]supposing Eternall Life by Grace onely, there is no Life, but the Life of the Body; and [173] no Immortality till the Resurrection. The texts for Purgatory alledged[de] by Bellarmine out of the Canonicall Scripture °of the old Testament,° are first, the Fasting of David for Saul and Ionathan, mentioned (2 Kings, 1. 12.);[df] and againe, (2 Sam.

[172] . Three things should be noted in these words. First, that he calls the time until the resurrection one age [seculum], and the time after the resurrection another age. Secondly, that he distinguishes between the children of this world and the children of the world to come, in that the children of the world to come cannot die again – hinting that the reprobate will die again. Thirdly, that he does not say that the children of this world are worthy of resurrection from the dead, and says that the children of God will be equal to the angels, because they are the children of the resurrection. From which it follows that the reprobate will not be resurrected at all, except to [undergo] the second death. For the children of God are the only children of the resurrection.

[173] if we suppose that eternal life belongs to the faithful only, and that it is by grace, it follows that there can be

Filii Resurrectionis. In quibus verbis notanda tria sunt, primum, quod tempus usque ad Resurrectionem appellat seculum unum, tempus autem post Resurrectionem appellat seculum alterum. Secundum, quod distinguit inter filios mundi hujus, & filios mundi venturi, eo quod filii mundi venturi, mori iterum non possent, innuens reprobos iterum morituros esse. Tertium, quod filios hujus mundi, dignos non dicat esse Resurrectione à mortuis, & quod filii Dei ideò aequales erunt Angelis, quia sunt filii Resurrectionis; ex quo sequitur reprobos resurrecturos omnino non esse praeterquam ad mortem secundam. Filii enim Resurrectionis Filii Dei soli sunt.

Doctrinae huic de Animarum separatarum Aeternitate naturali, superstruitur, ut ante dictum est, Doctrina Purgatorii. Supposito enim, quod vita aeterna Fidelium solorum sit, & per gratiam, sequitur Immortalitatem nullam esse posse ante Resurrectionem. 3. 35.) for the death of Abner. This Fasting of David, he saith, was for the obtaining of something for them at Gods hands, after their death; [174] because after he had Fasted [175]to procure the recovery of his owne[175] child, assoone as he knew it was dead, he [176]called for meate.[176] [dg] Seeing then the Soule hath an existence separate from the Body, and nothing can be obtained by mens Fasting for the Soules that are already either in Heaven, or Hell, it followeth that there be some Soules °of dead men,° that are neither in Heaven, nor in Hell; and therefore they must bee in some third place, which must be Purgatory.[dh] [177]And thus with hard straining, hee has wrested [347] those places to the proofe of a Purgatory: whereas[177] it is manifest, that the ceremonies of Mourning, and Fasting, when they are used for the death of men, whose life was [178] not profitable to the Mourners, they are used for honours sake [179]to their persons;[179] and when tis done for the death of [180]them by whose life the Mourners had benefit, it proceeds from their particular dammage:[180] And so David honoured Saul, and [181]Abner,[181] with his Fasting; [182]and in the death of his owne child, recomforted[di] himselfe, by receiving his ordinary food.[182]

In the other places, which he alledgeth[dj] out of the old Testament, there is not so much as any shew, or colour[dk] of proofe. [183]He brings in[183] every text wherein there is the word Anger, or Fire, or Burning, or Purging, or Clensing, in case any of the Fathers have but in a Sermon °rhetorically° applied it to the Doctrine of Purgatory, [184]already beleeved.[184] [dl] The first verse of Psalme, 37.[dm] O Lord rebuke me not in thy wrath, nor chasten me in thy hot displeasure: What were this to Purgatory, if Augustine [185] had not applied the Wrath to the fire of Hell, and the Displeasure to that of Purgatory?[dn] And what is it to Purgatory, that of Psalme, 66. 12. Wee went through fire and water, and thou broughtest us to a [186]moist[186] place;[dp] and other the like texts, [187](with which the Doctors of those times entended to adorne, or extend their Sermons, or Commentaries) haled[dq] to their purposes by force of wit?[187]

Quia cum pro suo ipsius Filio aegrotante jejunabat, postquam intellexit mortuum illum esse, cibum sumpsit.[dg] Deinde arguit sic, Quoniam Anima existit separata à corpore, neque per Iejunium impetrari quicquam potest animis quae jam sunt in Coelo, vel in Inferno; sequitur quasdam esse animas quae neque in Coelo sunt, neque in Inferno; & proinde debere eas esse in tertio aliquo loco, id est in Purgatorio.[dh] Sed negandum est, quod assumit Davidem ideò jejunâsse, ut aliquid Saulo & Ionathano impetraret. Manifestum enim est, Ceremonias usitatas Plangendi & jejunandi in morte quidem eorum, quorum vita plangentibus damnosa aut inutilis erat, honoris tantum causa adhiberi, in morte autem amicorum & necessariorum Luctum esse non Litaniam. Places of the New Testament for Purgatory answered.

But he alledgeth[dr] other places of the New Testament, that are not so easie to be answered: And first that of Matth. 12. 32. Whosoever speaketh a word against the Sonne of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not bee forgiven him neither in this world, nor in the world to come: Where he will have Purgatory to be the World to come, [188]wherein some sinnes may be forgiven, which in this World were not forgiven:[ds] notwithstanding that it is manifest, there are but three Worlds; one from the Creation to the Flood, which was destroyed by Water, and is called in Scripture the Old World; another from the Flood, to the day of Judgement, which is the Present World, and shall bee destroyed by Fire; and the third, which shall bee from the day of Judgement forward, everlasting, which is called the World to come; and in which [188] it is agreed by all, there shall be no Purgatory: °And therefore the World to come, and Purgatory, are inconsistent.° But what then can bee the meaning of those our Saviours words? [189]I confesse they are very hardly[dt] to bee reconciled with all the Doctrines now unanimously received: Nor is it any shame, to confesse the profoundnesse of the Scripture, to bee too great to be sounded by the shortnesse of humane understanding. Nevertheless, I may propound such things to the consideration of more learned Divines, as the text it selfe suggesteth. And first, seeing to speake against the Holy Ghost, as being the third Person of the Trinity, is to speake against the Church, in which the Holy Ghost resideth;[189] it seemeth the comparison is made, betweene the [190] Easinesse[dv] of our Saviour, in [191]bearing with[dw] offences done to him while hee himselfe taught the world, that is, when he was on earth, and the Severity of the Pastors after him, against those which should deny their authority, which was from the Holy Ghost:[191] As if he should say, You that [192]deny[192] [348] my Power; nay you that [193]shall crucifie me, shall be pardoned by mee, as often as you[193] turne unto mee by Repentance: But if you deny the Power of them that teach you hereafter, by vertue of the Holy Ghost, they shall be inexorable, and shall not forgive you, [194]but persecute you in this World, and[194] leave you without absolution, °(though you turn to me, unlesse you turn also to them,)° to the punishments (as much as lies in

It is evident that the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity, was sent as the Comforter[du] in order to assist the Church until the end of the world; and therefore blasphemy against the Holy Spirit may not improperly be called blasphemy against the Church. them) of the World to come: And so the words may be taken as a Prophecy, or Praediction concerning the [195]times, as they have long been in the Christian Church: Or if this be not the meaning, (for I am not peremptory in such difficult places,) perhaps there may be place left after the Resurrection for the Repentance of some sinners: And there is also another place, that seemeth to agree therewith. For considering[195] the words of St. Paul (1 Cor. 15. 29.) What shall they doe which are Baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not at all? why also are they Baptized for the dead? [196] a man may probably[dx] inferre, °as some have done,°[dy] that in St. Pauls time, there was a custome [197]by[197] receiving Baptisme for the dead, (as men that now beleeve, are Sureties and Undertakers[dz] [198]for the[198] Faith of Infants, that are not capable of beleeving,) [199]to undertake for the persons of their deceased friends, that they should be ready to obey, and receive our Saviour for their King, at his coming again; and then the forgivenesse of sins in the world to come, has no need of a Purgatory. But in both these interpretations, there is so much of paradox,[ea] that I trust not to them; but propound them to those that are throughly[eb] versed in the Scripture, to inquire if there be no clearer place that contradicts them. Onely of thus much, I see evident Scripture, to perswade me, that there is neither the word, nor the thing of Purgatory, neither in this, nor any other text;[199] nor any thing that can prove a necessity of a place for the Soule without the Body; neither for the Soule of Lazarus during the four days he was dead;[ec] °nor for the Soules of them which the Romane Church pretend to be tormented now in Purgatory.° For God, that could give a life to [200]a peece of clay,[200] [ed] hath the same power to give life again to a dead man, °and renew his inanimate, and rotten Carkasse, into a glorious, spirituall, and immortall Body.°

In like manner, the Apostle saith of them, that holding this Foundation Iesus is the Christ, shall build thereon some other [349] Doctrines that be erroneous, that they shall not be consumed in that fire which reneweth the world, but shall passe through it to Salvation; but so, as to see, and relinquish their former Errours. The Builders, are the Pastors; the Foundation, that Iesus is the Christ; the Stubble and Hay, False Consequences drawn from it through Ignorance, or Frailty; the Gold, Silver, and pretious Stones, are their True Doctrines; and their Refining or Purging, the Relinquishing of their Errors. Baptisme for the Dead, how understood.

A third place is that of 1 Cor. 15. before mentioned,[ej] concerning Baptisme for the Dead: out of which he concludeth, first, that Prayers for the Dead are not unprofitable; and out of that, that there is a Fire of Purgatory:[ek] But neither of them rightly. For of many interpretations of the word Baptisme, he approveth this in the first place, that by Baptisme is meant °(metaphorically) a Baptisme of° Penance; and that men are in this sense Baptized, when they Fast, and Pray, and give Almes:[el] °And so Baptisme for the Dead, and Prayer for the Dead, is the same thing.° But this is a [203]Metaphor,[203] of which there is no example, neither in the Scripture, nor in [204]any other use of language; and which is also discordant to the harmony, and scope of the Scripture.[204]

[el] Ibid., ii, pp. 727–30: Bellarmino discusses six possible interpretations, and states his preference (p. 729) for this one, the sixth.

The word Baptisme is used (Mar. 10. 38. & Luk. 12. 50.)[em] for being Dipped in ones own bloud, as Christ was [205] upon the Cross, and [206]as most of the Apostles were, for giving testimony of him. But it is hard to say, that Prayer, Fasting, and Almes, have any similitude with Dipping. The same is used also Mat. 3. 11.[en] (which seemeth to make somewhat for Purgatory) for a Purging with Fire. But it is evident the Fire and Purging here mentioned, is the same whereof the Prophet Zachary[eo] speaketh (chap. 13. v. 9.) I will bring the third part through the Fire, and will Refine them, &c. And St. Peter after him (1 Epist. 1. 7.)[ep] That the triall of your Faith, which is much more precious than of Gold that perisheth, though it be tryed with Fire, might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory at the Appearing of Iesus Christ; and St. Paul (1 Cor. 3. 13.) The Fire shall trie every mans work of what sort it is. But St. Peter, and St. Paul speak of the Fire that shall be at the Second Appearing of Christ; and the Prophet Zachary of the Day of Judgment: And therefore this place of S. Mat. may be interpreted of the same; and then there will be no necessity of the Fire of Purgatory.[206]

[207] Another interpretation of Baptisme for the Dead, [208]is that which I have before mentioned, which he preferreth[eq] to the second place of probability:[208] [er] And thence also he inferreth the utility of Prayer for the Dead.[es] For if after the Resurrection, such as have not heard of Christ, or not beleeved in him, may be received into Christs Kingdome; it is not in vain, °after their death,° that their friends should pray for them, °till they should be risen.° But granting that God, at the prayers of the faithfull, may convert unto him some of those that have not heard [209]Christ preached,[209] and consequently cannot have rejected Christ, and that the charity of [210]men in that point,[210] cannot be blamed; yet this concludeth nothing for Purgatory, because [350] to rise from Death to Life, is one thing; to rise from Purgatory to Life is another; as being a rising from Life to Life, from a Life in [211]torments[211] to a Life in joy.

What John the Baptist says about Christ (Matt. 3: 11),[en] 'He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire', [Vulg; AV] is not about Purgatory, but about what is said in Acts 2: 3, 'And there appeared unto them cloven tongues like as of fire.' Baptismi pro mortuis interpretationem aliam adfert, nempe, eandem quam ego supra adduxi, ut verisimillimam: & concludit inde Precationis pro mortuis utilitatem.[es] Siquidem enim in Regnum Christi recipi post Resurrectionem possunt illi, qui nomen Christi non audierunt, aut in eum non crediderunt; inutile non esset, ut eorum amici pro illis precarentur. Atqui concesso fieri posse, ut ad preces Fidelium, aliquos eorum convertat Deus, quibus Euangelium inauditum fuerat, quique proinde Christum rejecisse non potuerunt; quodque charitas Orantium pro illis reprehendi non possit; nihil tamen facit hoc pro Purgatorio. Aliud enim est resurgere à morte ad vitam, [304] aliud resurgere à Purgatorio ad vitam. Est enim hoc resurgere à vita ad vitam, nempe à vita misera ad vitam foelicem.

A fourth place is that of Mat. 5. 25.[et] Agree with thine Adversary quickly, whilest thou art in the way with him, lest at any time the Adversary deliver thee to the Iudge, and the Iudge deliver thee to the Officer, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost[eu] farthing. In which Allegory, the Offender [212] is the Sinner; both the Adversary and the Judge is God; the Way is this Life; the Prison is the Grave; °the Officer, Death;° from which, the sinner shall not rise again to life eternall, but to a second Death, [213]till he have[213] paid the utmost farthing, or Christ pay it for him by his Passion, [214]which is a full Ransome for all manner of sin, as well lesser sins, as greater crimes; both being made by the passion of Christ equally veniall.[214]

The fift place, is that of Matth. 5. 22. [215] Whosoever is angry with his Brother °without a cause,° shall be guilty in Iudgment. And whosoever shall say to his Brother, RACHA,[ev] shall be guilty in the Councel. But whosoever shall say, Thou Foole, shall be guilty to hell fire. From which words he inferreth three sorts of Sins, and three sorts of Punishments; and that none of those sins, but the last, shall be punished with hell fire; and consequently, that [216]after this life, there is[216] punishment of lesser sins in Purgatory. [217]Of which inference, there is no colour[ew] in any interpretation that hath yet been given of them:[217] Shall there be a distinction after this life of Courts of Justice, [218]as there was amongst the Jews in our Saviours time, to hear, and determine divers sorts of Crimes; as the Judges, and the Councell?[218] Shall not all Judicature appertain to Christ, and his Apostles? To understand therefore this text, we are not to consider it solitarily, but jointly with the words precedent, and subsequent. Our Saviour in this Chapter interpreteth the Law of Moses; which the Jews thought was then fulfilled, when they had not transgressed the Grammaticall[ex] sense thereof, however they had transgressed against the [219]sentence, or meaning[219] of the Legislator. Therefore whereas they thought the Sixth Commande-

Locus quartus est Matth. 5. 25,[et] Esto consentiens adversario tuo citò, dum es in via cum eo: ne forte tradat te adversarius Iudici, & Iudex tradat te Ministro: & in carcerem mittaris. Amen dico tibi, non exies inde, donec reddas novissimum quadrantem. In qua Allegoria, qui proximum laesit, est Peccator; Iudex idemque Adversarius, est Deus; Via est Vita praesens; Carcer est Sepulchrum, unde ad vitam aeternam non resurget Peccator, sed ad secundam mortem, nisi prius reddiderit ultimum quadrantem, vel pro eo Passione sua reddiderit Christus. Itaque verba haec ad Purgatorium nihil pertinent.

Locus quintus est Matth. 5. 22, Ego autem dico vobis: quia omnis qui irascitur fratri suo, reus erit Iudicio. Qui autem dixerit fratri suo, Raca,[ev] reus erit Concilio. Qui autem dixerit fatue: reus erit Gehennae ignis. A quibus verbis tria esse infert genera Peccatorum, & tria genera Poenarum. Peccati genus ultimum tantum in Gehenna puniendum esse dicens; & proinde Peccatorum minorum poenas dari debere in Purgatorio. Cujus argumenti vim nullam video. Num curiae erunt diversae post mortem ad criminum diversas species distinguendas, sicut erant in Iudaea, Tribunal Iudicum, & Consistorium Seniorum? Nonne Iudicium omne erit Christi & Apostolorum? Itaque ad explicationem hujus loci debemus illum, non solitariè considerare, sed conjunctim cum verbis quae antecedunt, & subsequuntur. Servator noster in hoc Capite interpretatur Legem Mosaicam; quam Iudaei tunc implêsse se existimabant, si sensum verborum Grammaticum non transgressi erant, quanquam contra sententiam Legis fecissent, & intentionem Legislatoris. ment was not broken, but by Killing a man; nor the Seventh, but when a man lay with a woman, not his wife; our Saviour tells them, the °inward° Anger of a man against his brother, if it be without just cause, is Homicide: You have heard (saith hee) the Law of Moses, Thou shalt not Kill, and that Whosoever shall Kill, shall bee condemned before the Iudges, °or before the Session of the Seventy:° [ey] But I say unto you, to be Angry with ones Brother without cause; or to say unto him Racha, or Foole, is Homicide, and shall be punished at the day of Judgment, and Session of Christ, and his Apostles, with Hell fire: so that those words were not used to distinguish between divers Crimes, and divers Courts of Justice, and divers Punishments; but to [220]taxe[ez] the distinction between sin, and sin, which the Jews drew not from the difference of the Will in Obeying God, but from the [351] difference of their Temporall Courts of Justice; and to shew them that he that had the Will to hurt his Brother, though the effect appear but in Reviling, or not at all, shall be cast into hell fire, by the Judges, and by the Session, which shall be the same, not different Courts at the day of Judgment. This considered, what can be drawn from this text, to maintain Purgatory, I cannot imagine.[220]

The sixth place is Luke 16. 9. Make yee friends of the [221]unrighteous Mammon,[221] [fa] that when yee faile, they may receive you into Everlasting Tabernacles. This he alledges to prove Invocation of Saints °departed.° [fb] But the sense is plain, That we should [222]make friends with our Riches, of[222] the Poore; and thereby obtain their Prayers whilest [223]they live. He that giveth to the Poore, lendeth to the Lord.[223] [fc]

The seventh is Luke 23. 42. Lord remember me when thou commest into thy Kingdome: Therefore, saith hee, there is Remission of sins [224] after this life.[fd] But the consequence is not good. Our Saviour then forgave [225]him; and at his comming againe in Glory, will remember to[225] raise him againe to Life Eternall.

CHAP. XLV.

Of DAEMONOLOGY, and other Reliques of the Religion of the Gentiles.

The Originall of Daemonology.

[1]The impression made on the organs of Sight, by lucide Bodies, either in one direct line, or in many lines, reflected from Opaque, or refracted in the passage through Diaphanous Bodies, produceth in living Creatures, in whom God hath placed such Organs, an Imagination of the Object, from whence the Impression proceedeth; which Imagination is called Sight; and seemeth not to bee a meer Imagination, but the Body it selfe without us; in the same manner, as when a man violently presseth his eye, there appears to him a light without, and before him, which no man perceiveth but himselfe; because there is indeed no such thing without him, but onely a motion in the interiour organs, pressing by resistance outward, that makes him think so. And the motion made by this pressure, continuing after the object which caused it is removed, is that we call Imagination, and Memory, and (in sleep, and sometimes in great distemper of the organs by Sicknesse, or Violence) a Dream: of which things I have already spoken briefly, in the second and third Chapters.[1]

[2]This nature of Sight having never been discovered by the ancient pretenders to Naturall Knowledge; much lesse by those that consider not things so remote (as that Knowledge is) from their present use; it was hard for men to conceive of those Images in the Fancy, and in the Sense, otherwise, than of things really without us: Which some (because they vanish away, they know not whither, nor how,) will have to be absolutely Incorporeall, that is to say Immateriall, or[2] Formes without Matter; Colour and Figure, without any coloured or figured Body; and that they can put on Aiery bodies (as a garment) to make them Visible when they will to our bodily Eyes; and others [3]say,[3] are Bodies, and living Creatures, but made of Air, or other more subtile °and aethereall° Matter, which is, then, when they will be seen, condensed.

CAPVT XLV.

De Daemonologia, & Reliquiis aliis Religionum Ethnicarum.

Quomodo ab Objectis Visibilibus, tum in Linea Directa, tum in reflexa & refracta producantur in hominibus Phantasmata, sive ipsorum Objectorum Imagines, dictum supra est cap. 1, & 2. Quod cum ignorarent Philosophi Veteres, & multo magis illorum temporum homines alii, qui neglectis scientiis, studebant tantum divitiis vel acquirendis vel fruendis, sententias eorum, qui vocabantur Philosophi necessario sequebantur; non pensitantes rationes, sed verba tantùm accipientes, more eorum, qui ad oscitationem aliorum oscitant & ipsi. Philosophorum autem alii Phantasmata illa, quia non permanebant, sed evanescebant, Immaterialia, Incorporea, Formas sine Materia, Colorem & Figuram sine Corpore colorato & figurato esse existimabant; & quae Corpora Aërea induere quasi vestem possent, quoties oculis humanis videri vellent. Alii autem Corpora ea esse, & Animata, sed facta ex Aëre, aliave subtiliore Materia quam, cum videri vellent, condensabant. In hoc

[1] I have described in Chapters 1 and 2, above, how phantasms, or images of the objects themselves, are produced in men by visible objects, either in a direct line or in a reflected or refracted line.

[2] Because this was unknown to the ancient philosophers, and more so to other people of those times who, having neglected the sciences, applied themselves only to the acquisition or enjoyment of wealth, they [sc. the latter] necessarily followed the opinions of those who were called philosophers, not weighing reasons but accepting mere words, in the manner of those who, when others yawn, yawn themselves. Now some of the philosophers, because those phantasms did not remain but vanished away, considered them to be immaterial; incorporeal; [3] that they

But [4]Both of them agree on one generall appellation of them, DAEMONS. As if the Dead of whom they Dreamed, were not Inhabitants of their own Brain, but of the Air, or of Heaven, or Hell; not Phantasmes, but Ghosts; with just as much reason, as if one should say, he saw his own Ghost in a Looking-Glasse, or the Ghosts of the Stars in a River; or call the ordinary apparition of the Sun, of the quantity of about a foot,[a] the Daemon, or Ghost of that great Sun that enlighteneth the whole visible world: And by that means have feared them, as things of an unknown, that is, of an unlimited power to doe them good, or [353] harme; and consequently,[4] given occasion to the Governours of °the Heathen° Common-wealths to regulate this their fear, [5]by establishing that DAEMONOLOGY (in which the Poets, as Principall Priests of the Heathen Religion, were specially employed, or reverenced) to the Publique Peace, and to the Obedience of Subjects necessary thereunto;[5] and to make some of them Good Daemons, and others Evill; the one as a Spurre to the Observance, the other, °as Reines° to withhold them from Violation of the Laws.

What were the Daemons of the Ancients.

What kind of things [6]they were, to whom they attributed the name of Daemons,[6] appeareth partly in the Genealogie of their Gods, written by Hesiod,[b] [7]one of the[7] most ancient Poets of the Graecians; and partly in °other° Histories; °of which I have observed some few before, in the 12. Chapter of this discourse.°

How that Doctrine was spread.

The Graecians, by their Colonies and Conquests, communicated their Language and Writings [8]into[8] Asia, Egypt, and Italy; and therein, °by necessary consequence° their Daemonology, or (as St. Paul calles it) their Doctrines of Devils:[c] [9]And by that meanes, the contagion was derived[d] also to the[9] Jewes, both of Iudaea, and Alexandria, and other parts, whereinto they were dispersed. But the name of Daemon they did not (as the Graecians) attribute [10]to[10] Spirits both Good, and Evill; but to the Evill onely: And to the Good Daemons they gave the name of the Spirit of God; and [11]esteemed those into whose bodies they entred to be[11] Prophets. In summe, [12]all singularity if[12]

[4] all agreed that they were demons, as if, just as ineptly, they were to say that when they saw dead men in their dreams, those were the souls of the men whom they had previously seen alive; or as if when they saw themselves in a mirror, or the stars in water, they described those things as their souls or the souls of the stars. And (as necessarily followed) they have feared some phantasms, as if they had an unlimited power to help them or harm them. For an unknown power is usually regarded as infinite by the uneducated common people. This fear on the part of uneducated men has

Good, they attributed to the Spirit of God; and [13]if Evill, to some[13] Daemon, °but° a κακοδαίμων, an Evill Daemon, °that is, a Devill.° And therefore, they called Daemoniaques, °that is, possessed by the Devill,° such as we call [14]Madmen or Lunatiques; or such as had the Falling Sicknesse;[14] [e] or that spoke any thing, which they [15]for want of understanding, thought absurd:[15] As also of an Unclean person °in a notorious degree,° they used to say he had an Unclean Spirit;[f] of a Dumbe man, that he had a Dumbe [16]Devill;[16] [g] and of Iohn Baptist (Math. 11. 18) for the singularity of his fasting, that he had a [17]Devill;[17] and of our Saviour, because he said, hee that keepeth his sayings should not see Death in aeternum, Now we know thou hast a Devill; Abraham is dead, and [18]the Prophets are dead:[18] And again, because he said (Iohn 7. 20.) They went about to kill him, the people answered, Thou hast a Devill, who goeth about to kill thee? Whereby it is manifest, that the Jewes had the same opinions [19] concerning Phantasmes, namely, that [20]they were not Phantasmes, that is,[20] Idols[h] of the braine, but things reall, [21] and independent on[i] the Fancy.

John 8. 52.

Why our Saviour controlled[1] it not.

Which doctrine if it be not true, why (may some say) did not our Saviour °contradict it, and° teach the contrary? nay why does he use °on diverse occasions,° such forms of speech as seem to confirm it? To this I answer, that first, where Christ saith, A spirit hath not flesh and bone,[k] though hee [22]shew[22] that there be Spirits, yet hee denies not that they are Bodies: And where St. Paul saies, [23]We[23] shall rise spirituall Bodies,[l] he acknowledgeth the nature of Spirits, but that they are Bodily Spirits; °which is not difficult to understand.° For Air and many other things are Bodies, though not Flesh and Bone, or any other grosse body, to bee [354] discerned by the eye. But when our Saviour speaketh to [24]the Devill,[24] and commandeth him to go out of a man,[m] if by [25]the Devill,[25] be meant a Disease, as Phrenesy,[n] or [26]Lunacy,[26] or a corporeal Spirit, is not the speech improper? can Diseases heare? or can there be [27]a[27] corporeall Spirit in °a Body of° Flesh and Bone, full already of vitall and animall Spirits? Are there not therefore Spirits, that [28]neither have Bodies, nor are meer Imaginations?[28] To the first I answer, that the addressing of Etiam hominem immundum habere dicebant, Spiritum immundum;[f] & hominem mutum habere in se Daemonium mutum.[g] Itaque de Iohanne Baptista quia singulari modo jejunabat, dixerunt, quod habebat Daemonium; & de Servatore nostro, quia dixit, qui mea dicta custodiet, non videbit mortem in aeternum; dixerunt, *nunc scimus te Daemonium habere. our Saviours command to the Madnesse, or [29]Lunacy he cureth,[29] is no more improper, than was his rebuking of the Fever, or of the Wind, and Sea;[p] for neither do these hear: Or than was the command of God, to the Light, to the Firmament, to the Sunne, and Starres, when he commanded them to bee:[q] for they could not heare before they had a beeing. But those speeches [30] are not improper, because they signifie the power of Gods Word: no more therefore is it improper, to command Madnesse, [31]or Lunacy (under the appellation of Devils, by which they were then commonly understood,) to depart out of a mans body. To the second, concerning their being Incorporeall, I have not yet observed any place of Scripture, from whence it can be gathered, that any man was ever possessed with any other Corporeall Spirit, but that of his owne, by which his body is naturally moved.[31]

The Scriptures doe not teach that Spirits are Incorporeall.

Our Saviour, °immediately after the Holy Ghost descended upon him in the form of a Dove,° is said by St. Matthew (Chapt. 4. 1.) to have been led up by the Spirit into the Wildernesse[32]; and the same is recited (Luke 4. 1.) in these words, Iesus being full of the Holy Ghost, was led in the Spirit into the Wildernesse: Whereby it is evident, that by Spirit there, is meant the Holy Ghost. This cannot be interpreted for [33]a Possession: For Christ, and the Holy Ghost, are but one and the same substance; which is no possession of one substance, or body, by another. And whereas in the verses following, he is said to have been taken up by the Devill into the Holy City, and set upon a pinnacle of the Temple,[r] shall we conclude thence that hee was possessed of the Devill, or carryed thither by violence? And again, carryed thence by the Devill into[33] an exceeding high mountain, who shewed him thence all the Kingdomes of the world:[s] [34]Wherein, wee are not to beleeve he was either possessed, or forced by the Devill;[34] nor that any Mountaine is high enough, [35](according to the literall sense,) to shew him one whole Hemisphere.[35] What then can be the meaning of this place, other than [36]that he went of himself into the Wildernesse; and that this carrying of him up and down, from the Wildernesse to the City, and from thence into a Mountain, was a Vision? Conformable whereunto, is also the phrase of St. Luke, that hee was led into the Wildernesse, not by, but in the Spirit: whereas concerning His being Taken up into the Mountaine, and unto the Pinnacle of the Temple, hee speaketh as St. Matthew doth. Which suiteth with the nature of a Vision.[36]

Again, where St. Luke sayes of Judas Iscariot, that Satan entred into him, and thereupon that he went and communed with the Chief Priests, and Captaines, how he might betray Christ unto them:[u] it [355] may be [37]answered, that by the Entring of Satan (that is the Enemy) into him, is meant,[37] the hostile and traiterous intention of selling [38] his Lord and Master. For as by the Holy Ghost, is frequently in Scripture understood, the Graces and [39]good Inclinations[39] given by the Holy Ghost; so by the Entring of Satan, may bee understood the wicked Cogitations, and [40] Designes of the Adversaries of Christ, °and his Disciples.° For °as° it is hard to say, that the Devill was entred into Judas, before he had [41]any such hostile designe; so it is impertinent[v] to say, he was first Christs Enemy in his heart, and that the Devill entred into him afterwards. Therefore the Entring of Satan, and his Wicked Purpose, was one and the same thing.[41]

But if there be no Immateriall Spirit, °nor any Possession of mens bodies by any Spirit Corporeall,° it may again be asked, why our Saviour and his Apostles did not teach the People so; and in such cleer words, as they might no more doubt thereof. But such questions as these, are [42]more curious,[w] than necessary for a Christian mans[42] Salvation. Men may as well aske, why Christ that could have given to all men Faith, Piety, and all [43]manner of morall Vertues, gave it to some onely, and not to all: and why he left the search of naturall Causes, and Sciences, to the naturall Reason and Industry of men, and did not reveal it to all, or any man supernaturally;[43] and many other such questions: Of which neverthelesse there may be alledged[x] probable and pious

Rursus quod dicit S. Lucas de Iuda Iscariota, quod *intravit in illum Satanas. reasons. For as God, when he brought the Israelites into the Land of Promise, did not secure them therein, by subduing all the Nations round about them; but left [44]many[44] of them, as thornes in their sides,[y] to [45]awaken from time to time their[45] Piety and Industry: so our Saviour, in conducting [46]us toward his heavenly Kingdome,[46] did not destroy all the difficulties of Naturall Questions; but left [47]them[47] to exercise our Industry, and Reason; [48]the Scope of his preaching,[48] being onely to shew us this plain and direct way to [49] Salvation, namely, the beleef of this Article, that he was the Christ, the Son of the living God, sent °into the world° to sacrifice himselfe for our Sins, and at his comming again, [50]gloriously to reign over his Elect, and to save them from their Enemies eternally: To which, the opinion of Possession by Spirits, or Phantasmes, are no impediment in the way; though it be to some an occasion of going out of the way, and to follow their own Inventions.[50] If wee require of the Scripture an account of all questions, which may [51]be raised to trouble us[51] in the performance of Gods commands; we may as well complaine of Moses for not having [52]set downe the time of the creation of such Spirits, as well as of the Creation of the Earth, and Sea, and of Men, and Beasts. To conclude, I[52] find in Scripture that there be Angels, and Spirits, good and evill; but not that they are Incorporeall, [53]as are the Apparitions men see in the Dark, or in a Dream, or Vision; which the Latines call Spectra, and took for Daemons. And I find that there are Spirits Corporeall, (though subtile and Invisible;) but not that any mans body was possessed, or inhabited by them; And that the Bodies of [356] the Saints shall be such, namely, Spirituall Bodies, as St. Paul calls them.[53] not from the [58]change of Nature; but[58] of Names. But how it comes to passe, that whereas [59]heretofore the Apostles, and after them for a time,[59] the Pastors of the Church, did cure those [60]singular Diseases, which now they are not seen to doe;[60] as likewise, why it is not in the power of every true Beleever now, to doe all that the Faithfull did then, that is to say, as we read (Mark 16. 17.)[ab] In Christs name to cast out Devills, to speak with new Tongues, to take up Serpents, to drink deadly Poison without harm taking, and to cure the Sick by the laying on of their hands, [61]and all this without other words, but in the Name of Iesus, is another question. And it is probable, that those extraordinary[61] gifts were given to the Church, for no longer a time, than [62]men trusted wholly to Christ, and looked for their felicity onely in his Kingdome to come; and consequently, that when they sought Authority, and Riches, and trusted to their own Subtilty for a Kingdome of this world, these supernaturall gifts of God were again taken from them.[62]

Another relique of Gentilisme, Worshipping of Images, left in the Church, not brought into it.

Another relique of Gentilisme, is the Worship of Images, [63]neither instituted by Moses in the Old, nor by Christ[63] in the New Testament; nor yet brought in from the Gentiles; but left amongst them, [64] after they had given their names to Christ. Before our Saviour preached, it was the [65]generall Religion of the Gentiles, to worship for Gods, those Apparences that remain in the Brain from the impression of externall Bodies upon the organs of their Senses, which are commonly called Ideas, Idols, Phantasmes, Conceits, as being Representations of those externall Bodies, which cause them, and have nothing in them of reality, no more than there is in the things that seem to stand before us in a Dream: And this is the reason why St. Paul says, Wee know that an Idol is[65] Nothing:[ac] Not that he thought that an Image of

And[67] the worship of these with Divine Honour, is that which is in the Scripture called Idolatry, and Rebellion against God. For God being King of the Jews, and his [68]Lieutenant being first Moses, and afterward the High Priest;[68] if the people had been permitted to worship, [69]and pray to Images, (which are Representations of[69] their own Fancies,) they [70]had had no farther dependence on the true God, of whom there can be no similitude; nor on his [357] prime[70] Ministers, Moses, and the High Priests; but every man had [71]governed himself[71] according to his own appetite, to the utter eversion[ad] of the Common-wealth, °and their own destruction for want of Union.° And therefore the first Law of God was, They should not [72]take for Gods, ALIENOS DEOS, that is,[72] the Gods of other nations, but that onely true God, who [73]vouchsafed to commune with Moses, and by him to give[73] them laws and directions, for their [74]peace, and for their salvation[74] from their enemies. The places of Scripture pretended to countenance the [76]setting up of Images, to worship them; or to set them up at all in the places where God is worshipped, are First,[76] two Examples; one of the Cherubins over the Ark of God[77]; the other of the Brazen Serpent:[ag] [78]Secondly,[78] some texts whereby we are commanded to worship certain Creatures for their relation to God; as °to worship his Footstool:[ah] And lastly, some other texts, by which is authorized, a religious honoring of° Holy things.[ai] But before I examine the force of those places, °to prove that which is pretended,° I must first explain what is to be understood by Worshipping, and what by Images, and Idols.

[ae] Exod. 20: 3–4; Deut. 5: 7–8. As Hobbes points out in the English, 'alienos deos' [Vulg] means 'the gods of others', not simply 'other gods' [AV].

[af] Possibly the English here should read 'the same crime,' (cf. the Latin, which makes clearer sense); the similar '-me' endings may have caused a scribal eye-skip.

[ag] Respectively, Exod. 37: 7–9; Num. 21: 9. The three categories of scriptural passages presented in by Hobbes in this paragraph are taken from Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 2, controv. 4, 'De ecclesia triumphante', bk. 2, ch. 12 (ii, pp. 971–2); the passages about the cherubim and the bronze serpent form Bellarmino's first category.

[ah] This refers to Ps. 99: 5, in Vulg. (98: 5), 'adorate scabillum pedum eius', 'worship his footstool' (in AV: 'worship at his footstool'). Bellarmino couples this with Matt. 5: 34–5, 'Swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne; Nor by the earth; for it is his footstool': Disputationes, tom. 2, controv. 4, 'De ecclesia triumphante', bk. 2, ch. 12 (ii, p. 972).

[ai] Bellarmino offers various texts, including Exod. 3: 5 ('the place whereon thou standest is holy ground'), and Exod. 28 (describing the 'holy garments' of Aaron and his sons): ibid., tom. 2, controv. 4, bk. 2, ch. 12 (ii, p. 972).

What is Worship.

I have already shewn in the 10 Chapter of this Discourse, that to Honor, is to value highly the Power of any person: and that such value is measured, by our comparing him with others.[aj] But because there is [79]nothing to be compared with God in Power; we Honor him not, but Dishonour him by any Value lesse than Infinite. And thus[ak] Honor is properly of its own nature, secret, and internall in the heart. But the inward thoughts of men, which appeare outwardly in their words and actions, are the signes of our Honoring, and these goe by the name of WORSHIP, in Latine CULTUS.[79] Therefore, to Pray to, to Swear by, to Obey, to bee Diligent, and Officious[al] in Serving: in summe, all words and actions that betoken Fear to Offend, or Desire to Please, is Worship, whether those words and actions be sincere, or feigned: °and because they appear as signes of Honoring, are ordinarily also called Honor.°

Distinction between Divine and Civill Worship.

The Worship we exhibite to °those we esteem to be but° men, as to Kings, and [80]men in Authority,[80] is Civill Worship: But the worship we exhibite to °that which we think to bee° God, whatsoever the [81]words, ceremonies, gestures, or other actions[81] be, is Divine Worship.[am] To fall prostrate before a King, in him that thinks him [82] but a Man, is but Civill Worship: And he that but [83]putteth off his hat[83] in the Church, for this cause, that he thinketh it the House of God, worshippeth with Divine Worship. They that seek the distinction of Divine and Civill Worship, not in the intention of the Worshipper, but in the Words δουλεία, and λατρεία, deceive themselves.[an] For whereas there be two sorts of Servants; that sort, °which° is of those that [358] are absolutely in the power of their Masters, as [84]Slaves[84] taken in war, and their Issue, whose bodies are not [85]in their own power, (their lives depending on the Will of their Masters, in such manner as to forfeit them upon the least disobedience,)[85] and that are bought and sold as Beasts, [86]were called Δοῦλοι, that is properly, Slaves,[86] and their Service Δουλεία: The other, °which° is of those [ak] Possibly 'thus' here may be an error for 'this'.

[al] = dutiful (OED, 'officious', adj., 1.a).

[am] This distinction, using the term 'civil worship', was common among Protestant writers: e.g., Perkins, Reformed Catholike, p. 181: 'it is lawfull for one man to worship another with ciuill worship, but to worship man with religious honour is vnlawfull'. Cf. Hobbes's dedicatory epistle to his translation of Thucydides, Eight Bookes, sig. A2r: 'And now, imitating in this Ciuill Worship, the Religious worship of the Gentiles . . .'.

[an] Both terms meant 'servitude' or 'service'; the latter was also used in classical Greek to mean 'worship', and is used for the service of God in the New Testament (e.g., John 16: 2; Rom. 9: 4). Roman Catholic teaching distinguished between them as two kinds of veneration, the former being permissible towards created things (e.g., saints, or images), the latter only towards God (see Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 2, controv. 4, 'De ecclesia triumphante', bk. 1, ch. 12 (ii, pp. 876–7)). The suggestion that the former term should be used for 'civil worship' and the latter for divine was made (on the basis of Augustine, De civitate Dei, X.1) in Field, Of the Church, III.20 (p. 114), and repeated by some subsequent writers (e.g., Downame, Godly Treatise of Prayer, pp. 53–4).

that serve [87](for hire, or in hope of benefit from their Masters) voluntarily; are called Θῆτες;[a0] that is, Domestique Servants; to whose service the Masters have no further right, than is contained in the Covenants made betwixt them. These two kinds of Servants have thus much common to them both, that their labour is appointed them by another:[87] And the word Λάτρις, is the generall name of both, [88]signifying him that worketh for another, whether, as a Slave, or a voluntary Servant: So that Λατρεία signifieth generally all Service; but Δουλεία the service of Bondmen onely, and the condition of Slavery: And both are used in Scripture (to signifie our Service of God) promiscuously. Δουλεία, because we are Gods Slaves; Λατρεία, because wee Serve him: and in all kinds of Service is contained, not onely Obedience, but also Worship; that is, such actions, gestures, and words, as signifie Honor.[88]

Phantasmes.

An IMAGE (in the [89] most strict signification of the word) is the Resemblance of some thing visible: [90]In which sense the Phantasticall Formes, Apparitions, or Seemings of visible Bodies to the Sight, are onely Images; such as are the Shew of a man, or other thing in the Water, by Reflexion, or Refraction; or of the Sun, or Stars by Direct Vision in the Air; which are nothing reall in the things seen, nor in the place where they seem to bee; nor are their magnitudes and figures the same with that of the object; but changeable, by the variation of the organs of Sight, or by glasses; and are present oftentimes in our Imagination, and in our Dreams, when the object is absent; or changed into other colours, and shapes, as things that depend onely upon the Fancy. And these are the Images which are originally and most properly called Ideas, and IDOLS, and derived from the language of the Graecians, with whom the word Εἴδω signifieth to See. They are also called PHANTASMES, which is in the same language, Apparitions. And from these Images it is that one of the faculties of mans Nature, is called the Imagination. And from hence it is manifest, that there neither is, nor can bee any Image made of a thing Invisible.[90]

It is [91]also[91] evident, that there can be no Image of a thing Infinite: for [92]all the Images, and Phantasmes that are made by the Impression[92] of things visible, are figured: but Figure is a quantity every way determined: And therefore there can bee no Image of God; [93]nor of the Soule of Man; nor of Spirits; but onely of Bodies Visible, that is, Bodies that have light in themselves, or are by such enlightened.[93]

eorum est, qui serviunt quidem, faciuntque eadem quod illi, sed voluntariè, & mercede tantum obligati, & vocabantur à Graecis Θῆτες;[ao] neque ulterius obligabantur, quàm ad id quod pacti fuerint. Vtriusque autem generis nomen commune est λάτρις, & nomen ministerii commune λατρεία. In Scripturis Sacris distinctio illa, praesertim quando sermo est de servis Dei, non invenitur. Deo enim debetur ministerii genus omne.

Imago (in propria & strictissima significatione) est alicujus rei visibilis Similitudo ipsa, id est, Phantasma, Spectrum, sive Corporis species apparens, sive directè, sive per reflectionem, aut refractionem, sive post Sensum in somniis, quas Substantias reales non esse, [311] satis supra ostensum est.[ap] Vocantur autem, Ideae, & Idola à voce Graeca Εἴδω, quae significat videre.

Fictions.

[94]And whereas a man can fancy Shapes he never saw; making up a Figure out of the parts of divers creatures; as the Poets make their [359] Centaures, Chimaeras, and other Monsters never seen: So can he also give Matter to those Shapes, and make them in Wood, Clay or Metall. And these are also called Images, not for the resemblance of any corporeall thing, but for the resemblance of some Phantasticall Inhabitants of the Brain of the Maker. But in these Idols, as they are originally in the Brain, and as they are painted, carved, moulded, or moulten in matter, there is a similitude of the one to the other, for which the Materiall Body made by Art, may be said to be the Image of the Phantasticall Idoll made by Nature.[94]

Materiall Images.

[95]But in a larger use of the word Image, is contained also,[95] any Representation of one thing by another. So [96]an earthly Soveraign[96] may be called the Image of God: And an inferiour Magistrate the Image of [97]an earthly Soveraign. And many times in the Idolatry of the Gentiles there was little regard to the similitude of their Materiall Idol to the Idol in their fancy, and yet it was called the Image of it. For a Stone unhewn has been set up for Neptune,[aq] and divers other shapes far different from the shapes they conceived of their Gods. And at this day we see many Images of the Virgin Mary, and other Saints, unlike one another, and without correspondence to any one mans Fancy; and yet serve well enough for the purpose they were erected for; which was no more but by the Names onely, to represent the Persons mentioned in the History; to which every man applyeth a Mentall Image of his owne making, or none at all. And thus an Image in the largest sense, is either the Resemblance, or the Representation of some thing Visible; or both together, as it happeneth for the most part.[97]

But the name of Idoll is extended yet further in Scripture, to signifie also the Sunne, or a Starre, or any other Creature, visible or invisible, when they are worshipped for Gods.[as]

Idolatry what.

Having shewn what is Worship, and what an Image; I will now put them together, and examine what that IDOLATRY [98]is, which is forbidden in the Second Commandement, and other places of the Scripture.[98] [at]

To worship an Image, is voluntarily to doe [99]those externall acts, which are signes of honoring either[99] the matter of the Image, which is Wood, Stone, Metall, or some other visible creature; or the [100]Phantasme of the brain,[100] for the resemblance, or representation whereof, the matter was formed [o]and figured; or both together, as one animate Body, composed of the Matter and the Phantasme, as of a Body and Soule.[o]

Imago tamen esse potest rei nunquam visae, à partibus diversarum creaturarum, quas vidimus, composita, ut Chimaerae, Centauri, &c.

Imago autem (in largiore significatione) Materiam significat formatam juxta Phantasma vel Imaginem visam; vocantur autem imagines aliquando etiam si rei cujus Imago dicitur, similis non sit.

Transfertur etiam vox Imago ad quamlibet rei diversae Repraesentationem. Quo sensu Reges vocari possunt Imagines Dei; & Magistratus Imagines Regum; & Christus vocatur Character Hypostaseos Dei.[ar] Neque Idololatrae Ethnici ipsi in Idolis suis, ad similitudinem semper respexerunt, sed coluerunt non ut similia, sed ut Repraesentantia.

Idolum autem latius adhuc sumitur in Scripturis Sacris, ad significandum Solem vel Stellam, vel quamlibet aliam Creaturam visibilem, vel invisibilem, si Cultu divino coleretur.[as]

Ostensum est, quid sit Cultus, & quid sit Imago; videamus jam, quid significet vox composita, Idololatria sive Imaginum Cultus.

Imaginem colimus, quando voluntariè ea dicimus vel facimus, quae signa sunt Honoris interni, attributi materiae Imaginis, quae est Lignum, aut Lapis, aut Metallum, aliave creatura visibilis; vel ipsi Imagini ad cujus Similitudinem vel Repraesentationem Materia formata erat.

[94] But there can be an image of something never seen, made up out of the parts of different creatures which we have seen – for example, the image of a chimaera, a centaur, etc.

And in a larger sense 'image' means matter shaped in accordance with a phantasm or with an image that has been seen; and this is sometimes called an image even if it is not similar to the thing of which it is called an image.

[95] The term 'image' is also applied to [96] a king

[97] a king; and Christ is called the 'express image' [AV] of the substance of God.[ar] And the Gentile idolaters themselves did not always look for resemblance in their idols, worshipping them for representing, not resembling [the gods]. [98] or 'worship of images' is.

To be uncovered,[au] before a man of Power and Authority, or before the Throne of a [101]Prince, or in such other places as hee ordaineth to that purpose in his absence,[101] is to Worship that man, or Prince with Civill Worship; as being a signe, not of honoring the [102]stoole,[102] or place, but the Person[103]; and is not Idolatry. But if hee that doth it, should °suppose the Soule of the Prince to be in the Stool, or should° present a Petition to the Stool, it were Divine Worship, and Idolatry. [360]

To pray to a King for such things, as [104]hee[104] is able to doe for us, though we prostrate our selves [105]before him,[105] is but Civill Worship; because we acknowledge no other power in him, but humane: But °voluntarily° to pray unto him for [106] fair weather, or for any thing which God onely can doe for us, is Divine Worship, and Idolatry. On the other side, if a King compell a man to it by the terrour of Death, or other great °corporall° punishment, it is not Idolatry: For the Worship which [107]the Soveraign commandeth to bee done unto himself by the terrour of his Laws, is not a sign that he that obeyeth him, does inwardly honour him as a God, but that he is desirous to save himselfe from death, or from a miserable life; and that which is not a sign of internall honor, is no Worship; and therefore no Idolatry. Neither can it bee said, that hee that does it, scandalizeth, or layeth any stumbling block before his Brother;[av] because how wise, or learned soever he be that worshippeth in that manner, another man cannot from thence argue, that he approveth it; but that he doth it for fear; and that it is not his act, but the act of his Soveraign.[107]

To worship God, in some [108]peculiar[108] Place, or turning a mans face towards an Image, or determinate Place, is not to worship, or honor the Place, or Image; but to acknowledge it Holy, [109]that is to say, to acknowledge the Image, or the Place to be set apart from common use: for that is the meaning of the word Holy;[109] which implies no new quality in the Place, or Image; but onely a new Relation [110]by Appropriation to God;[110] and therefore is not Idolatry; no more than it was Idolatry to worship God [111]before[111] the Brazen Serpent;[aw] or for the Jews when they were out of their owne countrey, to turn their faces (when they prayed) toward the Temple of Jerusalem;[ax] °or for Moses to put off his Shoes when he was before the Flaming Bush, the ground appertaining to Mount Sinai; which place God had chosen to appear in, and to give his Laws to the People of Israel,[ay] and was therefore Holy ground, not by inhaerent sanctity, but by separation to Gods use; or for Christians to worship in the Churches, which are once solemnly dedicated to God for that purpose, by the Authority of the King, or other true Representant of the Church.° But to worship God, as °inanimating,[az] or° inhabiting, such Image, or place; [112]that is to say, an infinite substance in[112] a finite place, is Idolatry: for such finite Gods, are but Idols of the brain, [113]nothing reall; and are commonly called in the Scripture by the names of Vanity, and Lyes, and Nothing.[113] [ba] Also to worship God, not as [114]inanimating, or present in the place, or Image; but to the end to be put in mind of him, or of some works of his, in case[bb] the Place, or Image be dedicated, or set up by private authority, and not by the authority of them that are our Soveraign Pastors,[114] is Idolatry. For the Commandement is, Thou shalt not make to thy selfe any graven Image.[bc] God commanded Moses to set up the Brazen Serpent;[bd] hee did not make it to himselfe[115]; it was not therefore against the Commandement. But the making [116] of the Golden Calfe by Aaron, and the People,[be] as being done without [361] [117]authority[117] from God, was Idolatry; not onely because they held it for God, but also because they made it for a Religious use, without warrant either from God their [118]Soveraign,[118] or from Moses, that was his Lieutenant.

[o]The Gentiles worshipped for Gods, Jupiter, and others; that living, were men perhaps that had done great and glorious Acts; and for the Children of God, divers men and women, supposing them gotten between an Immortall Deity, and a mortall man. This was Idolatry, because they made them so to themselves, having no authority from God, neither in his eternall Law of Reason, nor in his positive and revealed Will. But though our Saviour was a man, whom wee also beleeve to bee God Immortall, and the Son of God; yet this is no Idolatry; because wee build not that beleef upon our own fancy, or judgment, but upon the Word of God revealed in the Scriptures. And for the adoration of the Eucharist, if the words of Christ, This is my Body,[bf] signifie, that he himselfe, and the seeming bread in his hand; and not onely so, but that all the seeming morsells of bread that have ever since been, and any time hereafter shall bee consecrated by Priests, bee so many Christs bodies, and yet all of them but one body, then is that no Idolatry, because it is authorized by our Saviour: but if that text doe not signifie that, (for there is no other that can be alledged[bg] for it,) then, because it is a worship of humane institution, it is Idolatry. For it is not enough to say, God can transubstantiate the Bread into Christs Body: For the Gentiles also held God to be Omnipotent; and might upon that ground no lesse excuse their Idolatry, by pretending, as well as others, a transubstantiation of their Wood, and Stone into God Almighty.[o]

[o]Whereas there be, that pretend Divine Inspiration, to be a supernaturall entring of the Holy Ghost into a man, and not an acquisition of Gods graces, by doctrine, and study; I think they are in a very dangerous Dilemma. For if they worship not the men whom they beleeve to be so inspired, they fall into Impiety; as not adoring Gods supernaturall Presence. And again, if they worship them, they commit Idolatry; for the Apostles would never permit themselves to be so worshipped.[bh] Therefore the safest way is to beleeve, that by the Descending of the Dove upon the Apostles;[bi] and by Christs Breathing on them, when hee gave them the Holy Ghost;[bj] and by the giving of it by Imposition of Hands,[bk] are understood the signes which God hath been pleased to use, or ordain to bee used, of his promise to assist those persons in their study to Preach his Kingdome, and in their Conversation,[bl] that it might not be Scandalous, but Edifying to others.°

Scandalous worship of Images.

°Besides the Idolatrous Worship of Images, there is also a Scandalous Worship of them; which is also a sin; but not Idolatry. For Idolatry is to worship by signes of an internall, and reall honour: but Scandalous Worship, is but Seeming Worship; and may sometimes bee joined with an inward, and hearty detestation, both of the [362] Image, and of the Phantasticall Daemon, or Idol, to which it is dedicated; and proceed onely from the fear of death, or other grievous punishment; and is neverthelesse a sin in them that so worship, in case they be men whose actions are looked at by others, as lights to guide them by; because following their ways, they cannot but stumble, and fall in the way of Religion: Whereas the example of those we regard not, works not on us at all, but leaves us to our own diligence and caution; and consequently are no causes of our falling.°

°If therefore a Pastor lawfully called to teach and direct others, or any other, of whose knowledge there is a great opinion, doe externall honor to an Idol for fear; unlesse he make his feare, and unwillingnesse to it, as evident as the worship; he Scandalizeth[bm] his Brother, by seeming to approve Idolatry. For his Brother arguing from the action of his teacher, or of him whose knowledge he esteemeth great, concludes it to bee lawfull in it selfe. And this Scandall, is Sin, and a Scandall given.[bn] But if one being no Pastor, nor of eminent reputation for knowledge in Christian Doctrine, doe the same, and another follow him; this is no Scandall given; for he had no cause to follow such example: but is a pretence of Scandall which hee taketh of himselfe for an excuse before men: For an unlearned man, that is in the power of an Idolatrous King, or State, if commanded on pain of death to worship before an Idoll, hee detesteth the Idoll in his heart, hee doth well; though if he had the fortitude to suffer death, rather than worship it, he should doe better. But if a Pastor, who as Christs Messenger, has undertaken to teach Christs Doctrine to all nations, should doe the same, it were not onely a sinfull Scandall, in respect of other Christian mens consciences, but a perfidious forsaking of his charge.°[bo]

[bi] The Gospels refer to the descent of the dove at the baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3: 16; Mark 1: 10; Luke 3: 22; John 1: 32); Hobbes has perhaps confused this with Pentecost (Acts 2: 1–4). [bj] John 20: 22.

[bn] Traditional moral theology used the term 'scandal' to describe behaviour which induces, or is liable to induce, another person to sin (see Aquinas, ST IIa IIae, qu. 43, art. 1, ad 4); when the scandalizing person had actively aimed at inducing the other to sin, the sin of the person so induced was called 'scandalum datum' ('scandal given') by Roman Catholic writers. But in English Protestant usage the term was used more loosely: Thomas Draxe defined 'a scandall giuen' as 'Any euill doctrine, word, or work . . . whereby the godly are grieued, the weake drawne to sinne and errour' (Christian Armorie, p. 69); Edward Brerewood wrote that 'scandall properly taken for Actiue scandall, or scandall giuen, is nothing else but an exemplary sinne' (Second Treatise of the Sabbath, pp. 47–8).

°The summe of that which I have said hitherto, concerning the Worship of Images, is this, that he that worshippeth in an Image, or any Creature, either the Matter thereof, or any Fancy of his own, which he thinketh to dwell in it; or both together; or beleeveth that such things hear his Prayers, or see his Devotions, without Ears, or Eyes, committeth Idolatry: and he that counterfeiteth such Worship for fear of punishment, if he bee a man whose example hath power amongst his Brethren, committeth a sin: But he that worshippeth the Creator of the world before such an Image, or in such a place as he hath not made, or chosen of himselfe, but taken from the commandement of Gods Word, as the Jewes did in worshipping God before the Cherubins, and before the Brazen Serpent[bp] for a time, and in, or towards the Temple of Jerusalem, which was also but for a time, committeth not Idolatry.°

Now for the Worship of Saints, and [119] Images, and Reliques, °and other things° at this day practised in the Church of Rome, [120]I say they are not allowed by the Word of God, nor brought into the Church of Rome, from the Doctrine there taught; but partly left [363] in it at the first conversion of the Gentiles; and afterwards countenanced, and confirmed, and augmented by the Bishops of Rome.[120]

Answer to the Argument from the Cherubins, and Brazen Serpent.

[121]As for the proofs alledged out of Scripture, namely, those[121] examples of Images appointed by God to bee set up;[bq] [122]They were not set up for the people, or any man to worship; but that they should worship God himselfe before them; as before the Cherubins over the Ark, and the Brazen Serpent. For we read not, that the Priest, or any other did worship[122] the Cherubins; but contrarily wee read (2 Kings 18. 4.) that Hezekiah brake in pieces the Brazen Serpent °which Moses had set up,° because the People [123]burnt incense to it. Besides, those examples are not put for our Imitation, that we also should set up Images, under pretence of worshipping God before them; because the words of the second Commandement, Thou shalt not make to thy selfe any graven Image, &c.[br] distinguish[123] between the Images that God commanded to be set up, and those which [124] wee set up to[bs] our selves. °And therefore from the Cherubins, or Brazen Serpent, to the Images of mans devising; and from the Worship commanded by God, to the Will-Worship[bt] of men, the argument is not good. This also is to bee considered, that as Hezekiah brake in pieces the Brazen Serpent, because the Jews did worship it, to the end they should doe so no more; so also Christian Soveraigns ought to break down the Images which their Subjects have been accustomed to worship; that there be no more occasion of such Idolatry. For at this day, the ignorant People, where Images are worshipped, doe really beleeve there is a Divine Power in the Images; and are told by their Pastors, that some of them have spoken; and have bled; and that miracles have been done by them; which they apprehend as done by the Saint, which they think either is the Image it self, or in it. The Israelites, when they worshipped the Calfe, did think they worshipped the God that brought them out of Egypt;[bu] and yet it was Idolatry, because they thought the Calfe either was that God, or had him in his belly. And though some man may think it impossible for people to be so stupid, as to think the Image to be God, or a Saint; or to worship it in that notion; yet it is manifest in Scripture to the contrary; where when the Golden Calfe was made, the people said, * These are thy Gods O Israel; and where the Images of Laban * are called his Gods. And wee see daily by experience in all sorts of People, that such men as study[bw] nothing but their food and ease, are content to beleeve any absurdity, rather than to trouble themselves to examine it; holding their faith as it were by entaile unalienable,[bx] except by an expresse and new Law.°

Painting of Fancies no Idolatry: but abusing them to Religious Worship is.

But [125]they[125] inferre from some other places, that it is [126] lawfull to paint Angels, and also God himselfe: as from Gods walking in the Garden; from Jacobs seeing God [127]at the top of the[127] ladder; and from °other° Visions, and Dreams.[by] But [128] Visions, and Dreams, whether naturall, or supernaturall, are but Phantasmes: and he that painteth [129]an [364] Image of any of them, maketh not an Image of God, but of his own Phantasm, which is, making of[129] an Idol. I say not[130], that to draw a Picture after a fancy, is a Sin; but [131]when it is drawn, to hold it for a Representation of God, is against the second Commandement; and can be of no use, but to worship.[131] And the same may be said of the Images of Angels, and of men dead; unlesse as Monuments [132]of friends, or of men worthy remembrance: For such use of an Image, is not Worship of the Image; but a civill honoring of the Person, not that is, but that was: But when it is done to the Image which we make of a Saint, for no other reason, but that we think he heareth our prayers, and is pleased with the honour wee doe him, when dead, and without sense, wee[132] attribute to him more than humane power; and therefore it is Idolatry.

Seeing therefore [133]there is no authority, neither in the Law of Moses, nor in the Gospel, for the religious Worship of Images, or other Representations of God, which men set up to themselves; or for the Worship of the Image of any Creature in Heaven, or Earth, or under the Earth: And whereas Christian Kings, who are living Representants of God, are not to be worshipped by their Subjects, by any act, that signifieth a greater esteem of his power, than the nature of mortall man is capable of; It cannot be imagined, that the Religious Worship now in use,[133] was brought into the Church, by misunderstanding of the Scripture. It resteth therefore, that it was left in it, by not destroying the Images themselves, [134]in the conversion of the Gentiles that worshipped them.[134]

How Idolatry was left in the Church.

The cause whereof, was the immoderate °esteem, and° prices set upon the [135]workmanship of them,[135] which made the owners [136](though converted, from worshipping them as they had done Religiously for Daemons) to retain them still in their houses,[136] upon pretence of doing it in the honor of Christ, of the Virgin Mary, and of the Apostles, and other the Pastors of the Primitive Church; as being easie, by giving them new names, to make that an Image of the Virgin Mary, and of her Sonne our Saviour, which before °perhaps° was called the Image of Venus, and Cupid; and so of a Iupiter to make a Barnabas, and of Mercury a Paul,[bz] and the like. And [137]as worldly ambition creeping by degrees into the Pastors, drew them to an endeavour of pleasing the new made Christians; and also to a liking of this kind of honour, which they also might hope for after their decease, as well as those that had already gained it: so the worshipping of the Images of Christ and his Apostles, grew more and more Idolatrous;[137] save that somewhat after the time of Constantine, divers Emperors, and Bishops, and generall Councells [138]observed, and opposed the unlawfulnesse thereof;[ca] but too late, or too weakly.[138]

Cum igitur Cultus Imaginum, tum in Veteri, tum in Novo Testamento vetitus sit, credendum non est, introductum esse in Ecclesiam à Scripturis non rectè intellectis. Restat ergo ut in Ecclesia relictus sit eò quod Imagines, quas ii haberent, qui ab Idololatria ad Fidem Christianam conversi erant, non aboluerunt.

Causa autem hujus rei Imaginum & simulachrorum pretium insanum erat, Operum enim hujusmodi Domini, etsi colere ea desierunt, retinuerunt tamen sub praetextu Honorandi Christum, Virginem Mariam, Apostolos aliosque Pastores Ecclesiae primitivae. Facile enim erat, mutatis tantum nominibus, facere ut quod Simulachrum antè erat Veneris & Cupidinis, postea Simulachrum esset Sanctae Virginis, & Filii sui Servatoris nostri; & similiter ex Iove facile erat facere Barnabam; & ex Mercurio, Paulum.[bz] Itaque Pastores, (per ambitionem) populo novo Christianorum placere cupientes, paulatim & ipsi ad Cultum Imaginum Christi & Sanctorum perducti sunt. [ca] Bellarmino, summarizing Calvin's arguments against the use of images in church, referred to the canon prohibiting them issued by the Synod of Elvira ('Concilium Elibertinum': a synod, not a general council). Modern scholars date this to between 300 and 314, but Bellarmino discussed whether it was before or after the Council of Nicaea (325). See Disputationes, tom. 2, controv. 4, 'De ecclesia triumphante', bk. 2, ch. 9 (ii, pp. 957–8, 961). Also summarizing Protestant arguments, Bellarmino referred to a Council held in Constantinople under the iconoclastic Emperor Leo III (r. 717–41), and the 'Iconoclastic Council' of 338 bishops held in 754 under Constantine V (r. 741–75): bk. 2, ch. 11 (ii, pp. 969–70).

Canonizing of Saints.

The Canonizing of Saints, is another Relique of Gentilisme: It is neither a misunderstanding of Scripture, nor a new invention of the Roman Church, but a custome as ancient as the Common-wealth of Rome it self. The first that ever was canonized at Rome, was Romulus, and that upon the narration of Iulius Proculus, that swore before the Senate, he [139] spake with him after his death, and was assured by him, he [365] dwelt in Heaven, and was there called Quirinus, and would be propitious to the °State of their new° City: And thereupon the Senate [140]gave publique testimony of his Sanctity.[140 cb] Iulius Caesar, and other Emperors [141]after him, had the like testimony;[cc] that is, were Canonized for Saints; for by such testimony is CANONIZATION, now defined;[cd] and is the same with the Ἀποθέωσις[ce] of the Heathen.[141]

The name of Pontifex.

It is also from the Roman Heathen, that the Popes have received the name, °and power° of PONTIFEX MAXIMUS. [142]This was the name of him that in the ancient Common-wealth of Rome, had the Supreme Authority under the Senate and People, of regulating all Ceremonies, and Doctrines concerning their Religion:[142] And when Augustus Caesar changed the State [143] into a Monarchy, he took to himselfe no more but this [144]office,[144] and that of Tribune of the People,[cf] [145](that is to say, the Supreme [145] Power both in State, and Religion;) and the succeeding Emperors [146] enjoyed the same. But [147]when the Emperour Constantine lived, who was the first that professed and authorized Christian Religion, it was consonant to his profession, to cause Religion to be regulated (under his authority) by the Bishop of Rome: Though it doe not appear they had so soon the name of Pontifex; but rather, that the succeeding Bishops took it of themselves, to countenance the power they exercised over the Bishops of the Roman Provinces. For it is not any Priviledge of St. Peter, but the Priviledge of the City of Rome, which the Emperors were alwaies willing to uphold, that gave them such authority over other Bishops;[147] as [139] ^ saw him and [140] declared him a god. After him, [141] , were canonized, and called divine.

[142] However, they did not take that name until the Empire had lost its force in Italy; for the pontificate was a large part of the sovereign power. [143] ^ from a democracy [144] title, [145] (which two titles contained the entire ruling [146] ^ , while the Empire lasted,
[147] the reason why Constantine the Great gave the Roman bishop preference over the other bishops was not that he had succeeded to Peter, as chief of the Apostles, in the see of Rome, but that the city of Rome was the seat of the Empire;

Etiam Canonizatio Sanctorum è reliquiis erat Ethnicismi, non à Scripturis male intellectis nata, neque Romanae Ecclesiae Inventum novum, sed consuetudo non minùs antiqua, quam erat ipsa Romana Civitas. Primus omnium, qui Romae Canonizatus est, erat Romulus; quem Iulius Proculus coram Senatu juravit vidisse se, & convenisse postquam esset mortuus, affirmantem quod in coelo habitaret, & vocaretur ibi Quirinus, promittentemque propitium se Civitati futurum esse; & propterea à Senatu Deus declaratus est.[cb] Post illum Iulius Caesar, & alii quidam Imperatores Canonizati erant, & appellati Divi.[cc]

A Romanis Ethnicis etiam est, quod Papae sibi sumserunt nomen [314] Pontificis Maximi. Non tamen nomen illud ante sumserunt, quam vim suam Imperium in Italia perdiderat, nam Pontificatus, magna Summae Potestatis pars erat. Augustus Caesar, cum Statum Romanum à Democratia in Monarchiam converteret, Titulos duos solos sibi cepit, Tribuni plebis, & Pontificis Maximi,[cf] quibus Imperium integrum, tum rerum Civilium, tum Religionis, continebatur; quam potestatem etiam Imperatores, qui subsequuti sunt, dum stetit Imperium, retinuerunt. Quod autem Episcopus Romanus à Constantino Magno, Episcopis caeteris praelatus fuerit, causa non erat, quod Petro quasi Principi Apostolorum in cathedra Romana succederet, sed quia Imperii sedes erat Vrbs Romana; ut ex eo manifestum est, quod cum urbs [cb] This story is given in Cicero, De re publica, II.x.20, and in Livy, Ab urbe condita, I.16; Hobbes's source appears to be the former, which specifies the Senate and gives 'Quirinus' (rather than 'Quirites').

[cc] Suetonius, De vita caesarum, 'Divus Iulius', 88.

[cd] 'Defined' here has the sense of issuing a formal judgement determining an issue (OED, 'define', v., 1.b, 4). [ce] = deification.

may be evidently seen by that, that the Bishop of Constantinople, when the Emperour made that City the Seat of the Empire, [148]pretended to bee equall to the Bishop of Rome; though at last, not without contention, the Pope carryed it, and became the Pontifex Maximus;[cg] but in right onely of the Emperour; and not without the bounds of the Empire; nor any where, after the Emperour had lost his power in Rome; though it were the Pope himself that took his power from him. From whence wee may by the way observe, that there is no place for the superiority of the Pope over other Bishops, except in the territories whereof he is himself the Civill Soveraign; and where the Emperour having Soveraign Power Civill, hath expressely chosen the Pope for the chief Pastor under himselfe, of his Christian Subjects.[148]

Procession of Images.

[149]The carrying about of Images in Procession, is another Relique of the Religion of the Greeks, and Romans: For they also carried their Idols from place to place, in a kind of Chariot, which was peculiarly dedicated to that use, which the Latines called Thensa, and Vehiculum Deorum;[ch] and the Image was placed in a frame, or Shrine, which they called Ferculum: And that which they called Pompa, is the same that now is named Procession: According whereunto, amongst the Divine Honors which were given to Iulius Caesar by the Senate, this was one, that in the Pompe (or Procession) at the Circaean games, he should have Thensam & Ferculum, a sacred Chariot, and a Shrine;[ci] which was as much, as to be carried up and down as a God: Just as at this day the Popes are carried by Switzers[cj] under a Canopie.[149] [366]

Wax Candles, and Torches lighted.

[150]To these Processions also belonged the bearing of burning Torches, and Candles, before the Images of the Gods, both amongst the Greeks, and Romans. For afterwards the Emperors of Rome received the same honor; as we read of Caligula, that at his reception to the Empire, he was carried from Misenum to Rome, in the midst of a throng of People, the wayes beset with Altars, and Beasts for Sacrifice, and burning Torches:[ck] And of Caracalla that was received into Alexandria with Incense, and with casting of Flowers, and δᾳδουχίαις, that is, with Torches;[cl] for Δᾳδοῦχοι were they that amongst the Greeks carried Torches lighted in the Processions of their Gods: And in processe of time, the devout, but ignorant People, did many times honor their Bishops with the like pompe of Wax Candles, and the Images of our Saviour, and the Saints, constantly, in the Church it self. And thus came in the use of Wax Candles; and was also established by some of the ancient Councells.[150 cm]

[148] contended with the Pope for the same honour.[cg]

[149] Among the remains of heathenism is the 'pomp' or procession, in which images of Christ and of saints are commonly carried about through a city. For in the pomps of the heathen, too, their idols were seen to be carried around in the same way, in a chariot which they called 'thensa' and 'vehiculum deorum' ['vehicle of the gods']. This honour was also given to Julius Caesar, after his deification,[ch] and to a number of other Roman emperors.

[150] Also the use (in honouring God) of candles in churches was brought in from a similar rite practised by the heathen.

[cg] It is not clear what the source was of this not very accurate account. Constantine, who made Constantinople the seat of the Empire in 330, used the title 'pontifex maximus' himself, and so did the sons who succeeded him. According to Zosimus (New History, IV.36; ed. Bekker, p. 217), the Emperor Gratian (r. 375–82) refused the title; Protestant historians tended to assume that he conferred it on Pope Damasus I (r. 366–84), though there is no evidence of Damasus using the title. ('Pontifex' and 'summus pontifex' were widely used by the popes, but not 'pontifex maximus': see Schieffer, 'Der Papst als Pontifex Maximus'.) The Council of Constantinople (381) assigned to the Bishop of Constantinople a prerogative of honour second to that of the Bishop of Rome; this was confirmed by canon 28 of the Council of Chalcedon (451), which based its argument on the status of Rome and Constantinople as imperial cities.

[cj] = Swiss guards (OED, 'Switzer', 2).

[ck] Suetonius, De vita caesarum, 'Gaius Caligula', 13. Caligula ruled as Emperor from 37 to 41 AD. Misenum was a major port in Campania (on the Gulf of Pozzuoli).

[cl] Herodian, History, IV.viii.8. Caracalla ruled as Emperor from 211 to 217.

[cm] In his defence of candles, Bellarmino referred to the practice of the early Church, but not to Councils (Disputationes, tom. 2, controv. 4, 'De ecclesia triumphante', bk. 2, ch. 3 (ii, p. 935)). Hobbes may have been influenced by the Magdeburg Centuriators, who recorded that the Fourth Council of Toledo (633) instituted a rite for the blessing of candles in the churches of Galicia: Flacius et al., Ecclesiastica historia, iv, cent. 7, col. 221. The so-called Fourth Council of Carthage (*c.*514) had also specified the use of a candle in the liturgy for the ordination of an acolyte.

[151]The Heathens had also their Aqua Lustralis,[cn] that is to say, Holy Water. The Church of Rome imitates them also in their Holy Dayes. They had their Bacchanalia;[co] and we have our Wakes,[cp] answering to them: They their Saturnalia,[cq] and we our Carnevalls, and Shrove-tuesdays liberty of Servants: They their Procession of Priapus;[cr] wee our fetching in, erection, and dancing about May-poles; and Dancing is one kind of Worship: They had their Procession called Ambarvalia;[cs] and we our Procession about the fields in the Rogation week.[ct] Nor do I think that these are all the Ceremonies that have been left in the Church, from the first conversion of the Gentiles: but they are all that I can for the present call to mind; and if a man would wel observe that which is delivered in the Histories, concerning the Religious Rites of the Greeks and Romanes, I doubt not but he might find many more of these old empty Bottles of Gentilisme,[151] which the Doctors of the Romane Church, either by Negligence, or Ambition, have filled up again with the new Wine of Christianity, that will not faile in time to break them.[cu]

[151] From the heathen 'aqua lustralis' ['purificatory water'], too, is derived the 'holy water' which they use in churches. Again, the liberty of servants which is allowed on some days before the Lenten fast was an imitation of the ancient Roman 'Saturnalia';[cq] also that perambulation round the bounds of a parish after Easter is an imitation of the festival which the Romans called 'Ambarvalia'.[ct, cs] And I do not doubt that quite a few other ceremonies remained in the Church from the first conversion of the Gentiles, like old bottles, [cn] = 'purificatory water'.

[co] Mystery rites practised in the cult of Bacchus, and associated (by critics) with sexual promiscuity, wine-induced frenzy, and violent crime: see Livy, Ab urbe condita, XXXIX.8–18.

[cp] A 'wake' was the annual festival of an English parish church, with entertainments such as village sports and dancing; the term was used more generally for similar festivities in other countries (OED, 'wake', n.[1], 15.b–c).

[cq] A festival held in Rome in the second half of December, lasting usually for one week, and involving eating, drinking, present-giving, and the temporary liberty of slaves.

[cr] A Greek and Roman phallic god, associated with sexuality, fertility, and gardens.

[cs] A Roman agricultural fertility rite, involving processions round fields.

[ct] On the days from Rogation Sunday to Rogation Wednesday (the 36th to 39th days after Easter), farmers had their fields blessed, and priest and parishioners would process round the bounds of the parish, with prayers (in Roman Catholic countries) or without them (in post-1559 England).

CHAP. XLVI.

Of DARKNESSE from VAIN PHILOSOPHY, and FABULOUS TRADITIONS.

What Philosophy is.

BY PHILOSOPHY, is understood the Knowledge acquired by Reasoning, from the Manner of the Generation of any thing, to the Properties; or from the Properties, to some possible Way of Generation of the same; to the end to bee able to produce, as far as matter, and humane force permit, such Effects, as humane life requireth. So the Geometrician, from the Construction of Figures, findeth out many Properties thereof; and from the Properties, new Ways of their Construction, by Reasoning; to the end to be able to measure Land, and Water; and for infinite other uses. So the Astronomer, from the Rising, Setting, and Moving of the Sun, and Starres, in divers parts of the Heavens, findeth out the Causes of Day, and Night, and of the different Seasons of the Year; whereby he keepeth an account of Time: And the like of other Sciences.

Prudence no part of Philosophy.

By which Definition it is evident, that we are not to account as any part thereof, that originall knowledge called Experience, in which consisteth Prudence: Because it is not attained by Reasoning, but found as well in Brute Beasts, as in Man; and is but a Memory of successions of events in times past, wherein the omission of every little circumstance altering the effect, frustrateth the expectation of the most Prudent: whereas nothing is produced by Reasoning aright, but generall, eternall, and immutable Truth.

No false Doctrine is part of Philosophy:

Nor are we therefore to give that name to any false Conclusions: For he that Reasoneth aright in words he understandeth, can never conclude an Error:

No more is Revelation supernaturall:

Nor to that which any man knows by supernaturall Revelation; because it is not acquired by Reasoning:

Nor learning taken upon credit of Authors.

Nor that which is gotten by Reasoning from the Authority of Books; because it is not by Reasoning from the Cause to the Effect, nor from the Effect to the Cause; and is not Knowledg, but Faith.

CAPVT XLVI.

De Tenebris ab inani Philosophiâ.

Noli (Lector) expectare hoc loco, contra Philosophiam aut Philosophos orationem invectivam. Quid ergo agis? Distinguo inter Philosophos & non Philosophos; & inter Philosophiam veram, vitae humanae Magistram sapientissimam humanae naturae decus [315] singulare, & illam, quae jam diu pro Philosophia habita est, fucatam & garrulam meretriculam. Philosophia enim (sive studium Sapientiae) quanta est, Sapientia est; id est, Effectuum ex conceptis eorum causis, seu Generationibus; & rursus Generationum quae esse possunt, ex cognitis Effectibus per rectam ratiocinationem acquisita Scientia; quam nec Scriptura prohibet, nec hominum quisquam aspernatur.

Per quam Definitionem distinguitur Philosophia primo ab Experientia, & Prudentia hominum & caeterorum animalium communi ut quae non Ratione, sed Memoria tantùm comparatur.

Deinde distinguitur à Fide & Revelatione Supernaturali, quae non ratione acquiruntur, sed dono dantur.

Of the Darkness from Vain Philosophy.

Reader, do not expect here a speech inveighing against philosophy or philosophers. What, then [you ask], are you doing? I distinguish between philosophers and non-philosophers, and between true philosophy, the wisest mistress of human life and the peculiar honour of human nature, and that painted and garrulous whore who has for a long time now been taken for philosophy. For philosophy (or the study of wisdom) in any degree is wisdom; that is, knowledge of effects from conceived causes or generations of them, and again of possible generations from known effects, acquired by correct reasoning. This is neither forbidden by Scripture, nor despised by any man.

By means of this definition, philosophy is first distinguished from experience and from the prudence which is common to man and the other animals, since that is gained not by reason, but only by memory.

Next it is distinguished from faith and supernatural revelation, which are not acquired by reason, but given as a gift.

Of the Beginnings and Progresse of Philosophy.

The faculty of Reasoning being consequent to the use of Speech, it was not possible, but that there should have been some generall Truthes found out by Reasoning, as ancient almost as Language it selfe. The Savages of America, are not without some good Morall Sentences;[a] also they have a little Arithmetick, to adde, and divide in Numbers not too great:[b] but they are not therefore Philosophers. For as there were Plants of Corn and Wine in small quantity dispersed [368] in the Fields and Woods, before men knew their vertue, or made use of them for their nourishment, or planted them apart in Fields, and Vineyards; in which time they fed on Akorns, and drank Water:[c] so also there have been divers true, generall, and profitable Speculations from the beginning; as being the naturall plants of humane Reason: But they were at first but few in number; men lived upon grosse Experience; there was no Method; that is to say, no Sowing, nor Planting of Knowledge by it self, apart from the Weeds, and common Plants of Errour and Conjecture: And the cause of it being the want of leasure from procuring the necessities of life, and defending themselves against their neighbors, it was impossible, till the erecting of great Common-wealths, it should be otherwise. Leasure is the mother of Philosophy; and Common-wealth, the mother of Peace, and Leasure.Where first were great and flourishing Cities, there was first the study of Philosophy. The Gymnosophists[e] of India, the Magi of Persia, and the Priests of Chaldaea and Egypt, are counted the most ancient Philosophers; and those Countreys were the most ancient of Kingdomes. Philosophy was not yet risen to the Graecians, and other people of the West, whose Common-wealths (no greater perhaps then Lucca, or Geneva) had never Peace, but when their fears of one another were equall; nor the Leasure to observe any thing but one another. At length, when Warre had united many of these Graecian lesser Cities, into fewer, and greater; then began Seven men, of severall parts of Greece, to get the reputation of being Wise;[f] some of them for Morall and Politique Sentences; and others for the learning of the Chaldaeans and Egyptians, which was Astronomy, and Geometry.[g] But we hear not yet of any Schools of Philosophy.

The origin of philosophizing is almost as old as language itself. For among the most primitive men of the earliest times there were some who wondered at the works of God. Now, wonder stimulates the mind to search for the causes of the objects of wonder. But what nourished and increased philosophy most of all was leisure, which the Greeks call 'schola'.[d] The mother of leisure is peace, which is usually found only in great commonwealths. So the first professors of wisdom were the Gymnosophists[e] of India, the Magi of Persia, and the priests of the Chaldaeans and Egyptians. Philosophy had not yet arisen among the Greeks and peoples of the West. But when

Of the Schools of Philosophy amongst the Athenians.

After the Athenians by the overthrow of the Persian Armies,[h] had gotten the Dominion of the Sea; and thereby, of all the Islands, and Maritime Cities of the Archipelago, as well of Asia as Europe; and were grown wealthy; they that had no employment, neither at home, nor abroad, had little else to employ themselves in, but either (as St. Luke says, Acts 17. 21.) in telling and hearing news, or in discoursing of Philosophy publiquely to the youth of the City. Every Master took some place for that purpose. Plato in certain publique Walks called Academia, from one Academus: Aristotle in the Walk of the Temple of Pan, called Lycaeum:[i] others in the Stoa, or covered Walk, wherein the Merchants Goods were brought to land: others in other places; where they spent the time of their Leasure, in teaching or in disputing of their Opinions: and some in any place, where they could get the youth of the City together to hear them talk. And this was it which Carneades also did at Rome, when he was Ambassadour: which caused Cato to advise the Senate to dispatch him quickly, for feare of corrupting the manners of the young men that delighted to hear him speak (as they thought) fine things.[j]

From this it was, that the place where any of them taught, and disputed, was called Schola, which in their Tongue signifieth Leasure;[k] and their Disputations, Diatribae, that is to say, Passing of the [369] time.[l] Also the Philosophers themselves had the name of their Sects, some of them from these their Schools: For they that followed Plato's Doctrine, were called Academiques; The followers of Aristotle, Peripatetiques, from the Walk hee taught in; and those that Zeno taught, Stoiques, from the Stoa: as if we should denominate men from More-fields, from Pauls-Church, and from the Exchange, because they meet there often, to prate and loyter.[m]

Neverthelesse, men were so much taken with this custome, that in time it spread it selfe over all Europe, and the best part of Afrique; so as there were Schools publiquely erected, and maintained for Lectures, and Disputations, almost in every Common-wealth.

the Athenian republic began to flourish, after the defeat of the Persians,[h] then for the first time those people who had nothing else to do, either inside the home or outside it, began to meet in public places in order to converse, and, as St Luke says (Acts 17: 21), spent their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or to hear some new thing [Beza; AV]. So those who thought that they had become proficient in philosophy began to teach others, Plato in the Academy, Aristotle in the Lyceum,[i] and others in the Stoa; which places were called 'scholae',[k] and their disputations were called 'diatribae'.[l] And their followers themselves were distinguished by names of their own: for those who followed Plato were called 'Academics', those who followed Aristotle, 'Peripatetics', and those who followed Zeno, 'Stoics'. These distinctions, together with the differences in their doctrines, lasted until the time of our Saviour, and, being known almost throughout Europe and Asia, distinguished the philosophers of those times too from one another.

In 155 BC the sceptical philosopher Carneades (c.214–128 BC) visited Rome as an Athenian ambassador; the orations he gave, praising Roman justice with convincing eloquence one day and criticizing it with equally convincing eloquence the next, led the statesman Cato the Elder (234–149 BC) to demand his removal.

Of the Schools of the Jews.

There were also Schools, anciently, both before, and after the time of our Saviour, amongst the Iews: but they were Schools of their Law. For though they were called Synagogues, that is to say, Congregations of the People; yet in as much as the Law was every Sabbath day read, expounded, and disputed in them, they differed not in nature, but in name onely from Publique Schools; and were not onely in Jerusalem, but in every City of the Gentiles, where the Jews inhabited. There was such a Schoole at Damascus, whereinto Paul entred, to persecute.[n] There were others at Antioch, Iconium and Thessalonica, whereinto he entred, to dispute:[o] And such was the Synagogue of the Libertines, Cyrenians, Alexandrians, Cilicians, and those of Asia;[p] that is to say, the Schoole of Libertines, and of Iewes, that were strangers in Ierusalem: And of this Schoole they were that disputed (Act. 6. 9.) with Saint Steven.

The Schoole of the Graecians unprofitable.

But what has been the Utility of those Schools? what Science is there at this day acquired by their Readings and Disputings? That wee have of Geometry, which is the Mother of all Naturall Science, wee are not indebted for it to the Schools. Plato that was the best Philosopher of the Greeks, forbad entrance into his Schoole, to all that were not already in some measure Geometricians.[q] There were many that studied that Science to the great advantage of mankind: but there is no mention of their Schools; nor was there any Sect of Geometricians; nor did they then passe under the name of Philosophers. The naturall Philosophy of those Schools, was rather a Dream than Science, and set forth in senselesse and insignificant Language; which cannot be avoided by those that will teach Philosophy, without having first attained great knowledge in Geometry: For Nature worketh by Motion; the Wayes, and Degrees whereof cannot be known, without the knowledge of the Proportions and Properties of Lines, and Figures. Their Morall Philosophy is but a description of their own Passions. For the rule of Manners, without Civill Government, is the Law of Nature; and in it, the Law Civill; that determineth what is Honest, and Dishonest; what is Iust, and Vnjust; and generally

[p] This listing is given in Acts 6: 9, where the Greek borrows the Latin word 'libertini', meaning freed slaves.

[q] A tradition said that Plato had the words 'Let no one who is ignorant of geometry enter' inscribed over the entrance to his Academy; the tradition was first recorded in the writings of 6th-century commentators on Aristotle, such as John Philoponus (see Hayduck, ed., Commentaria, p. 118).

Etiam in Iudaea Scholae erant publicae, sed in Synagogis, ubi Leges Iudaeorum publicè explicatae & disputatae erant; ut Scholae Libertinorum, Cyrenaeorum, Alexandrinorum, & Cilicum.[P]

Quid autem humano generi scholae Graecorum profuere? Plato quidem ipse Philosophus & Geometra insignis erat; sed nulli id debuit Scholae. Commoda, quae à Physica & Geometria habemus hodie, Archimedi debemus, homini Scholae nullius. Schola Peripatetica quae [316] caeteras omnes sua loquacitate fecit conticescere, quid habet praeter Dialecticae & Rhetoricae argutias? Cujus Phenomeni naturalis causam (non omnibus obviam) reddidit intelligibilem? Sed, etsi inutiles Scholae innocuae tamen hactenus fuerunt; Philosophia (Sectis inter se usque ad pugnam dissentientibus) libera tamen hactenus erat; jurare in verba Aristotelis nemo cogebatur, quanquam illius dogmata latius recepta erant, quàm Sectarum reliquarum.

There were public schools in Judaea too, but in synagogues, where the laws of the Jews were publicly explained and discussed: such were the schools of the Libertines, the Cyrenians, the Alexandrians, and the Cilicians.[P]

But what was the benefit to the human race of the schools of the Greeks? Plato himself was indeed an outstanding philosopher and geometrician; but he owed that to no school. The advantages that we have nowadays from physics and geometry we owe to Archimedes, a man of no school. The Peripatetic school, which silenced all the rest by its loquacity – what does it have, apart from the subtleties of dialectic and rhetoric? Has it made intelligible any cause of a natural phenomenon that was not obvious to everyone? But, up to that time, although the schools were useless, they were nevertheless harmless; while the disagreements between the sects went so far as to bring them to blows, philosophy was nevertheless, up to that time, free. No one was compelled to swear by the words of Aristotle, although his dogmas were more widely accepted than those of the other sects.

Their Logique which should bee the Method of Reasoning, is nothing else but Captions[r] of Words, and Inventions how to puzzle such as should goe about to pose[s] them. To conclude, there is nothing so absurd, that the old Philosophers (as Cicero saith, who was one of them) have not some of them maintained.[t] And I beleeve that scarce any thing can be more absurdly said in naturall Philosophy, than that which now is called Aristotles Metaphysiques; nor more repugnant to Government, than much of that hee hath said in his Politiques; nor more ignorantly, than a great part of his Ethiques.

The Schools of the Jews unprofitable.

The Schoole of the Jews, was originally a Schoole of the Law of Moses; who commanded (Deut. 31. 10.)[u] that at the end of every seventh year, at the Feast of the Tabernacles, it should be read to all the people, that they might hear, and learn it: Therefore the reading of the Law (which was in use after the Captivity) every Sabbath day, ought to have had no other end, but the acquainting of the people with the Commandements which they were to obey, and to expound unto them the writings of the Prophets. But it is manifest, by the many reprehensions of them by our Saviour, that they corrupted the Text of the Law with their false Commentaries, and vain Traditions; and so little understood the Prophets, that they did neither acknowledge Christ, nor the works he did; of which the Prophets prophecyed. So that by their Lectures and Disputations in their Synagogues, they turned the Doctrine of their Law into a Phantasticall kind of Philosophy, concerning the incomprehensible nature of God, and of Spirits; which they compounded of the Vain Philosophy and Theology of the Graecians, mingled with their own fancies, drawn from the obscurer places of the Scripture, and which might most easily bee wrested to their purpose; and from the Fabulous Traditions of their Ancestors.

But among the Greeks their philosophy, especially the Aristotelian philosophy, was held in the highest esteem in the time of the primitive Church, when every day Greeks joined the Christian faith in large numbers. Among them there were also philosophers, but these embraced the faith in such a way that, as half-baked Christians, they did not abandon the dogmas of their own masters, retaining those which in some way or other they could reconcile with Christian doctrine. And this was the origin of sects (in Greek, 'heresies') in the Church of Christ – that is, they arose from disagreements among those newly converted pastors over the nature of Christ. The Apostles, by their miracles, had shown that he was God. Nevertheless, these people did not believe that that was true, because it did not seem possible to demonstrate it from the principles of their philosophy. So some, who followed a certain Valentinus, turned the whole story of the generating of Christ into an allegory; he was opposed by Irenaeus among the orthodox.[v] After him Apelles and others denied that Christ was truly a man, declaring that he was a phantasm without a body; Tertullian argued against them, using above all the argument that that which is incorporeal is nothing.[w] Others, who were called 'Anthropomorphites', attributed an organic body to God.[x] Others claimed that Christ was a part of God, not God in his entirety.[y] Meanwhile the bishops and presbyters examined these new doctrines in their synods; the ones they condemned, they called 'heresies', and the ones they confirmed, they called the Catholic faith. It was then that the distinction was first made between Catholics and heretics. Next arose the heresy of Arius, who denied that Christ was God; this was the reason why the Council of Nicaea was summoned.[z]

That synod condemned not only the Arian heresy, but also all the heresies of the past, from the birth of Christ onwards; in the creed called the 'Nicene' creed it briefly summarized the orthodox faith out of the Scriptures themselves, taking no account whatsoever of Greek philosophy. That is, it said that Christ is the true God, the begotten son of God, of the same substance with God;[aa] and this faith was confirmed by the three following general Councils, with the addition of a statement about faith in the Holy Spirit. They also condemned the heresy of the Africans which had arisen under Cyprian, concerning the re-baptism of those who had returned to heathenism, and they added to the creed the clause I believe in one baptism for the remission of sinners.[ab] And these things, accepted from the Holy Scriptures at the synod of Nicaea (with as yet no help from heathen philosophy), were resolved upon and confirmed. For at that time most of the Fathers were not philosophers.

[z] The Council of Nicaea (325) condemned the heresy of Arius (256–336).

[aa] Hobbes's Latin here slightly paraphrases the original, which is 'Deum verum de Deo vero, natum, non factum, unius substantiae cum Patre' ('true God of true God; born, not made; of one substance with the Father').

[ab] The Councils of Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), and Chalcedon (451). The first of these added to the Nicene Creed a passage about the Holy Spirit, and the clause quoted here (where 'credo' should be 'confitemur', 'we confess'). Cyprian of Carthage (d. 258) defended the re-baptism not of those who returned to heathenism but of those who had been baptized by heretical Christians.

Sed in Niceni Symboli expositionibus (nemo enim ferè Doctorum Ecclesiae, ab eo Concilio in quingentos annos erat, cujus Scripta extant, qui in Symbolum illud Expositionem aliquam non ediderit) non habita est de sententia Scripturarum tanta sollicitudo. Ubi enim in Scriptura Sacra, aut in ipso Symbolo Niceno invenitur, id quod in Symbolo dicitur Athanasii, ita Deum & Hominem esse Vnum Christum, quemadmodum Anima Rationalis & Caro est Vnus homo?[ac] Constitutio hominis ex Carne & Anima nunquam pro Mysterio habebatur; sed Christus in Carne Mysterium maximum est. Quod homo sit Anima sua, aut Corpus suum seorsim, nemo dicit; de Christo utrumque rectè dicitur quod est Homo, & quod est Deus. Ubi legitur in Scripturis hominem Christianum, nisi comparatione hac Incarnationis, cum Anima & Carne hominis contentus sit, damnandum esse? Vbi legitur in Scripturis Sacris, aut in Symbolo Niceno, tres esse Hypostases, id est, tres Substantias, id est, tres Deos, aut aliud quod tantundem valet? Si legatur, cur ea voce Ecclesia Latina recusavit uti? Cur excusat Graecos Augustinus, ab eo quod vocem commodiorem non habuere?[ad] Verum quidem est Vocabulum in lingua Graeca nullum esse quod respondeat Personae Vocabulo Latinorum.

But in expositions of the Nicene Creed (and in the five hundred years after the Council, almost every one of those Doctors whose writings survive produced some exposition of that creed) not so much tenderness was shown for the meaning of the Scriptures. For where in Holy Scripture, or in the Nicene Creed itself, do we find what is said in the creed which is called the 'Athanasian' creed, that God and Man are one Christ, in the same way that the rational soul and flesh are one man?[ac] It was never regarded as a mystery that man consists of flesh and soul; but Christ in the flesh is the greatest mystery. No one says that a man is his soul, or his body, separately; but each is correctly said of Christ, that he is man, and that he is God. Where in the Scriptures do we read that a Christian man must be damned if he does not accept this comparison of the incarnation to the soul and flesh of a man? Where in the Holy Scriptures, or in the Nicene Creed, do we read that there are three 'hypostases', that is, three substances, that is, three gods, or whatever else comes to the same thing? If we can read it there, why has the Latin Church refused to use that word? Why does Augustine excuse the Greeks, on the grounds that they did not have a more suitable word?[ad] It is indeed true that there is no word in the Greek language corresponding to the Latin [ac] This creed was traditionally assigned to Athanasius (c.295–373), but is now thought to be from the 5th century. (Hobbes's wording here suggests that he was aware of the argument, put most strongly by Gerardus Vossius, that this was a much later text, falsely attributed to Athanasius: see Vossius, Disputationes tres, pp. 37–55.) Hobbes's Latin preserves the meaning of the original, but changes word-order and gives 'quemadmodum' ('in the same way that') for 'sicut' ('just as').

[ad] Augustine discusses the problematic nature of the use of the Greek word in De trinitate, VII.4 and VII.6 (PL xlii, cols. 939–41, 943), not 'excusing' it quite as Hobbes says, but suggesting that it conformed to Greek customary usage.

Necesse tamen non erat, ut Vocabulo Hypostasis uterentur, cum necesse non esset ut mysterium explicaretur. Deinde, quod est in Symbolo Athanasii Filius est ex Patre solo, illud solo in Symbolo Niceno non est; & praeterea dicitur (Matth. 1, 20.) quod in Virgine Maria genitum est, ex Spiritu Sancto est. Sed dicet fortasse aliquis generationem aeternam differre à generatione illa, quae facta est in utero Virginis. Ubi autem Scriptura sacra, aut Synodus, ita distinguit? Nonne Deus erat Filius ex eo, quod Virgo illum ex Spiritu Sancto, id est, ex Deo conceperat? Imo Deus ab aeterno erat, etsi nondum Carnem induisset. Nam de eo quod ab aeterno decreverat, cui omnia sunt praesentia, loquitur Deus saepenumero tanquam de praesente. Verbum Dei, nempe Christus promissus, à principio, & ab aeterno erat; Verba tamen illa, quae faciunt actum promittendi [318] non erant Deus, nec Substantia, sed Vox. Per Filium Dei facta sunt secula, (Heb. 1, 2.) sed non per alium Deum ea fecit Deus. Per Verbum Dei facta sunt omnia, quae facta sunt;[ae] dixit enim Deus Fiat,[af] & factum est. Non tamen jubemur credere Verbum illud Fiat esse Substantiam divinam, & Dei Filium. Citant etiam Doctores pro generatione Filii aeternâ, verba Solomonis dicentis in persona sapientiae Prov.

word 'persona'. Yet there was no need for them to use the word 'hypostasis', since there was no need to explain the mystery. Then again, where the Athanasian Creed has The Son is of the Father alone, that 'alone' is not in the Nicene Creed; and besides, it is said (Matt. 1: 20) that what is conceived in the Virgin Mary is of the Holy Ghost. But perhaps someone will say that eternal generation is different from the generation which took place in the Virgin's womb. But where does Holy Scripture, or the synod, make such a distinction? Surely the Son was God for this reason, that the Virgin had conceived him by the Holy Spirit – that is, by God? Yes indeed, he was God from eternity, even though he had not yet put on flesh; for God, to whom all things are present, often speaks of what he has decreed from eternity as if it were present. The Word of God, that is, the promised Christ, was from the beginning and from eternity; but those words, which form the act of promising, were not God, nor a substance, but something spoken. The worlds were made by the Son of God (Heb. 1: 2); but God did not make them by means of another god. By the Word of God was everything made that was made;[ae] for God said, Let there be made,[af] and it was made. However, we are not commanded to believe that those words 'Let there be made' were a divine substance, and the Son of God. In support of the eternal generation of the Son, the Doctors also cite the words of Solomon, when he says in the person of Wisdom Temporibus subsequentibus Philosophiam Aristotelicam in Scriptis suis liberius aliquantò sequuti sunt; etiam eorum nonnulli Tractatibus Logicis, & Physicis in Aristotelis Sententiam editis, Aristotelismum ambitiosè ostentarunt. Daemonologiam autem, eandem ferè, quàm in Homero & Hesiodo legimus animis jamdiu infixam, plerique eorum tenuerunt, quibus doctrina Aristotelis de Formis separatis magis, quàm reliquarum sectarum Philosophia congruere videbatur.

(Prov. 3: 19), The Lord by wisdom hath founded the earth, by understanding hath he established the Heavens, claiming that the wisdom of God in that passage means the Son of God. If 'wisdom' is taken to mean the wise God himself, the argument works; but if 'wisdom' is taken (as is usually done) in contradistinction to the concrete term 'a wise person', it cannot mean the substance, nor, therefore, the Son of God – no more than 'a just person' can mean 'justice', or 'manliness' 'a man'. Also, Damascene correctly distinguishes between God and godhead when he says that it was indeed God, but not godhead, that became man.[ag] These things,[ah] and suchlike doctrines, are the opinions of individual people, not decrees of the Church; and therefore, even if they are not impious, they should nevertheless not bind consciences.

In subsequent times they followed Aristotle's philosophy in their writings with rather less restraint; also, some of them ambitiously showed off their Aristotelianism when they produced logical and physical treatises in accordance with the views of Aristotle. And the majority of them held almost the same demonology that we find, when we read Homer and Hesiod, to have been long since fixed in people's minds; and Aristotle's doctrine of 'separated forms' seemed to them more in keeping [with this] than the philosophy of the other sects.

[ag] John Damascene (d. 749); this summarizes a passage in his Exposition of the Orthodox Faith, III.11 (PG xciv, col. 1026): 'For God the Word became man. That godhead became man, however . . . is something we have in no way heard' (θεὸς γὰρ ὢν ὁ Λόγος, γέγονεν . . . ἄνθρωπος. Ὅτι δὲ ἡ θεότης ἄνθρωπος γέγονεν . . . οὐδαμῶς ἀκηκόαμεν). Hobbes's point rests on the distinction between God (the real being) and godhead or divinity (the abstract quality).

When the Roman Empire had, in the mean time, been torn apart, and had been completely eliminated in Italy, the care of the city of Rome – that is, the royal power of Rome – was put into the hands of the Bishop of Rome. The Papacy now seemed to be a thing worth fighting for. So it was fought for; and at the very same time as Charlemagne, King of France, defeated the Lombards, who were the enemies of the Romans, Leo III was driven out of Rome by a schism. However, Charlemagne brought Leo back, and confirmed him in the Papacy; and Leo made Charlemagne Emperor of the West, and publicly gave him an imperial crown in God's name[ai] – to the acclamation of the people, who cried 'God has given it'. Thence came the perpetual title of the kings of France, 'By God's grace King of France'; thence also came the dominion of popes over kings. In order to preserve this dominion of the Church, Leo, an old man skilled in wordly affairs, devised a noble problem: how to transfer to himself all Christian kingdoms by means of the weapons of the kings themselves. And he achieved it.

[ai] Accounts of Leo III's flight from Rome in 799, his restoration by Charlemagne in 800, and his crowning of Charlemagne as Emperor on Christmas Day of that year, were available in standard works such as Flacius et al., Ecclesiastica historia, v, cent. 8, col. 940, cent. 9, col. 289; de Serres, Generall Historie, pp. 60–61.

[aj] No such letter survives in the correspondence of Leo or Charlemagne. Possibly there is a confused reference here to the Council of Chalon-sur-Saône (813), which required the setting up of 'schools', in accordance with Charlemagne's orders.

[ak] The University of Paris developed only in the 12th–13th centuries, though on the basis of schools already there. These included the 'palatine school' which Charlemagne had encouraged at his palace; but its move to Paris took place long after his death. On that basis, some writers connected the origins of the University of Paris with Charlemagne: Baronius, after noting the decree about schools issued by the Council of Chalon-sur-Saône (see above, note aj), wrote that 'To these, some add the schools that then began to be set up in Paris' ('His addunt alij Parisijs tunc scholas erigi coeptas': Annales, ix, col. 633; for an example see Gaguin, De origine et gestis Francorum, bk IV, fo. 211r). Jean de Serres wrote that Charlemagne 'resided at Paris . . . where he had erected a goodly Vniuersity' (Generall Historie, p. 64). But the claim that he founded the University of Paris was decisively rejected by Étienne Pasquier (Recherches, pp. 798–802).

For after a year or two, Pope Leo wrote to Charlemagne and urged him to establish universities throughout his dominions, for the teaching of letters and of all knowledge.[aj] So he founded the first university in Paris;[ak] later, other kings founded other universities in their several dominions, with colleges built and organized for study, and with laws for their governance agreeable to the Roman pontiff. Then at last the masters Lombard, Scotus, and Thomas[al] gave birth to what is called scholastic theology, a mixture of Aristotle's philosophy and the Holy Scriptures. The logic, physics, metaphysics, ethics, and politics of Aristotle were taught in the universities as if the universe ['universitas'] of the sciences were contained in one man, Aristotle (at that time the greatest Father of the Church). In particular, in order to make bashful youth put on a bold face, young men were trained in public disputations and declamations, to enable them both to maintain and to preach the dogmas of the Roman Church. Thus, by the sermons and published writings of the ecclesiastics who were sent out of the universities to almost all the cities, towns, and parishes of the Christian world, it was indelibly fixed in the minds of all Christians that the only rule of just and unjust is the dictates of the Roman Church; kings should be obeyed no further than is permitted by the Roman Church; kings themselves should obey the Roman Pontiff like sheep. And what was to be done was done.[an]

Errors brought into Religion from Aristotles Metaphysiques.

Now to descend to the particular Tenets of Vain Philosophy, derived[ap] to the Universities, and thence into the Church, partly from Aristotle, partly from Blindnesse of understanding; I shall first consider their Principles. There is a certain Philosophia prima,[aq] on which all other Philosophy ought to depend; and consisteth principally, in right limiting of the significations of such Appellations, or Names, as are of all others the most Universall: Which Limitations serve to avoid ambiguity, and aequivocation in Reasoning; and are commonly called Definitions; such as are the Definitions of Body, Time, Place, Matter, Forme, Essence, Subject, Substance, Accident, Power, Act, Finite, Infinite, Quantity, Quality, Motion, Action, Passion, and divers others, necessary to the explaining of a mans Conceptions concerning the Nature and Generation of Bodies. The Explication (that is, the setling of the meaning) of which, and the like Terms, is commonly in the Schools called Metaphysiques; as being a part of the Philosophy of Aristotle, which hath that for title: but it is in another sense; for there it signifieth as much, as Books written, or placed after his naturall Philosophy: But the Schools take them for Books of supernaturall Philosophy: for the word Metaphysiques will bear both these senses.[ar] And indeed that which is there written, is for the most part so far from the possibility of being understood, and so repugnant to naturall Reason, that whosoever thinketh there is any thing to bee understood by it, must needs think it supernaturall.

Errors concerning Abstract Essences.

From these Metaphysiques, which are mingled with the Scripture to make Schoole Divinity, wee are told, there be in the world certain Essences separated from Bodies, which they call Abstract Essences, and Substantiall Formes: For the Interpreting of which Iargon, there is need of somewhat more than ordinary attention in this place. Also I ask pardon of those that are not used to this kind of Discourse, for applying my selfe to those that are. The World, (I mean not the Earth onely, that denominates the Lovers of it Worldly men, but the Vniverse, that is, the whole masse of all things that are) is Corporeall, that is to say, Body; and hath the dimensions of Magnitude, namely, Length, Bredth, and Depth: also every part of Body, is likewise Body, and hath the like dimensions; and consequently every part of the Universe, is Body; and that which is not Body, is no part of the Universe: And because the Universe is All, that which is no part of it, is Nothing; and consequently no where. Nor Locus in Vniversitatibus erat etiam studio Iuris Romani antiqui, & Medicinae; solae Scientiae Mathematicae, non quod Doctrinae Christianae contrarium aliquid continerent, sed propter Ignorantiae & artium inconciliabile dissidium praetermissae sunt. Nam & antea, ut quis ab honore Episcopatus arceretur, satis causae erat, didicisse artes Mathematicas, vel terram credere rotundam esse, aut esse terrae incolas quos Antipodas appellamus.[ao]

The study of ancient Roman law, and of medicine, also had a place in the universities. Only the mathematical sciences were passed over – not because they contained anything contrary to Christian doctrine, but because of the irreconcilable disagreement between ignorance and [these] arts. For even before that time, it was sufficient reason for keeping a man from the honour of a bishopric that he had learned the mathematical arts, or believed that the earth is round, or believed in the existence of those inhabitants of the Earth whom we call Antipodeans.[ao]

[ao] This may refer to the ruling of Pope Zachary in 748, which was that if it were established that Bishop Vergilius of Salzburg held that there were inhabited Antipodes, he should be deprived of his priestly office and expelled from the Church (see Jaffé, ed., Bibliotheca, iii, 'Monumenta moguntina', p. 191).

[ap] = conveyed, transmitted (OED, 'derive', v., 4). [aq] = 'first philosophy'.

[ar] The word μεταφυσικά emerged in Byzantine Greek (and 'metaphysica' in post-classical Latin) as the name of Aristotle's treatise; early writers explicated it as μετὰ τὰ φυσικά ('after the Physics'), but it acquired the meaning 'the science of things transcending physical nature'.

does it follow from hence, that Spirits are nothing: for they have dimensions, and are therefore really Bodies; though that name in common Speech be given to such Bodies onely, as are visible, or palpable; that is, that have some degree of Opacity: But for Spirits, they call them Incorporeall; which is a name of more honour, and may therefore with more piety bee attributed to God himselfe; in whom wee consider not what Attribute expresseth best his Nature, which is Incomprehensible; but what best expresseth our desire to honour Him. [372]

To know now upon what grounds they say there be Essences Abstract, or Substantiall Formes, wee are to consider what those words do properly signifie. The use of Words, is to register to our selves, and make manifest to others the Thoughts and Conceptions of our Minds. Of which Words, some are the names of the Things conceived; as the names of all sorts of Bodies, that work upon the Senses, and leave an Impression in the Imagination: Others are the names of the Imaginations themselves; that is to say, of those Ideas, or mentall Images we have of all things wee see, or remember: And others againe are names of Names; or of different sorts of Speech: As Vniversall, Plurall, Singular, are the names of Names; and Definition, Affirmation, Negation, True, False, Syllogisme, Interrogation, Promise, Covenant, are the names of certain Forms of Speech. Others serve to shew the Consequence, or Repugnance of one name to another; as when one saith, A Man is a Body, hee intendeth that the name of Body is necessarily consequent to the name of Man; as being but severall names of the same thing, Man; which Consequence is signified by coupling them together with the word Is. And as wee use the Verbe Is; so the Latines use their Verbe Est, and the Greeks their Ἐστι through all its Declinations. Whether all other Nations of the world have in their severall languages a word that answereth to it, or not, I cannot tell; but I am sure they have not need of it: For the placing of two names in order may serve to signifie their Consequence, if it were the custome, (for Custome is it, that gives words their force,) as well as the words Is, or Bee, or Are, and the like.

But how, and from what Aristotelian opinions, has the Roman doctrine been derived, or that scholastic theology which you criticize? I shall tell you. Whenever the Greeks, Latins, and most Europeans affirm something, they join together two names [or: nouns] by means of the verb 'is', meaning thereby that each name is a name of the same thing. Thus, someone who says 'man is an animal' wishes to be understood as if he had said that if we correctly call someone a 'man', we also correctly call that same person 'an animal'. Sometimes, too, that verb 'is' is applied to only one name: as when someone says 'God is.' In that case he wishes to be understood as if he had said, 'God is something real, not a figment of the mind; a hypostasis, not a phantasm' – for that is how the Greeks distinguish between real things and merely apparent ones. For example: they called a man who was looking at himself in a mirror a 'hypostasis', or substance; but they called the image of him which was seen in the mirror a 'phantasm'. This verb 'is', taken in the first way, that is, when it joins together two names, is called the 'copula'; taken in the second way, it is called the 'substantive verb'.[as] The Hebrews also used the substantive verb, and did so often, as when God simply says that his name is 'I am';[at] but they never used it as the copula. For instead of the copula, the Hebrews used the apposition of two names: as when it is said (Gen. 1: 2) that 'The earth a thing without form', which we have to translate as 'The earth was without form', etc.[au]

And if it were so, that there were a Language without any Verb answerable[av] to Est, or Is, or Bee; yet the men that used it would bee not a jot the lesse capable of Inferring, Concluding, and of all kind of Reasoning, than were the Greeks, and Latines. But what then would become of these Terms, of Entity, Essence, Essentiall, Essentiality, that are derived from it, and of many more that depend on these, applyed as most commonly they are? They are therefore no Names of Things; but Signes, by which wee make known, that wee conceive the Consequence of one name or Attribute to another: as when we say, a Man, is, a living Body, wee mean not that the Man is one thing, the Living Body another, and the Is, or Beeing a third: but that the Man, and the Living Body, is the same thing; because the Consequence, If hee bee a Man, hee is a living Body, is a true Consequence, signified by that word Is. Therefore, to bee a Body, to Walke, to bee Speaking, to Live, to See, and the like Infinitives; also Corporeity, Walking, Speaking, Life, Sight, and the like, that signifie just the same, are the names of Nothing; as I have elsewhere more amply expressed.[ay]

[aw] The idea that stars have souls that move them was attributed to Aristotle by Cicero (De natura deorum, II.xv.42), and has some basis in his writings: see On the Heavens, II.12, esp. 292a18–21. The idea of a separate (or separable) human soul was attributed to him by some writers on the basis of On the Soul, III.5 (430a17–26).

[ax] E.g., Luke 15: 13. [ay] Hobbes apparently refers to De corpore, III.3–4; much of that text was written before Leviathan, but it was not published until 1655. [az] Col. 2: 8.

Aristoteles, qui non tam ad res respexit quam ad voces, cum intelligeret (exempli causa) sub duobus nominibus Homo & Animal quae res intelligendae erant, non contentus eo, Homo diligens quaesivit ulterius, quaenam res concipienda erat sub Copula Est, vel saltem sub voce Infinitiva Esse; nec dubitavit, quin nomen illud Esse, alicujus Rei nomen fuerit; quasi esset in Natura rerum aliquid, cujus nomen esset Esse vel Essentia. When Aristotle, who regarded words more than things, understood (for example) what things should be understood as underlying the two names 'man' and 'animal', he was not content with that; being a diligent man, he inquired further what thing he should conceive as underlying the copula 'is', or at least the infinitive 'to be'. And he did not doubt that that name 'to be' was the name of some thing, as if there were in the natural world some thing whose name was 'to be' ['esse'] or 'essence'. From this absurdity he fell into another still worse, namely, that there are certain essences which are separated from their entities: these, he declared, stood beside the heavenly bodies and drove them round. He also said that the human soul, when separated from the man and in a different place from him, subsisted by itself;[aw] indeed, this doctrine may perhaps have agreed with Homeric theology, but it did not agree with Holy Scripture. For that word 'essence' is not found in the Scriptures, nor in the liturgy, articles, or canons of the Church of England. Nor is the Greek word οὐσία, except in the sense of riches,[ax] which the Latins also call 'res'; nor 'essential', 'essentiality', 'entity', 'entitative', nor anything that is made from the copula. For the Hebrew language did not allow it. So 'essence' is neither a created thing, nor an uncreated one, but a name invented for art's sake. It was Aristotle alone, entangled in words and terms, who gave birth to this sort of new, bogus, and empty 'entities', by means of a copulation of names; these were the first principles of that philosophy which St Paul calls a vain deceit.[az]

But to what purpose (may some man say) is such subtilty in a work of this nature, where I pretend to nothing but what is necessary to the doctrine of Government and Obedience? It is to this purpose, that men may no longer suffer themselves to be abused, [373] by them, that by this doctrine of Separated Essences, built on the Vain Philosophy of Aristotle, would fright them from Obeying the Laws of their Countrey, with empty names; as men fright Birds from the Corn with an empty doublet, a hat, and a crooked stick. For it is upon this ground, that when a Man is dead and buried, they say his Soule (that is his Life) can walk separated from his Body, and is seen by night amongst the graves. Upon the same ground they say, that the Figure, and Colour, and Tast of a peece of Bread, has a being, there, where they say there is no Bread: And upon the same ground they say, that Faith, and Wisdome, and other Vertues are sometimes powred into a man, sometimes blown into him from Heaven; as if the Vertuous, and their Vertues could be asunder; and a great many other things that serve to lessen the dependance of Subjects on the Soveraign Power of their Countrey. For who will endeavour to obey the Laws, if he expect Obedience to be Powred or Blown into him? Or who will not obey a Priest, that can make God, rather than his Soveraign; nay than God himselfe? Or who, that is in fear of Ghosts, will not bear great respect to those that can make the Holy Water, that drives them from him? And this shall suffice for an example of the Errors, which are brought into the Church, from the Entities, and Essences of Aristotle: which it may be he knew to be false Philosophy; but writ it as a thing consonant to, and corroborative of their Religion; and fearing the fate of Socrates.[bb]

Being once fallen into this Error of Separated Essences, they are thereby necessarily involved in many other absurdities that follow it. For seeing they will have these Forms to be reall, they are obliged to assign them some place. But because they hold them Incorporeall, without all dimension of Quantity, and all men know that Place is Dimension, and not to be filled, but by that which is Corporeall; they are driven to uphold their credit with a distinction, that they are not indeed any where Circumscriptivè, but Definitivè:[bc] Which Terms being meer Words, and in this occasion insignificant, passe[bd] onely in Latine, that the vanity of them may bee concealed. For the Circumscription of a thing, is nothing else but the Determination, or Defining of its Place;

Ab hac doctrina de Essentiis & Formis Substantialibus separatis Daemonologia Graecorum in Ecclesia (ut dixi) relicta est; & Superstitio illa, quam δεισιδαιμονίαν vocant Graeci, sive metum Phantasmatum.[ba] Inde Exorcismorum usus ortus est, & Signi Crucis, & Aquae Benedictae, quibus Excantarentur aut abigerentur: deinde nata est opinio de Substantiis Incorporeis, id est nullam habentibus omnino magnitudinem, & quod Deus ipse optimus maximus magnitudinem non haberet, quanquam neque Substantia Incorpo-

The demonology of the Greeks, arising from this doctrine of essences and separated substantial forms, remained (as I have said) in the Church; as did that superstition which the Greeks call δεισιδαιμονία, or the fear of phantasms.[ba] Thence arose the use of exorcisms, the sign of the cross, and holy water, to charm or chase them away. Then appeared the belief in incorporeal substances, that is, ones without any magnitude at all, and the belief that God himself (who is best and greatest) had no magnitude, although neither 'incorporeal substance' nor 'immaterial substance' is to and so both the Terms of the Distinction are the same. And in particular, of the Essence of a Man, which (they say) is his Soule, they affirm it, to be All of it in his little Finger, and All of it in every other Part (how small soever) of his Body; and yet no more Soule in the Whole Body, than in any one of those Parts.[be] Can any man think that God is served with such absurdities? And yet all this is necessary to beleeve, to those that will beleeve the Existence of an Incorporeall Soule, Separated from the Body.

This distinction was used by Aquinas, ST I, qu. 52, art. 2 (saying that an angel, unlike a body, is present in a definitive, not a circumscriptive, way), and was attacked by Charron, De la Sagesse, I.7. [bd] = circulate, are current (OED, 'pass', v., 44).

And when they come to give account, how an Incorporeall Substance can be capable of Pain, and be tormented in the fire of Hell, or Purgatory, they have nothing at all to answer, but that it cannot be known how fire can burn Soules.[bf] [374]

Again, whereas Motion is change of Place, and Incorporeall Substances are not capable of Place, they are troubled to make it seem possible, how a Soule can goe hence, without the Body to Heaven, Hell, or Purgatory; and how the Ghosts of men (and I may adde of their clothes which they appear in) can walk by night in Churches, Church-yards, and other places of Sepulture. To which I know not what they can answer, unlesse they will say, they walke, definitivè, not circumscriptivè, or spiritually, not temporally: for such egregious distinctions are equally applicable to any difficulty whatsoever.

As for their saying that the same body is in several places at the same time, and that several bodies are in the same place at the same time, this could not have been thought by Aristotle, or a philosopher, or any sane man. an acknowledgment of the Divine Power, to say, that which is, is not; or that which has been, has not been. And these are but a small part of the Incongruities they are forced to, from their disputing Philosophically, in stead of admiring, and adoring of the Divine and Incomprehensible Nature; whose Attributes cannot signifie what he is, but ought to signifie our desire to honour him, with the best Appellations we can think on. But they that venture to reason of his Nature, from these Attributes of Honour, losing their understanding in the very first attempt, fall from one Inconvenience into another, without end, and without number; in the same manner, as when a man ignorant of the Ceremonies of Court, comming into the presence of a greater Person than he is used to speak to, and stumbling at his entrance, to save himselfe from falling, lets slip his Cloake; to recover his Cloake, lets fall his Hat; and with one disorder after another, discovers his astonishment[bj] and rusticity.

Absurdities in naturall Philosophy, as Gravity the Cause of Heavinesse.

Then for Physiques, that is, the knowledge of the subordinate, and secundary causes of naturall events; they render none at all, but empty words. If you desire to know why some kind of bodies sink naturally downwards toward the Earth, and others goe naturally from it; The Schools will tell you out of Aristotle, that the bodies [375] that sink downwards, are Heavy; and that this Heavinesse is it that causes them to descend: But if you ask what they mean by Heavinesse, they will define it to bee an endeavour to goe to the center of the Earth:[bk] so that the cause why things sink downward, is an Endeavour to be below: which is as much as to say, that bodies descend, or ascend, because they doe. Or they will tell you the center of the Earth is the place of Rest, and Conservation for Heavy things; and therefore they endeavour to be there: As if Stones, and Metalls had a desire, or could discern the place they would bee at, as Man does; or loved Rest, as Man does not;[bl] or that a peece of Glasse were lesse safe in the Window, than falling into the Street.

Quantity put into Body already made.

If we would know why the same Body seems greater (without adding to it) one time, than another; they say, when it seems lesse, it is Condensed; when greater, Rarefied. What is that Condensed, and Rarefied? Condensed, is when there is in the very same Matter, lesse Quantity than before; and Rarefied, when more. As if there could be Matter, that had not some determined Quantity; when Quantity is nothing else but the Determination of Matter; that is to say of Body, by which we say one Body is greater, or lesser than another, by thus, or thus much. Or as if a Body were made without any Quantity at all, and that afterwards more, or lesse were put into it, according as it is intended the Body should be more, or lesse Dense.

Besides, what absurd causes have they assigned to things in physics: for example, that the cause of the descent of heavy things is heaviness, and that the cause of heaviness is that those things are seeking the centre of the Earth[bk] for the sake of preserving themselves. Will, the Cause of Willing.

For cause of the Will, to doe any particular action, which is called Volitio, they assign the Faculty, that is to say, the Capacity in generall, that men have, to will sometimes one thing, sometimes another, which is called Voluntas; making the Power the cause of the Act: As if one should assign for cause of the good or evill Acts of men, their Ability to doe them.

Ignorance an occult Cause.

And in many occasions they put for cause of Naturall events, their own Ignorance; but disguised in other words: As when they say, Fortune is the cause of things contingent; that is, of things whereof they know no cause: And as when they attribute many Effects to occult qualities; that is, qualities not known to them; and therefore also (as they thinke) to no Man else. And to Sympathy, Antipathy, Antiperistasis, Specificall Qualities,[bn] and other like Termes, which signifie neither the Agent that produceth them, nor the Operation by which they are produced. [bn] 'Sympathy' and 'antipathy' were terms applied to phenomena such as magnetic attraction and repulsion; 'antiperistasis' referred to the process in which an active principle was thought to be strengthened by an encounter with its opposite; 'specific(al) qualities' were qualities peculiar to the nature of a thing, by virtue of which it acted (e.g., heat and dryness were the specific qualities of fire).

[bo] Hobbes seems to allude here to the optical theories of Robert Grosseteste (*c.*1175–1253) and Roger Bacon (*c.*1214–92), according to which vision took place by both the intromission of species from the object to the eye, and the extramission of species from the eye to the object. Most subsequent scholastic thinking, however, followed Aquinas's view that visible species proceeded from the object to the eye.

They say that the soul is created by pouring it in [or: infusing it], and poured in by creation[bm] – although Scripture says that all things were created by the Word of God. They say that among causes they count occult qualities, namely sympathy, antipathy, and antiperistasis; 'specific qualities';[bn] also chance or fortune – that is, their own ignorance; for if ignorance is taken away, what is either 'fortune' or an 'occult quality'? They say that all sensation and all understanding takes place by means of a certain motion of species [or: appearances]. What is a species? As is known to anyone who knows Latin, a species is the form of a thing known by its appearance, consisting of shape and colour, such as the species of a man's face, which we call his 'countenance' or 'facial appearance'. So they say either that the species or countenances of things are sent into our eyes, and are thus seen, or that certain species or countenances of things are sent out to the object, and that the object is thus seen. For the scholastics have not yet agreed on whether vision takes place by the 'extramission' or 'intromission' of species.[bo] They also say that hearing, smelling, tasting, and understanding take place by means of species passing through the ears, nostrils, and organs of understanding. They say that eternity is not a succession of time without beginning or end, but a 'standing now' ['nunc stans'],[bp] that is, that our 'now' is the same as Ad-

If such Metaphysiques, and Physiques as this, be not Vain Philosophy, there was never any; nor needed St. Paul to give us warning to avoid it.[bq]

One makes the things incongruent, another the Incongruity.

And for their Morall, and Civill Philosophy, it hath the same, or greater absurdities. If a man doe an action of Injustice, that is to say, an action contrary to the Law, God they say is the prime cause of the Law, and also the prime cause of that, and all other Actions; but no cause at all of the Injustice; which is the Inconformity of the Action to the Law.[bs] This is Vain Philosophy. A man might as well say, that one man maketh both a streight line, and a crooked, and another maketh their Incongruity. And such is the Philosophy of all men that resolve of their Conclusions, before they know their Premises; pretending to comprehend, that which is Incomprehensible; and of Attributes of Honour to make Attributes of Nature; as this distinction was made to maintain the Doctrine of Free-Will, that is, of a Will of man, not subject to the Will of God.

Private Appetite the rule of Publique good:

Aristotle, and other Heathen Philosophers define Good, and Evill, by the Appetite of men;[bt] and well enough, as long as we consider them governed every one by his own Law: For in the condition of men that have no other Law but their own Appetites, there can be no generall Rule of Good, and Evill Actions. But in a Common-wealth this measure is false: Not the Appetite of Private men, but the Law, which is the Will and Appetite of the State is the measure. And yet is this Doctrine still practised; and men judge the Goodnesse, or Wickednesse of their own, and of other mens actions, and of the actions of the Common-wealth it selfe, by their own Passions; and no man calleth Good or Evill, but that which is so in his own eyes, without any regard at all to the Publique Laws; except onely Monks, and Friers, that are bound by Vow to that simple obedience to their Superiour, to which every Subject ought to think himself bound by the Law of Nature to the Civill Soveraign. And this private measure of Good, is a Doctrine, not onely Vain, but also Pernicious to the Publique State.

And that lawfull Marriage is Unchastity:

It is also Vain and false Philosophy, to say the work of Marriage is repugnant to Chastity, or Continence, and by consequence to make it Morall Vice; as they doe, that pretend Chastity, and Continence, for the ground of denying Marriage to the Clergy. For they confesse it is no more, but a Constitution[bu] of the Church, that requireth in those holy Orders that continually attend the Altar, and administration of the Eucharist, a continuall Abstinence from women, under the name of continuall Chastity, Continence, and Purity. Therefore am's 'now', that is, that there is no difference between 'now' and 'then'. These things, I say, should in my judgement be left aside, because they are not involved (so far as I know) in the doctrine of the Christian faith, but are expressions of opinion, merely in the realm of physics, uttered in order to make it seem that all wisdom issues from the mouths of priests.

They say that from the denial of free will it follows that God is the author of sin, and that therefore the sinner should not be punished, though they nevertheless admit that God is the first cause of things and actions; they try to obtain a reconciliation of these views from Aristotle, calling sin ἀνομία,[br] that is, the very absence of conformity with the law, a mere privation, not any deed or action at all.[bs] So while acknowledging that God is the cause of every deed, and the cause of the law, they deny that he is the cause of the lack of conformity between them, rather as if someone were to draw two lines, one straight and one curved, and say that he had made both the lines, but that someone else had made the lack of conformity between them. But what Aristotle meant by lack of conformity was the deed itself, or at least the intention or design, that lacked conformity to the law. Thus, when the Scholastics wished they call the lawfull use of Wives, want of Chastity, and Continence; and so make Marriage a Sin, or at least a thing so impure, and unclean, as to render a man unfit for the Altar. If the Law were made because the use of Wives is Incontinence, and contrary to Chastity, then all Marriage is vice: If because it is a thing too impure, and unclean for a man consecrated to God; much more should other naturall, necessary, and daily works which all men doe, [377] render men unworthy to bee Priests, because they are more unclean.

But the secret foundation of this prohibition of Marriage of Priests, is not likely to have been laid so slightly, as upon such errours in Morall Philosophy; nor yet upon the preference of single life, to the estate of Matrimony; which proceeded from the wisdome of St. Paul, who perceived how inconvenient a thing it was, for those that in those times of persecution were Preachers of the Gospel, and forced to fly from one countrey to another, to be clogged[bw] with the care of wife and children;[bx] but upon the designe of the Popes, and Priests of after times, to make themselves the Clergy, that is to say, sole Heirs of the Kingdome of God in this world; to which it was necessary to take from them the use of Marriage, because our Saviour saith, that at the coming of his Kingdome the Children of God shall neither Marry, nor bee given in Marriage, but shall bee as the Angels in heaven;[by] that is to say, Spirituall. Seeing then they had taken on them the name of Spirituall, to have allowed themselves (when there was no need) the propriety of Wives, had been an Incongruity.

to appear most subtle, they most clearly showed their stupidity. If they had been subtle, they would easily have found the difference between the cause of a deed and its author. The author of a deed is the one who orders that it be done; the cause is the one by whose physical power it is done. God orders no one to do, or try to do, anything against the laws; but all that we do, we do with the physical power given to us by God. Why then, [you ask,] if God is to be charged with the responsibility, are we condemned? You who ask this question, answer me this: why did God elect some, and reject others, from eternity, and how did he condemn to the greatest eternal punishments those who had not yet done or thought any evil, and who could not have done or thought any without God willing it and giving them the power to do so? Answer this too, whether it is not lawful for a potter to do whatever he wishes with a vase that he has made.[bv] Lastly, tell me where the Scriptures plainly say that all those who are excluded from the Kingdom of God will live, without dying a second death, to be tortured eternally.

[by] Matt. 22: 30.

And that all Government but Popular, is Tyranny:

From Aristotles Civill Philosophy, they have learned, to call all manner of Common-wealths but the Popular, (such as was at that time the state of Athens,) Tyranny.[ca] All Kings they called Tyrants; and the Aristocracy of the thirty Governours set up there by the Lacedemonians that subdued them, the thirty Tyrants:[cb] As also to call the condition of the people under the Democracy, Liberty. A Tyrant originally signified no more simply, but a Monarch: But when afterwards in most parts of Greece that kind of government was abolished, the name began to signifie, not onely the thing it did before, but with it, the hatred which the Popular States bare towards it: As also the name of King became odious after the deposing of the Kings in Rome,[cc] as being a thing naturall to all men, to conceive some great Fault to be signified in any Attribute, that is given in despight,[cd] and to a great Enemy. And when the same men shall be displeased with those that have the administration of the Democracy, or Aristocracy, they are not to seek for disgracefull names to expresse their anger in; but call readily the one Anarchy, and the other, Oligarchy, or the Tyranny of a Few. And that which offendeth the People, is no other thing, but that they are governed, not as every one of them would himselfe, but as the Publique Representant, be it one Man, or an Assembly of men thinks fit; that is, by an Arbitrary government: for which they give evill names to their Superiors; never knowing (till perhaps a little after a Civill warre) that without such Arbitrary government, such Warre must be perpetuall; and that it is Men, and Arms, not Words, and Promises, that make the Force and Power of the Laws.

Let us now come to ethics and politics. The Holy Scriptures teach that Christian subjects should obey their kings and sovereigns, and their ministers, even if they are heathen, not only for fear, but for conscience's sake, as they are ordained by God for our benefit.[bz] So, whence have arisen those civil wars about religion in Germany, France, and England, if not from the philosophy, ethics, and politics of Aristotle, and of those Romans who followed Aristotle? The measure of good and evil in every commonwealth is the law. But Aristotle has defined virtue and vice not on the basis of the laws, but on the basis of praise and censure among the citizens; he calls the rule of all kings 'tyranny';[ca] he says that liberty exists only in a democracy; and this is said both by him and by most Roman writers after him, who have transferred (because of their hatred of one king, Tarquin)[cc] the vice of a man to a form of government –

[bz] Rom. 13: 1–7. [ca] Cf. Aristotle, Nicomachaean Ethics, VIII.10 (1060a35–1060b12) (emphasizing, in fact, the difference between monarchy and tyranny).

[cb] The oligarchical government installed by the Spartans in Athens in 404–403 BC was known as 'the Thirty' (see, e.g., Xenophon, Hellenica, II.iii.2); 'the Thirty Tyrants' was a term used by later historians.

[cc] Lucius Tarquinius 'Superbus' (r. 535–510 BC), the last king of Rome, was driven from the city after his son had raped Lucretia (Livy, Ab urbe condita, I.46–60).

[cd] = ill-will, malice (OED, 'despite', n., 4).

That not Men, but Law governs.

And therefore this is another Errour of Aristotles Politiques, that in a wel ordered Common-wealth, not Men should govern, but the Laws.[ce] What man, that has his naturall Senses, though he can neither [378] write nor read, does not find himself governed by them he fears, and beleeves can kill or hurt him when he obeyeth not? or that beleeves the Law can hurt him; that is, Words, and Paper, without the Hands, and Swords of men? And this is of the number of pernicious Errors: for they induce men, as oft as they like not their Governours, to adhaere to those that call them Tyrants, and to think it lawfull to raise warre against them: And yet they are many times cherished[cf] from the Pulpit, by the Clergy.

Laws over the Conscience.

There is another Errour in their Civill Philosophy (which they never learned of Aristotle, nor Cicero, nor any other of the Heathen,) to extend the power of the Law, which is the Rule of Actions onely, to the very Thoughts, and Consciences of men, by Examination, and Inquisition of what they Hold, notwithstanding the Conformity of their Speech and Actions: By which, men are either punished for answering the truth of their thoughts, or constrained to answer an untruth for fear of punishment. It is true, that the Civill Magistrate, intending to employ a Minister in the charge[ch] of Teaching, may enquire of him, if hee bee content to Preach such, and such Doctrines; and in case of refusall, may deny him the employment: But to force him to accuse himselfe of Opinions, when his Actions are not by Law forbidden, is against the Law of Nature; and especially in them, who teach, that a man shall bee damned to Eternall and extream torments, if he die in a false opinion concerning an Article of the Christian Faith. For who is there, that knowing there is so great danger in an error, whom the naturall care of himself, compelleth not to hazard his Soule upon his own judgement, rather than that of any other man that is unconcerned in his damnation?

Private Interpretation of Law.

For a Private man, without the Authority of the Common-wealth, that is to say, without permission from the Representant thereof, to Interpret the Law by his own Spirit, is another Error in the Politiques; but not drawn from Aristotle, nor from any other of the Heathen Philosophers. For none of them deny, but that in the Power of making Laws, is comprehended also the Power of Explaining them when there is need. And are not the Scriptures, in all places where they are Law, made Law by the Authority of the Common-wealth, and consequently, a part of the Civill Law?

offering, indeed, no argument, but using an example which is no doubt welcome to citizens eager for novelty, but is nonetheless pernicious. When young men studied these authors in the universities for the sake of Greek and Latin philosophy and eloquence, they imbibed at the same time their poisonous doctrine, and each made up his mind about what is good, bad, just or unjust, about the laws, and about religion, as he pleased. This was the beginning of our trouble. For both the majority of preachers (who had an extremely high opinion of their own doctrine) and other people (from their reading of Greek and Latin politics) thought themselves great political experts; and because things were not going well for their ambition (in the Church, for some, and in the state, for others), they ignited a civil war – a war in which many thousands of citizens were killed, and the King was shamefully slaughtered.

Such is the profit of learning Greek and Latin eloquence and philosophy; and, if the people are not better taught by the preachers, and the preachers themselves are not better taught by our universities, perhaps 'a mighty Achilles will be sent to Troy once more.'[cg]

Of the same kind it is also, when any but the Soveraign restraineth in any man that power which the Common-wealth hath not restrained; as they do, that impropriate[ci] the Preaching of the Gospell to one certain Order of men, where the Laws have left it free. If the State give me leave to preach, or teach; that is, if it forbid me not, no man can forbid me. If I find my selfe amongst the Idolaters of America, shall I that am a Christian, though not in Orders, think it a sin to preach Jesus Christ, till I have received Orders from Rome? or when I have preached, shall not I answer their doubts, and expound the Scriptures to them; that is, shall I not Teach? But for this may some say, as also for administring to them [379] the Sacraments, the necessity shall be esteemed for a sufficient Mission; which is true: But this is true also, that for whatsoever, a dispensation is due for the necessity, for the same there needs no dispensation, when there is no Law that forbids it. Therefore to deny these Functions to those, to whom the Civill Soveraigne hath not denyed them, is a taking away of a lawfull Liberty, which is contrary to the Doctrine of Civill Government.

Language of Schoole-Divines.

More examples of Vain Philosophy, brought into Religion by the Doctors of Schoole-Divinity, might be produced; but other men may if they please observe them of themselves. I shall onely adde this, that the Writings of Schoole-Divines, are nothing else for the most part, but insignificant Traines of strange and barbarous words, or words otherwise used, then in the common use of the Latine tongue; such as would pose[cj] Cicero, and Varro,[ck] and all the Grammarians of ancient Rome. Which if any man would see proved, let him (as I have said once before)[cl] see whether he can translate any Schoole-Divine into any of the Modern tongues, as French, English, or any other copious language: for that which cannot in most of these be made Intelligible, is not Intelligible in the Latine. Which Insignificancy of language, though I cannot note it for false Philosophy; yet it hath a quality, not onely to hide the Truth, but also to make men think they have it, and desist from further search.

Errors from Tradition.

Lastly, for the Errors brought in from false, or uncertain History, what is all the Legend of fictitious Miracles, in the lives of the Saints; and all the Histories of Apparitions, and Ghosts, alledged[cm] by the Doctors of the Romane Church, to make good their Doctrines of Hell, and Purgatory, the power of Exorcisme, and other Doctrines which have no warrant, neither in Reason, nor Scripture; as also all those Traditions which they call the unwritten Word of God; but old Wives Fables? Whereof, though they find dispersed somewhat in the Writings of the ancient Fathers; yet those Fathers were men, that might too easily beleeve false reports; and the producing of their opinions for testimony of the truth of what they beleeved, hath no other force with them that (according to the Counsell of St. Iohn 1 Epist. chap. 4. verse 1.) examine Spirits, than in all things that concern the power of the Romane Church, (the abuse whereof either they suspected not, or had benefit by it,) to discredit their testimony, in respect of too rash beleef of reports; which the most sincere men, without great knowledge of naturall causes, (such as the Fathers were) are commonly the most subject to: For naturally, the best men are the least suspicious of fraudulent purposes. Gregory the Pope, and S. Bernard have somewhat of Apparitions of Ghosts, that said they were in Purgatory; and so has our Beda:[cn] but no where, I beleeve, but by report from others. But if they, or any other, relate any such stories of their own knowledge, they shall not thereby confirm the more such vain reports; but discover[co] their own Infirmity, or Fraud. [380]

Suppression of Reason.

With the Introduction of False, we may joyn also the suppression of True Philosophy, by such men, as neither by lawfull authority, nor sufficient study, are competent Judges of the truth. Our own Navigations make manifest, and all men learned in humane Sciences, now acknowledge there are Antipodes: And every day it appeareth more and more, that Years, and Dayes are determined by Motions of the Earth. Neverthelesse, men that have in their Writings but supposed such Doctrine, as an occasion to lay open the reasons for, and against it, have been punished for it by Authority Ecclesiasticall.[cp] But what reason is there for it? Is it because such opinions are contrary to true Religion? that cannot be, if they be true. Let therefore the truth be first examined by competent Judges, or confuted by them that pretend to know the contrary. Is it because they be contrary to the Religion established? Let them

Is it because they tend to disorder in Government, as countenancing Rebellion, or Sedition? then let them be silenced, and the Teachers punished by vertue of his Power to whom the care of the Publique quiet is committed; which is the Authority Civill. For whatsoever Power Ecclesiastiques take upon themselves (in any place where they are subject to the State) in their own Right, though they call it Gods Right, is but Usurpation.

CHAP. XLVII.

Of the BENEFIT that proceedeth from such Darknesse, and to whom it accreweth.

He that receiveth Benefit by a Fact, is presumed to be the Author.

Cicero maketh honorable mention of one of the Cassii, a severe Judge amongst the Romans, for a custome he had, in Criminall causes, (when the testimony of the witnesses was not sufficient,) to ask the Accusers, Cui bono;[b] that is to say, what Profit, Honor, or other Contentment, the accused obtained, or expected by the Fact.[c] For amongst Praesumptions,[d] there is none that so evidently declareth the Author, as doth the BENEFIT of the Action. By the same rule I intend in this place to examine, who they may be, that have possessed[e] the People so long in this part of Christendome, with these Doctrines, contrary to the Peaceable Societies of Mankind.

That the Church Militant is the Kingdome of God, was first taught by the Church of Rome.

And first, to this Error, that the present Church now Militant on Earth, is the Kingdome of God, (that is, the Kingdome of Glory, or the Land of Promise; not the Kingdome of Grace,[f] which is but a Promise of the Land,) are annexed these worldly Benefits; First, that the Pastors, and Teachers of the Church, are entitled thereby, as Gods Publique Ministers, to a Right of Governing the Church; and consequently (because the Church, and Common-wealth are the same Persons) to be Rectors, and Governours of the Common-wealth. By this title it is, that the Pope prevailed with the subjects of all Christian Princes, to beleeve, that to disobey him, was to disobey Christ himselfe; and in all differences between him and other Princes, (charmed with the word Power Spirituall,) to abandon their lawfull Soveraigns; which is in effect an universall Monarchy over all Christendome. For though they were first invested in the right of being Supreme Teachers of Christian Doctrine, by, and under Christian Emperors, within the limits of the Romane Empire (as is

CAPVT XLVII.

De Quibus quaestui fuerunt ante dictae Tenebrae.

De Praetore[a] quodam Romano Cassio, honorificè loquitur alicubi Marcus Cicero, quod in Criminibus cognoscendis, ubi Testimonium non erat satis plenum, Accusatorem interrogare solitus esset, Cui bono fecit Reus;[b] id est, quod lucrum, quam Potentiam, aut quam aliam rem cupitam, inde obtinuerit aut conservaverit aut expectaverit. Sentiebat enim homo prudens Malum gratis esse neminem, sed unumquemque facere, quae volens facit propter aliquod Bonum sibi. Nam inter Praesumpta nullum majus est, neque quod Authorem Criminis ita manifestè arguit, ut à Crimine Vtilitas. Itaque Authores doctrinarum quae Christianarum Civitatum tranquilitatem jam diu turbaverunt eodem illo Criterio, Cui bono, investigabimus.

On the Question: To whose Advantage was the aforementioned Darkness?

Marcus Cicero makes honourable mention somewhere of a certain Roman praetor,[a] Cassius, saying that when he heard criminal cases, when the testimony was not full enough, he used to ask the accuser: 'for what benefit did the accused act?'[b] – that is, what money, power, or other object of desire would he thereby have obtained, or retained, or expected? For that prudent man understood that no one is an ill-doer for nothing, but everyone who acts willingly acts for the sake of some good to himself. For among [legal] presumptions, none is greater than the benefit that flows from the crime, and none so clearly indicates the person responsible for the crime. So, using the same criterion, 'for what benefit?', we shall track down the authors of the doctrines which, for a long time now, have disturbed the tranquillity of Christian commonwealths.

acknowledged by themselves) by the title of Pontifex Maximus,[g] who was an Officer subject to the Civill State; yet after the Empire was divided, and dissolved, it was not hard to obtrude upon the people already subject to them, another Title, namely, the Right of St. Peter; not onely to save entire their pretended Power; but also to extend the same over the same Christian Provinces, though no more united in the Empire of Rome. This Benefit of an Universall Monarchy, (considering the desire of men to bear Rule) is a sufficient Presumption, that the Popes that pretended to it, and for a long time enjoyed it, were the Authors of the Doctrine, by which it was obtained; namely, that the Church now on Earth, is the Kingdome of Christ. For that granted, it must be understood, that Christ hath some Lieutenant amongst us, by whom we are to be told what are his Commandements. [382]

After that certain Churches had renounced this universall Power of the Pope, one would expect in reason, that the Civill Soveraigns in all those Churches, should have recovered so much of it, as (before they had unadvisedly let it goe) was their own Right, and in their own hands. And in England it was so in effect;[j] saving that they, by whom the Kings adminstred the Government of Religion, by maintaining their imployment to be in Gods Right, seemed to usurp, if not a Supremacy, yet an Independency on[k] the Civill Power: and they but seemed to usurpe it, in as much as they acknowledged a Right in the King, to deprive them of the Exercise of their Functions at his pleasure.

And maintained also by the Presbytery.

But in those places where the Presbytery took that Office, though many other Doctrines of the Church of Rome were forbidden to be taught; yet this Doctrine, that the Kingdome of Christ is already come, and that it began at the Resurrection of our Saviour, was still retained. But cui bono? What Profit did they expect from it? The same which the Popes expected: to have a Soveraign Power over the People. For what is it for men to excommunicate their lawful King, but to keep him from all places of Gods publique Service in his own Kingdom? and with force to resist him, when he with force endeavoureth to correct them? Or what is it, without Authority from the Civill Soveraign, to excommunicate any person, but to take from him his Lawfull Liberty, that is, to usurpe an unlawfull Power over their Brethren? The Authors therefore of this Darknesse in Religion, are the Romane, and the Presbyterian Clergy.

[i] The word 'potestatem' ('power') is implied by, or perhaps has gone missing from, the Latin.

[j] Elsewhere Hobbes uses 'in effect' in its modern sense ('so far as the consequence is concerned'); but here it may have the earlier sense of 'in fact', 'in reality' (OED, 'effect', n., phrases).

[k] 'on' here is not an error; 'independency' took 'on', by analogy with 'dependency on' (OED, 'independency', 1.b).

Post resurrectionem Servatoris nostri, cum jamjam ascensurus esset in coelum, rogaverunt illum Apostoli dicentes, Domine, num hoc tempore restitues regnum Israeli? Dixit autem ad illos, Non est vestrum nosse tempora, sive oportunitates quas Pater in sua ipsius Authoritate statuit.[h] Qui Regnum Dei restitutum dicunt, tunc cum Christus à mortuis resurrexit, Cui bono doctrinam hanc doctrinae illi adeo repugnantem, tum Ecclesia Romana, tum nonnulli alii vulgò docent? Regnum Dei institutum erat in Iudaeis à Deo ipso. In eo Potestatem in Terra summam habebat post Mosem Aaron, & post Aaronem caeteri Sacerdotes summi, suo quisque tempore. Iam quoniam regnum illud à Christo restituendum erat, sequebatur, ut in restituto Rex esset Christus. After the resurrection of our Saviour, when he was just about to ascend into Heaven, the Apostles asked him, 'Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power.'[h] For what benefit do the Roman Church, and some others, publicly teach a doctrine so repugnant to this doctrine, saying that the Kingdom of God was restored when Christ rose again from the dead? The Kingdom of God was founded among the Jews by God himself. Sovereign power over it was held on earth by Aaron after Moses, and after Aaron by the other high priests, each in his own time. Then it followed, because that kingdom was to be restored by Christ, that when it was restored, its king would be Christ. So it followed that, when Christ ascended into Heaven, he left the administration on earth of his kingdom to someone, either a man or an assembly. It was therefore evident that whoever obtained this administration was to have the same power[i] that the high priests, Aaron and his successors, had had over the people of Israel, that is, royal and sovereign power. And this is the benefit for which that doctrine of the Roman Church was invented; and no benefit on earth is said to be greater than this one. Therefore the first people to infuse this shadowy doctrine into the Church were the Roman pontiffs, so that by its means Christian citizens could be taught, whenever disagreement arose between kings and the Pope, to obey the Pope and ignore the commands of their own kings.

Infallibility. To this head, I referre also all those Doctrines, that serve them to keep the possession of this spirituall Soveraignty after it is gotten. As first, that the Pope in his publique capacity cannot erre. For who is there, that beleeving this to be true, will not readily obey him in whatsoever he commands?

Subjection of Bishops. Secondly, that all other Bishops, in what Common-wealth soever, have not their Right, neither immediately from God, nor mediately from their Civill Soveraigns, but from the Pope, is a Doctrine, by which there comes to be in every Christian Common-wealth many potent men, (for so are Bishops,) that have their dependance on the Pope, and owe obedience to him, though he be a forraign Prince; by which means he is able, (as he hath done many times) to raise a Civill War against the State that submits not it self to be governed according to his pleasure and Interest.

Exemptions of the Clergy. Thirdly, the exemption of these, and of all other Priests, and of all Monkes, and Fryers, from the Power of the Civill Laws. For by this means, there is a great part of every Common-wealth, that enjoy the benefit of the Laws, and are protected by the Power of the Civill State, which neverthelesse pay no part of the Publique expence; nor are lyable to the penalties, as other Subjects, due to their crimes; and consequently, stand not in fear of any man, but the Pope; and adhere to him onely, to uphold his universall Monarchy.

The names of Sacerdotes, and Sacrifices. Fourthly, the giving to their Priests (which is no more in the New Testament but Presbyters, that is, Elders) the name of Sacerdotes, [383] that is, Sacrificers,[n] which was the title of the Civill Soveraign, and his publique Ministers, amongst the Jews, whilest God was their King. Also, the making the Lords Supper a Sacrifice, serveth to make the People beleeve the Pope hath the same power over all Christians, that Moses and Aaron had over the Jews; that is to say, all Power, both Civill and Ecclesiasticall, as the High Priest then had.

[l] The Latin, defective in 68 and 70, is emended here, to make 'clergy, monks, and friars' the subject of the clause; alternatively, it is possible that a noun such as 'crimina' ('the crimes') has gone missing (in which case the translation would be: 'That the crimes of clergy, monks, and friars'), though no such word appears in the corresponding sentence of Hobbes's English. That the same people teach that the Pope cannot err in defining articles of faith aims at the same benefit.

That only the Bishop of Rome should exercise his power by immediate divine right, and others by a right derived from him, aims at the same benefit. That clergy, monks, and friars[l] should be exempted everywhere from the punishments of the civil laws aims at the same benefit too.

On the basis of the same doctrine, namely, that they are priests by the same right as Aaron, they demand tithes in Christian commonwealths for themselves and their own Levites,[m] by divine right.

The Sacramentation[o] of Marriage.

Fiftly, the teaching that Matrimony is a Sacrament, giveth to the Clergy the Judging of the lawfulnesse of Marriages; and thereby, of what Children are Legitimate; and consequently, of the Right of Succession to haereditary Kingdomes.

The single life of Priests.

Sixtly, the Deniall of Marriage to Priests, serveth to assure this Power of the Pope over Kings. For if a King be a Priest, he cannot Marry, and transmit his Kingdome to his Posterity; If he be not a Priest, then the Pope pretendeth this Authority Ecclesiasticall over him, and over his people.

Auricular Confession.

Seventhly, from Auricular Confession, they obtain, for the assurance of their Power, better intelligence of the designs of Princes, and great persons in the Civill State, than these can have of the designs of the State Ecclesiasticall.

Canonization of Saints, and declaring of Martyrs.

Eighthly, by the Canonization of Saints, and declaring who are Martyrs, they assure their Power, in that they induce simple men into an obstinacy against the Laws and Commands of their Civill Soveraigns even to death, if by the Popes excommunication, they be declared Heretiques or Enemies to the Church; that is, (as they interpret it,) to the Pope.

Transubstantiation, Penance, Absolution.

Ninthly, they assure the same, by the Power they ascribe to every Priest, of making Christ; and by the Power of ordaining Penance; and of Remitting, and Retaining of sins.

Purgatory, Indulgences, Externall works.

Tenthly, by the Doctrine of Purgatory, of Justification by externall works, and of Indulgences, the Clergy is enriched.

Daemonology and Exorcism.

Eleventhly, by their Daemonology, and the use of Exorcisme, and other things appertaining thereto, they keep (or thinke they keep) the People more in awe of their Power.

School-Divinity.

Lastly, the Metaphysiques, Ethiques, and Politiques of Aristotle, the frivolous Distinctions, barbarous Terms, and obscure Language of the Schoolmen, taught in the Universities, (which have been all erected and regulated by the Popes Authority,) serve them to keep these Errors from being detected, and to make men mistake the Ignis fatuus[p] of Vain Philosophy, for the Light of the Gospell.

Their saying that marriage is a sacrament aims at making them the judges when lawful marriage is in question, and consequently of the hereditary succession to kingdoms.

Auricular confession makes it possible for them to spy out the designs of kings and magnates; and sometimes they do spy them out.

By canonizing those men whose outstanding services they have used for the increase or preservation of their own power, they embolden uneducated Christians against their kings – sometimes to the point of killing them.

By means of the doctrine of Purgatory, and of justification by external works, and indulgences, the clergy – that is, the Roman Pontiff's subjects – are looked after materially, at the kings' expense.

By means of exorcisms and the rest of their demonology they terrify populations.

Lastly, by means of their human [sc. non-theological] doctrines, and the metaphysics, ethics, and politics of Aristotle, and by means of frivolous distinctions, obscure language, and barbarous terms, they make thicker the shadows which they had already introduced – so thick that they become noticeable to princes (when they wish to notice them). The Germans first noticed them, and then the English.[q]

The Authors of spirituall Darknesse, who they be.

To these, if they sufficed not, might be added other of their dark Doctrines, the profit whereof redoundeth manifestly, to the setting up of an unlawfull Power over the lawfull Soveraigns of Christian People; or for the sustaining of the same, when it is set up; or to the worldly Riches, Honour, and Authority of those that sustain it. And therefore by the aforesaid rule, of Cui bono, we may justly pronounce for the Authors of all this Spirituall Darknesse, the Pope, and Roman Clergy, and all those besides that endeavour to settle in the mindes of men this erroneous Doctrine, that the Church now on Earth, is that Kingdome of God mentioned in the Old and New Testament. [384]

But the Emperours, and other Christian Soveraigns, under whose Government these Errours, and the like encroachments of Ecclesiastiques upon their Office, at first crept in, to the disturbance of their possessions, and of the tranquillity of their Subjects, though they suffered the same for want of foresight of the Sequel, and of insight into the designs of their Teachers, may neverthelesse bee esteemed accessaries to their own, and the Publique damage: For without their Authority there could at first no seditious Doctrine have been publiquely preached. I say they might have hindred the same in the beginning: But when the people were once possessed by those spirituall men, there was no humane remedy to be applyed, that any man could invent: And for the remedies that God should provide, who never faileth in his good time to destroy all the Machinations of men against the Truth, wee are to attend his good pleasure, that suffereth many times the prosperity of his enemies, together with their ambition, to grow to such a height, as the violence thereof openeth the eyes, which the warinesse of their predecessours had before sealed up, and makes men by too much grasping let goe all, as Peters net was broken, by the struggling of too great a multitude of Fishes;[r] whereas the Impatience of those, that strive to resist such encroachment, before their Subjects eyes were opened, did but encrease the power they resisted. I doe not therefore blame the Emperour Frederick for holding the stirrop to our countryman Pope Adrian;[s] for such was the disposition of his subjects then, as if hee had not done it, hee was not likely to have succeeded in the Empire:

[r] Luke 5: 6.

[s] This episode was said to have taken place in 1155, at a meeting between Frederick I Barbarossa (1122–90) and Pope Adrian IV (Nicholas Breakspear) (r. 1154–9); its significance was emphasized by papalist writers (e.g., Baronius, Annales, xii, col. 487).

Postquam enim communiter creditum esset, eandem esse Potestatem Papae in populo Christiano, quam habuerunt Aaron & caeteri Sacerdotes Summi in populo Israelitico, Ambitio de Functionibus Ecclesiasticis (praecipuè de Papatu) obtinendis, & eorum qui obtinuerunt Fastus, eousque paulatim crevit, & conspicuus factus est, [325] ut omnem ferè sui reverentiam veram & Pastorali Functioni debitam perdiderint.

For after it became commonly believed that the Pope had the same power over a Christian people as Aaron and the other high priests had had over the people of Israel, the ambition to obtain ecclesiastical positions (especially the papacy), and the arrogance of those who did obtain them, gradually grew to such an extent, and became so obvious, that they lost almost all the true reverence that was due to them and their pastoral office.

But I blame those, that in the beginning, when their power was entire, by suffering such Doctrines to be forged in the Universities of their own Dominions, have holden the Stirrop to all the succeeding Popes, whilest they mounted into the Thrones of all Christian Soveraigns, to ride, and tire, both them, and their people, at their pleasure.

But as the Inventions of men are woven, so also are they ravelled out; the way is the same, but the order is inverted: The web begins at the first Elements of Power, which are Wisdom, Humility, Sincerity,[t] and other vertues of the Apostles, whom the people converted, obeyed, out of Reverence, not by Obligation: Their Consciences were free, and their Words and Actions subject to none but the Civill Power. Afterwards the Presbyters (as the Flocks of Christ encreased) assembling to consider what they should teach, and thereby obliging themselves to teach nothing against the Decrees of their Assemblies, made it to be thought the people were thereby obliged to follow their Doctrine, and when they refused, refused to keep them company, (that was then called Excommunication,) not as being Infidels, but as being disobedient: And this was the first knot upon their Liberty. And the number of Presbyters encreasing, the Presbyters of the chief City of a Province, got themselves an authority over the Parochiall Presbyters, and appropriated to themselves the names of Bishops: And this was a second knot on Christian Liberty. Lastly, [385] the Bishop of Rome, in regard of the Imperiall City, took upon him an Authority (partly by the wills of the Emperours themselves, and by the title of Pontifex Maximus, and at last when the Emperours were grown weak, by the priviledges of St. Peter) over all other Bishops of the Empire:[u] Which was the third and last knot, and the whole Synthesis and Construction of the Pontificiall Power.

And therefore the Analysis, or Resolution[v] is by the same way; but begin-neth with the knot that was last tyed; as wee may see in the dissolution of the praeterpoliticall[w] Church Government in England. First, the Power of the Popes was dissolved totally by Queen Elizabeth;[x] and the Bishops, who before exercised their Functions in Right of the Pope, did afterwards exercise

Comparison of the Papacy with the Kingdome of Fayries.

But after this Doctrine, that the Church now Militant, is the Kingdome of God spoken of in the Old and New Testament, was received in the World; the ambition, and canvasing for the Offices that belong thereunto, and especially for that great Office of being [386] Christs Lieutenant, and the Pompe of them that obtained therein the principall Publique Charges,[ah] became by degrees so evident, that they lost the inward Reverence due to the Pastorall Function: in so much as the Wisest men, of them that had any power in the Civill State, needed nothing but the authority of their Princes, to deny them any further Obedience. For, from the time that the Bishop of Rome had gotten to be acknowledged for Bishop Universall, by pretence of Succession to St. Peter, their whole Hierarchy, or Kingdome of Darknesse, may be compared not unfitly to the Kingdome of Fairies; that is, to the old wives Fables in England, concerning Ghosts and Spirits, and the feats[aj] they play in the night. And if a man consider the originall of this great Ecclesiasticall Dominion, he will easily perceive, that the Papacy, is no other, than the Ghost of the deceased Romane Empire, sitting crowned upon the grave thereof: For so did the Papacy start up on a Sudden out of the Ruines of that Heathen Power.

The Language also, which they use, both in the Churches, and in their Publique Acts, being Latine, which is not commonly used by any Nation now in the world, what is it but the Ghost of the Old Romane Language?

The Fairies in what Nation soever they converse,[ak] have but one Universall King, which some Poets of ours call King Oberon;[am] but the Scripture calls Beelzebub, Prince of Daemons.[an] The Ecclesiastiques likewise, in whose Dominions soever they be found, acknowledge but one Universall King, the Pope.

[am] References to Oberon as king of the fairies, arising originally from the story of Huon of Bordeaux (see above, note al), were made by Edmund Spenser (The Faerie Queen), William Shakespeare (A Midsummer Night's Dream), Ben Jonson (The Mad-Merry Prankes of Robbin Good-Fellow), Thomas Randolph (Amyntas), and others.

Cogitantibus enim Dominii tanti Ecclesiastici originem, quid aliud videri potuit Papatus nisi Imperii illius Romani ingentis, ingens spectrum, Sepulchro Imperii defuncti coronatum insidens?

For, from the time when the Bishop of Rome was regarded as the universal bishop, it became possible to compare the Roman hierarchy, not inappositely, to the popular sayings which circulated in England among old wives, children, and the simpler sort of men of the common people, about ghosts [or fairies],[ai] that is, shades or spectres, and their nocturnal misdeeds.

For, to those who thought about the origin of such great ecclesiastical dominion, what else could the Papacy seem to be, if not the huge spectre of that huge Roman Empire, sitting crowned on the dead empire's grave?

And the language which they used in public divine worship, which was not the language of any nation at that time, what was that, if not the ghost of the old Latin language?

The fairies are said to have had, in all nations, a single universal king, to whom they gave (from the fictitious history of the deeds of Huon of Bordeaux)[al] the name of Oberon.[am] The ecclesiastics too, whichever commonwealth they are citizens of, acknowledge one universal king, the Roman Pope.

The Ecclesiastiques are Spirituall men, and Ghostly[ao] Fathers. The Fairies are Spirits, and Ghosts. Fairies and Ghosts inhabite Darknesse, Solitudes, and Graves. The Ecclesiastiques walke in Obscurity of Doctrine, in Monasteries, Churches, and Church-yards.

The Ecclesiastiques have their Cathedrall Churches; which, in what Towne soever they be erected, by vertue of Holy Water, and certain Charmes called Exorcismes, have the power to make those Townes, Cities, that is to say, Seats of Empire. The Fairies also have their enchanted Castles, and certain Gigantique Ghosts, that domineer over the Regions round about them.

The Fairies are not to be seized on; and brought to answer for the hurt they do. So also the Ecclesiastiques vanish away from the Tribunals of Civill Justice.

The Ecclesiastiques take from young men, the use of Reason, by certain Charms compounded of Metaphysiques, and Miracles, and Traditions, and Abused Scripture, whereby they are good for nothing else, but to execute what they command them. The Fairies likewise are said to take young Children out of their Cradles, and to change them into Naturall Fools, which Common people do therefore call Elves, and are apt to mischief.

[ao] 'Ghostly' means spiritual (in the sense of religious or ecclesiastical, as opposed to 'lay') (OED, 'ghostly', a., 3); but Hobbes plays here also on the literal sense of 'ghost'.

Lemures Spiritus sunt; Ecclesiastici etiam appellant sese Spirituales. Lemures, Tenebras, Solitudines, Sepulchreta incolunt. Similiter Ecclesiastici, in Obscuritate Doctrinarum, in Monasteriis, Ecclesiis, & Coemiteriis ambulabant.

Ecclesiastici virtute Aquae Benedictae in quocunque loco posuissent Ecclesias suas, locum illum fecerunt ut esset Vrbs, id est, Imperii Sedes. Ita quoque in fabula est habuisse Lemures Castella sua quaedam Incantata, & Spiritus quosdam Gigantaeos qui in Regionibus circumvicinis dominabantur.

Lemures, si quid mali fecissent, comprehendi & sisti ad Tribunalia Civilia non potuerunt. Ita etiam Ecclesiastici criminum Rei à Tribunalibus Civilibus sublati evanescebant.

Ecclesiastici per Incantationes quasdam, ex Metaphysicis & Miraculis confectas, usum Rationis naturalis Adolescentibus adimere consueverunt, eo fine, ut jussis suis coeci obtemperarent. Ita etiam dicuntur in Fabula Lemures, Pueris ex cunabulis sublatis, alios illorum vice supponere, Fatuos quidem, sed promptos ad nequitiam.

12 sublati] exempti 70

The fairies are spirits; the ecclesiastics too call themselves spiritual people. Ghosts or fairies inhabit shadows, solitary places, and graveyards. Similarly, the ecclesiastics walked around in obscurity of doctrine, and in monasteries, churches, and cemeteries.

Wherever they placed their churches, the ecclesiastics, by virtue of holy water, made those places cities, that is, seats of empire. So too the popular sayings have it that the fairies had certain enchanted castles of their own, and certain gigantic spirits, who domineered over the surrounding regions.

If the fairies did something bad, they could not be seized and brought before civil courts. So too the ecclesiastics, when charged with crimes, were taken away [70: released] from civil courts and vanished.

Using certain charms compounded of metaphysics and miracles, the ecclesiastics used to take away the use of natural reason from young men, so that they would blindly obey their commands. So too, according to the popular sayings, the fairies remove boys from their cradles and put others in their place – half-witted, but apt to do mischief.

In what Shop, or Operatory[ap] the Fairies make their Enchantment, the old Wives have not determined. But the Operatories of the Clergy, are well enough known to be the Universities, that received their Discipline from Authority Pontificiall. [387]

When the Fairies are displeased with any body, they are said to send their Elves, to pinch them. The Ecclesiastiques, when they are displeased with any Civill State, make also their Elves, that is, Superstitious, Enchanted Subjects, to pinch their Princes, by preaching Sedition; or one Prince enchanted with promises, to pinch another.

The Fairies marry not; but there be amongst them Incubi,[aq] that have copulation with flesh and bloud. The Priests also marry not.

The Ecclesiastiques take the Cream of the Land, by Donations of ignorant men, that stand in aw of them, and by Tythes: So also it is in the Fable of Fairies, that they enter into the Dairies, and Feast upon the Cream, which they skim from the Milk.

What kind of Money is currant in the Kingdome of Fairies, is not recorded in the Story. But the Ecclesiastiques in their Receipts[ar] accept of the same Money that we doe; though when they are to make any Payment, it is in Canonizations, Indulgences, and Masses.

To this, and such like resemblances between the Papacy, and the Kingdome of Fairies, may be added this, that as the Fairies have no existence, but in the Fancies of ignorant people, rising from the Traditions of old Wives, or old Poets: so the Spirituall Power of the Pope (without the bounds of his own Civill Dominion) consisteth onely in the Fear that Seduced people stand in, of their Excommunications; upon hearing of false Miracles, false Traditions, and false Interpretations of the Scripture.

[ap] = workshop, laboratory (OED, 'operatory', n.[1], 1).

In qua Officina sive Operatorio Incantamenta sua conficiunt Lemures non est dictum in Fabula. Ecclesiasticis autem Operatoria fuerunt, quas ipsi sua Authoritate sibi erexerunt Universitates.

Lemures quoties alicui irascerentur, mittere dicebantur ex suo numero aliquem qui illum suggillaret. Ecclesiastici item si Civitati vel [326] Regi alicui succenseant, subditos suos Superstitiosos, & Incantatos immittebant qui Seditione illum suggillarent, etiam aliquando Principes faciebant ut alter suggillaret alterum.

Neque Lemures neque Clerici uxores ducunt.

Ecclesiastici de Decimis, & Imperitorum hominum quibus terrori sunt Donationibus Cremorem terrae accipiunt; quemadmodum in fabula dicuntur Lemures Cremorem Lactis ligurire.

In Regno Lemurum, qualis sit Moneta, non reperitur in Historia; Ecclesiasticorum autem Moneta quam accipiunt, eadem quidem est cum Moneta Laicorum; sed quam solvunt, Canonizationes, Indulgentiae, & Missae sunt.

Lemures, praeterquam in metu, & Phantasia hominum Imperitorum existentiam nullam habent. Sic quoque Potestas Papae Spiritualis, (extra suum ipsius Dominium Temporale) in solo metu consistit Excommunicationum.

6 succenseant] succenserent 70

The popular sayings do not tell us in what workshop or factory the fairies prepare their enchantments. But the ecclesiastics had factories, which they set up for themselves by their own authority: the universities.

Whenever the fairies became angry with anyone, they were said to send one of their number to give him a severe beating. Similarly, if the ecclesiastics were angry with any commonwealth or king, they sent their superstitious and enchanted subjects to beat that commonwealth or king severely with sedition; sometimes, too, they made princes give severe beatings to one another.

Neither the fairies nor the clergy take wives.

The ecclesiastics receive the cream of the land, by means of tithes, and donations from uneducated men who are terrified of them – in the same way that the fairies, according to the popular sayings, lick the cream from the milk.

What kind of money there is in the kingdom of the fairies, the story does not tell. When the ecclesiastics accept money, it is indeed the same as the money used by lay people; but the payments they make are canonizations, indulgences, and masses.

The fairies have no existence except in the fear and imagination of uneducated people. So too the spiritual power of the Pope (outside his own temporal dominion) consists merely in the fear of excommunications.

It was not therefore a very difficult matter, for Henry 8. by his Exorcisme; nor for Qu. Elizabeth by hers,[as] to cast them out. But who knows that this Spirit of Rome, now gone out, and walking by Missions through the dry places of China, Japan, and the Indies, that yeeld him little fruit, may not return, or rather an Assembly of Spirits worse than he, enter, and inhabite this clean swept house, and make the End thereof worse than the Beginning?[at] For it is not the Romane Clergy onely, that pretends the Kingdome of God to be of this World, and thereby to have a Power therein, distinct from that of the Civill State. And this is all I had a designe to say, concerning the Doctrine[au] of the POLITIQUES. Which when I have reviewed, I shall willingly expose it to the censure of my Countrey.

Therefore it was not difficult for Henry VIII and Queen Elizabeth to throw that power out of England.[as] But now that they have been thrown out, and, by means of papal missions, are walking through the dry places of China, India, and Japan, who knows whether those spirits will not return – or others, greater in number than them, and worse?[at] For the Romans are not the only ones who aspire to rule the Church, claiming a divine right.

Reviewing this treatise on civil and ecclesiastical power, which I have now brought to its conclusion, I have found in it nothing contrary to the sense of the Holy Scripture or to the civil or ecclesiastical laws of my country. And how could I have done so, when the sole purpose of the entire work was to demonstrate that there could be no pretext that could excuse the violation of the laws? But I confess that in many passages I have departed from the opinions of individual theologians.

If I had written for hearts that were pure (like writing-tablets wiped clean), I could have been more brief. The following few points would have sufficed. Without law, men kill one another in mutual slaughter, because of the right of all to all things. Laws without punishments, and punishments without a sovereign power, are of no benefit. Without arms and resources gathered in the hands of one person, power is a mere word, and can contribute nothing to peace or the defence of the citizens; therefore all citizens are obliged, so far as they are able, to protect and strengthen the commonwealth, using their own wealth, for their own benefit (not that of their rulers); and they should do so according to the judgement of him to whom they gave the sovereign power. That is a summary of the first and second parts. Next, in the third part, given that the eternal life and salvation of individual people is contained in the Holy Scriptures (which our Church has both allowed and recommended to be read by all), and that everyone reads them and interprets them for himself at the peril of his own soul, and that it is therefore fair that people's consciences should not be burdened by more articles of faith than are necessary for salvation, I explained what those articles might be. Finally, in the fourth part, so that the people would not be led astray by false teachers, I laid bare the ambitious and crafty designs of the enemies of the Church of England. These points, I say, would have sufficed for unsullied intellects. But since I knew that men's minds had for a long time been scribbled over with contrary doctrines, I thought it necessary to explain everything at greater length. I did explain (but in the English language) as best I could, at the time when the civil war, which had arisen in Scotland over ecclesiastical discipline, was being waged extremely fiercely in England too, and in Ireland – when, after not only bishops, but also the King, law, religion, and virtue had been taken away, treachery, massacres, and all the foulest crimes (though in disguise) held sway, to such a degree that anyone brought here from the remoter parts of the world who had witnessed the outrages perpetrated at that time would have been convinced that there was at that time absolutely no sense of divine justice here. Therefore this teaching of mine was of little use; of little use, I say, but of some use nevertheless. For I hoped that it would be of use later [70: of more use], after the war was over. The democrats were victorious, and established a democracy; but then they unexpectedly lost it, the reward of their so many crimes. One tyrant[av] took over England, Scotland, and Ireland, and confounded the democratic prudence of laity and ecclesiastics alike. The people, wearied by war, despised them no less than it had admired them before. When the lawful King was at last restored, they begged for pardon (that is, they acknowledged their foolishness). Pardon was given, and given as a general amnesty[aw] (so that they would not be distinguished from good people by their crimes). Who can believe that all those seditious principles have already been eliminated,[ax] or that there is anyone other than the democrats who would want a doctrine as conducive to peace as this one to be eliminated? To prevent that from happening, I wished it to be available in Latin. For I see that quarrels among men about opinions, and about whose intellect should prevail, cannot be taken away by force of arms. Evils of this sort must be extinguished in the same way that they arise. The minds of the citizens had been gradually infected by the writers of heathen politics and philosophy. That democratic ink must be wiped away by preaching, writing, and arguing. I do not understand how else this can be done, except by the universities. So let them make as much effort, henceforth, to support the claims of kingly power as they once made efforts on behalf of the power of the Pope. Meanwhile, let us all make an effort to prevent ourselves from being overwhelmed all together, thanks to our internal quarrels, by a foreign enemy.

A REVIEW, and CONCLUSION.

From the contrariety of some of the Naturall Faculties of the Mind, one to another, as also of one Passion to another, and from their reference[a] to Conversation,[b] there has been an argument taken, to inferre an impossibility that any one man should be sufficiently disposed to all sorts of Civill duty. The Severity of Judgment, they say, makes men Censorious, and unapt to pardon the Errours and Infirmities of other men: and on the other side, Celerity of Fancy, makes the thoughts lesse steddy than is necessary, to discern exactly between Right and Wrong. Again, in all Deliberations, and in all Pleadings, the faculty of solid Reasoning, is necessary: for without it, the Resolutions of men are rash, and their Sentences unjust: and yet if there be not powerfull Eloquence, which procureth attention and Consent, the effect of Reason will be little. But these are contrary Faculties; the former being grounded upon principles of Truth; the other upon Opinions already received, true, or false; and upon the Passions and Interests of men, which are different, and mutable.

And amongst the Passions, Courage, (by which I mean the Contempt of Wounds, and violent Death) enclineth men to private Revenges, and sometimes to endeavour the unsetling of the Publique Peace: and Timorousnesse, many times disposeth to the desertion of the Publique Defence. Both these they say cannot stand together in the same person.[c]

And to consider the contrariety of mens Opinions, and Manners in generall, It is they say, impossible to entertain a constant Civill Amity with all those, with whom the Businesse of the world constrains us to converse:[d] Which Businesse, consisteth almost in nothing else but a perpetuall contention for Honor, Riches, and Authority.

To which I answer, that these are indeed great difficulties, but not Impossibilities: For by Education, and Discipline, they may bee, and are sometimes reconciled. Judgment, and Fancy may have place in the same man; but by turnes; as the end which he aimeth at requireth. As the Israelites in Egypt, were sometimes fastened to their labour of making Bricks, and other times were ranging abroad to gather Straw:[e] So also may the Judgement sometimes be fixed upon one certain Consideration, and the Fancy at another time wandring about the world. So also Reason, and Eloquence, (though not perhaps in the Naturall Sciences, yet in the Morall) may stand very well together.[f] For wheresoever [390] there is place for adorning and preferring of Errour, there is much more place for adorning and preferring of Truth, if they have it to adorn. Nor is there any repugnancy between fearing the Laws, and not fearing a publique Enemy; nor between abstaining from Injury, and pardoning it in others. There is therefore no such Inconsistence of Humane Nature, with Civill Duties, as some think. I have known cleernesse of Judgment, and largenesse of Fancy; strength of Reason, and gracefull Elocution; a Courage for the Warre, and a Fear for the Laws, and all eminently in one man; and that was my most noble and honored friend Mr. Sidney Godolphin; who hating no man, nor hated of any, was unfortunately slain in the beginning of the late Civill warre, in the Publique quarrell, by an undiscerned, and an undiscerning hand.[g]

[b] = social behaviour (OED, 'conversation', 1–2, 4–6).

[c] 'They' are not easily identifiable, and the difficulty is increased by Hobbes's puzzling use of two direct opposites, courage and timorousness, in this paragraph (explicated, probably, by his phrase in the second paragraph after this: 'fearing the Laws, and not fearing a publique Enemy'); but one likely candidate is Juan Huarte, whose Examen argued that the same person could not be characterized by both imagination and judgement, or both courage and wisdom (pp. 63, 200–209).

To the Laws of Nature, declared in the 15. Chapter, I would have this added, That every man is bound by Nature, as much as in him lieth, to protect in Warre, the Authority, by which he is himself protected in time of Peace. For he that pretendeth a Right of Nature to preserve his owne body, cannot pretend a Right of Nature to destroy him, by whose strength he is preserved: It is a manifest contradiction of himselfe. And though this Law may bee drawn by consequence, from some of those that are there already mentioned; yet the Times require to have it inculcated, and remembred.

And because I find by divers English Books lately printed, that the Civill warres have not yet sufficiently taught men, in what point of time it is, that a Subject becomes obliged to the Conquerour; nor what is Conquest; nor how it comes about, that it obliges men to obey his Laws:[h] Therefore for farther satisfaction of men therein, I say, the point of time, wherein a man becomes subject to a Conquerour, is that point, wherein having liberty to submit to him, he consenteth, either by expresse words, or by other sufficient sign, to be his Subject. When it is that a man hath the liberty to submit, I have shewed before in the end of the 21. Chapter; namely, that for him that hath no obligation to his former Soveraign but that of an ordinary Subject, it is then, when the means of his life is within the Guards and Garrisons of the Enemy; for it is then, that he hath no longer Protection from him, but is protected by the adverse party for his Contribution.[i] Seeing therefore such contribution is every where, as a thing inevitable, (notwithstanding it be an assistance to the Enemy,) esteemed lawfull; a totall Submission, which is but an assistance to the Enemy, cannot be esteemed unlawful. Besides, if a man consider that they who submit, assist the Enemy but with part of their estates, whereas they that refuse, assist him with the whole, there is no reason to call their Submission, or Composition[j] an Assistance; but rather a Detriment to the Enemy. But if a man, besides the obligation of a Subject, hath taken upon him a new obligation of a Souldier, then he hath not the liberty to submit to a new Power, as long as the old one keeps the field, and giveth him means of subsistence, either in his Armies, or Garrisons: for in this case, he cannot complain of want of Protection, and means to [391] live as a Souldier: But when that also failes, a Souldier also may seek his Protection wheresoever he has most hope to have it; and may lawfully submit himself to his new Master. And so much for the Time when he may do it lawfully, if hee will. If therefore he doe it, he is undoubtedly bound to be a true Subject: For a Contract lawfully made, cannot lawfully be broken.

By this also a man may understand, when it is, that men may be said to be Conquered; and in what the nature of Conquest, and the Right of a Conquerour consisteth: For this Submission is it that implyeth them all. Conquest, is not the Victory it self; but the Acquisition by Victory, of a Right, over the persons of men. He therefore that is slain, is Overcome, but not Conquered: He that is taken, and put into prison, or chaines, is not Conquered, though Overcome; for he is still an Enemy, and may save himself if hee can: But he that upon promise of Obedience, hath his Life and Liberty allowed him, is then Conquered, and a Subject; and not before. The Romanes used to say, that their Generall had Pacified such a Province, that is to say, in English, Conquered it; and that the Countrey was Pacified by Victory, when the people of it had promised Imperata facere,[k] that is, To doe what the Romane People commanded them: this was to be Conquered. But this promise may be either expresse, or tacite: Expresse, by Promise: Tacite, by other signes. As for example, a man that hath not been called to make such an expresse Promise, (because he is one whose power perhaps is not considerable;) yet if he live under their Protection openly, hee is understood to submit himselfe to the Government: But if he live there secretly, he is lyable to any thing that may bee done to a Spie, and Enemy of the State. I say not, hee does any Injustice, (for acts of open Hostility bear not that name); but that he may be justly put to death. Likewise, if a man, when his Country is conquered, be out of it, he is not Conquered, nor Subject: but if at his return, he submit to the Government, he is bound to obey it. So that Conquest (to define it) is the Acquiring of the Right of Soveraignty by Victory. Which Right, is acquired, in the peoples Submission, by which they contract with the Victor, promising Obedience, for Life and Liberty.

In the 29. Chapter I have set down for one of the causes of the Dissolutions of Common-wealths, their Imperfect Generation, consisting in the want of an Absolute and Arbitrary Legislative Power;[1] for want whereof, the Civill Soveraign is fain to handle the Sword of Justice unconstantly, and as if it were too hot for him to hold: One reason whereof (which I have not there mentioned) is this, That they will all of them justifie the War, by which their Power was at first gotten, and whereon (as they think) their Right dependeth, and not on the Possession. As if, for example, the Right of the Kings of England did depend on the goodnesse of the cause of William the Conquerour, and upon their lineall, and directest Descent from him; by which means, there would perhaps be no tie of the Subjects obedience to their Soveraign at this day in all the world: wherein [392] whilest they needlessely think to justifie themselves, they justifie all the successefull Rebellions that Ambition shall at any time after raise against them, and their Successors. Therefore I put down for one of the most effectuall seeds of the Death of any State, that the Conquerors require not onely a Submission of mens actions to them for the future, but also an Approbation of all their actions past; when there is scarce a Common-wealth in the world, whose beginnings can in conscience be justified.

And because the name of Tyranny, signifieth nothing more, nor lesse, than the name of Soveraignty, be it in one, or many men, saving that they that use the former word, are understood to bee angry with them they call Tyrants; I think the toleration of a professed hatred of Tyranny, is a Toleration of hatred to Common-wealth in generall, and another evill seed, not differing much from the former. For to the Justification of the Cause of a Conqueror, the Reproach of the Cause of the Conquered, is for the most part necessary: but neither of them necessary for the Obligation of the Conquered. And thus much have I thought fit to say upon the Review of the first and second part of this Discourse.

In the 35. Chapter, I have sufficiently declared out of the Scripture, that in the Common-wealth of the Jewes, God himselfe was made the Soveraign, by Pact with the People; who were therefore called his Peculiar People, to distinguish them from the rest of the world, over whom God reigned not by their Consent, but by his own Power: And that in this Kingdome Moses was Gods Lieutenant on Earth; and that it was he that told them what Laws God appointed them to be ruled by. But I have omitted to set down who were the Officers appointed to doe Execution; especially in Capitall Punishments; not then thinking it a matter of so necessary consideration, as I find it since. Wee know that generally in all Common-wealths, the Execution of Corporeall Punishments, was either put upon the Guards, or other Souldiers of the Soveraign Power; or given to those, in whom want of means, contempt of honour, and hardnesse of heart, concurred,[m] to make them sue for such an Office. But amongst the Israelites it was a Positive Law of God their Soveraign, that he that was convicted of a capitall Crime, should be stoned to death by the People; and that the Witnesses should cast the first Stone, and after the Witnesses, then the rest of the People.[n] This was a Law that designed[o] who were to be the Executioners; but not that any one should throw a Stone at him before Conviction and Sentence. Where the Congregation was Judge, the Witnesses were neverthelesse to be heard before they proceeded to Execution, unlesse the Fact[p] were committed in the presence of the Congregation it self, or in sight of the lawfull Judges; for then there needed no other Witnesses but the Judges themselves. Neverthelesse, this manner of proceeding being not throughly[q] understood, hath given occasion to a dangerous opinion, that any man may kill another, in some cases, by a Right of Zeal;[r] as if the Executions done upon Offenders in the Kingdome of God in old time, proceeded not from [393] the Soveraign Command, but from the Authority of Private Zeal: which, if we consider the texts that seem to favour it, is quite contrary.

First, where the Levites fell upon the People, that had made and worshipped the Golden Calfe, and slew three thousand of them; it was by the Commandement of Moses, from the mouth of God; as is manifest, Exod. 32. 27. And when the Son of a woman of Israel had blasphemed God, they that heard it, did not kill him, but brought him before Moses, who put him under custody, till God should give Sentence against him; as appears, Levit. 25. 11, 12.[s] Again, (Numbers 25. 6, 7) when Phinehas killed Zimri and Cosbi, it was not by right of Private Zeale: Their Crime was committed in the sight of the Assembly; there needed no Witnesse; the Law was known, and he the heir apparent to the Soveraignty; and which is the principall point, the Lawfulnesse of his Act depended wholly upon a subsequent Ratification by Moses, whereof he had no cause to doubt. And this Presumption of a future Ratification, is sometimes necessary to the safety of a Common-wealth, as in a sudden Rebellion, any man that can suppresse it by his own Power in the Countrey[t] where it begins, without expresse Law or Commission, may lawfully doe it, and provide to have it Ratified, or Pardoned, whilest it is in doing, or after it is done. Also Numb. 35. 30 it is expressely said, Whosoever shall kill the Murtherer, shall kill him upon the word of Witnesses:[u] but Witnesses suppose a formall Judicature, and consequently condemn that pretence of Ius Zelotarum.[v] The Law of Moses concerning him that enticeth to Idolatry, that is to say (in the Kingdome of God), to a renouncing of his Allegiance

[r] Hobbes probably had in mind here Ascham, Confusions and Revolutions, pp. 121–3, where the 'antient Ius zelotarum [right of zealots] among the Jewes' was taken to justify the punitive killing of individuals by individuals in some cases; Ascham used this to oppose Hobbes's argument (in De cive) that citizens had surrendered all such rights to the sovereign. The classic discussions of the 'ius zelotarum' were Selden, De iure naturali, IV.4 (pp. 487–91), and Hammond, Of Resisting the Lawful Magistrate, pp. 34–41 (where Hammond confined it strictly to the Jews).

[u] This is a summary of the biblical verse, not a quotation.

[v] = 'right of zealots'. The sense of the construction here is: 'but the specifying of witnesses supposes . . . and consequently condemns . . .'.

(Deut. 13. 8.)[w] forbids to conceal him, and commands the Accuser to cause him to be put to death, and to cast the first stone at him; but not to kill him before he be Condemned. And (Deut. 17. ver. 4, 5, 6.)[x] the Processe against Idolatry is exactly set down: For God there speaketh to the People, as Judge, and commandeth them, when a man is Accused of Idolatry, to Enquire diligently of the Fact,[y] and finding it true, then to Stone him; but still the hand of the Witnesse throweth the first stone. This is not Private Zeale, but Publique Condemnation. In like manner when a Father hath a rebellious Son, the Law is (Deut. 21. 18.)[z] that he shall bring him before the Judges of the Town, and all the people of the Town shall Stone him. Lastly, by pretence of these Laws it was, that St. Steven was Stoned, and not by pretence of Private Zeal: for before hee was carried away to Execution, he had Pleaded his Cause before the High Priest.[aa] There is nothing in all this, nor in any other part of the Bible, to countenance Executions by Private Zeal; which being oftentimes but a conjunction of Ignorance and Passion, is against both the Justice and Peace of a Common-wealth.

In the 36. Chapter I have said, that it is not declared in what manner God spake supernaturally to Moses:[ab] Not that he spake not to him sometimes by Dreams and Visions, and by a supernaturall Voice, as to other Prophets: For the manner how he spake unto him from the Mercy-Seat, is expressely set down Numbers 7. 89. in [394] these words, From that time forward, when Moses entred into the Tabernacle of the Congregation to speak with God, he heard a Voice which spake unto him from over the Mercy-Seate, which is over the Arke of the Testimony, from between the Cherubins he spake unto him. But it is not declared in what consisted the praeeminence of the manner of Gods speaking to Moses, above that of his speaking to other Prophets, as to Samuel, and to Abraham, to whom he also spake by a Voice, (that is, by Vision) Unlesse the difference consist in the cleernesse of the Vision. For Face to Face, and Mouth to Mouth,[ac] cannot be literally understood of the Infinitenesse, and Incomprehensibility of the Divine Nature.

And as to the whole Doctrine, I see not yet, but the Principles of it are true and proper; and the Ratiocination solid. For I ground the Civill Right of Soveraigns, and both the Duty and Liberty of Subjects, upon the known naturall Inclinations of Mankind, and upon the Articles of the Law of Nature; of which no man, that pretends but reason enough to govern his private family, ought to be ignorant. And for the Power Ecclesiasticall of the same Soveraigns, I ground it on such Texts, as are both evident in themselves, and consonant to the Scope of the whole Scripture. And therefore am perswaded, that he that shall read it with a purpose onely to be informed, shall be informed by it. But for those that by Writing, or Publique Discourse, or by their eminent[ad] actions, have already engaged themselves to the maintaining of contrary opinions, they will not bee so easily satisfied. For in such cases, it is naturall for men, at one and the same time, both to proceed in reading, and to lose their attention, in the search of objections to that they had read before: Of which, in a time wherein the interests of men are changed (seeing much of that Doctrine, which serveth to the establishing of a new Government, must needs be contrary to that which conduced to the dissolution of the old,) there cannot choose but be very many.

In that part which treateth of a Christian Common-wealth, there are some new Doctrines, which, it may be, in a State where the contrary were already fully determined, were a fault for a Subject without leave to divulge, as being an usurpation of the place of a Teacher. But in this time, that men call not onely for Peace, but also for Truth, to offer such Doctrines as I think True, and that manifestly tend to Peace and Loyalty, to the consideration of those that are yet in deliberation, is no more, but to offer New Wine, to bee put into New Cask,[ae] that both may be preserved together. And I suppose, that then, when Novelty can breed no trouble, nor disorder in a State, men are not generally so much inclined to the reverence of Antiquity, as to preferre Ancient Errors, before New and well proved Truth.

There is nothing I distrust more than my Elocution;[af] which neverthelesse I am confident (excepting the Mischances of the Presse) is not obscure. That I have neglected the Ornament of quoting ancient Poets, Orators, and Philosophers, contrary to the custome of late time, (whether I have done well or ill in it,) proceedeth from my [395] judgment, grounded on many reasons. For first, all Truth of Doctrine dependeth either upon Reason, or upon Scripture; both which give credit to many, but never receive it from any Writer.

34 receive] receaueth MS

[ad] = conspicuous (OED, 'eminent', a., 4). [ae] Cf. above, Ch. 45, note cu.
[af] = literary expression or style (OED, 'elocution', 1.a).

Secondly, the matters in question are not of Fact, but of Right, wherein there is no place for Witnesses. There is scarce any of those old Writers, that contradicteth not sometimes both himself, and others; which makes their Testimonies insufficient. Fourthly, such Opinions as are taken onely upon Credit of Antiquity, are not intrinsecally the Judgment of those that cite them, but Words that passe (like gaping)[ag] from mouth to mouth. Fiftly, it is many times with a fraudulent Designe that men stick their corrupt Doctrine with the Cloves of other mens Wit. Sixtly, I find not that the Ancients they cite, took it for an Ornament, to doe the like with those that wrote before them. Seventhly, it is an argument of Indigestion, when Greek and Latine Sentences[ah] unchewed come up again, as they use to doe, unchanged.[ai] Lastly, though I reverence those men of Ancient time, that either have written Truth perspicuously, or set us in a better way to find it out our selves; yet to the Antiquity it self I think nothing due: For if we will reverence the Age, the Present is the Oldest. If the Antiquity of the Writer, I am not sure, that generally they to whom such honor is given, were more Ancient when they wrote, than I am that am Writing:[aj] But if it bee well considered, the praise of Ancient Authors, proceeds not from the reverence of the Dead, but from the competition, and mutuall envy of the Living.

To conclude, there is nothing in this whole Discourse, nor in that I writ before of the same Subject in Latine,[ak] as far as I can perceive, contrary either to the Word of God, or to good Manners; or tending to the disturbance of the Publique Tranquillity. Therefore I think it may be profitably printed, and more profitably taught in the Universities, in case they also think so, to whom the judgment of the same belongeth. For seeing the Universities are the Fountains of Civill, and Morall Doctrine, from whence the Preachers, and the Gentry, drawing such water as they find, use to sprinkle the same (both from the Pulpit, and in their Conversation)[al] upon the People, there ought certainly to be great care taken, to have it pure, both from the Venime of Heathen Politicians,[am] and from the Incantation of Deceiving Spirits.

And by that means the most men, knowing their Duties, will be the less subject to serve the Ambition of a few discontented persons, in their purposes against the State; and be the lesse grieved with the Contributions[an] necessary for their Peace, and Defence; and the Governours themselves have the lesse cause, to maintain at the Common charge any greater Army, than is necessary to make good the Publique Liberty, against the Invasions and Encroachments of forraign Enemies.

And thus I have brought to an end my Discourse of Civill and Ecclesiasticall Government, occasioned by the disorders of the present time, without partiality, without application,[ao] and without other designe, than to set before mens eyes the mutuall Relation between [396] Protection and Obedience; of which the condition of Humane Nature, and the Laws Divine, (both Naturall and Positive) require an inviolable observation. And though in the revolution of States, there can be no very good Constellation for Truths of this nature to be born under, (as having an angry aspect from the dissolvers of an old Government, and seeing but the backs of them that erect a new;)[ap] yet I cannot think it will be condemned at this time, either by the Publique Judge of Doctrine, or by any that desires the continuance of Publique Peace. And in this hope I return to my interrupted Speculation of Bodies Naturall; wherein, (if God give me health to finish it,)[aq] I hope the Novelty will as much please, as in the Doctrine of this Artificiall Body it useth to offend. For such Truth, as opposeth no mans profit, nor pleasure, is to all men welcome.

APPENDIX TO LEVIATHAN

CHAPTER I

On the Nicene Creed.[a]

A Please explain the Nicene Creed to me – I do not mean, so that I may grasp the things themselves in my mind, but so that I may understand the words of the Faith in such a way that they are in accordance with the Holy Scriptures. And first, these words: 'I believe in one God, the Father almighty, maker of Heaven and Earth and of all things visible and invisible.'[b] First, what is that expression 'I believe in', or, in Greek, πιστεύω εἰς? For I do not recall having found that phrase elsewhere among Greek authors. I read 'I believe someone' (πιστεύω τινί); and 'I believe that it is so' (πιστεύω οὕτως εἶναι).

B That expression is peculiar to those who agree on articles [of faith]. For the preposition εἰς means, among other things, 'as far as this'; so that if, in the statement πιστεύω εἰς θεόν πατέρα [I believe in God the Father], etc., θεόν [God] etc. were replaced by τοῦτο [this], it would be the same as 'I believe up to this point' or 'I believe as far as this'. So the preposition εἰς stands for the delimiting of the articles that are to be believed – that is, it shows how far those who subscribe to them agree with the Council [of Nicaea]. Therefore it should not seem surprising if you have not read that phrase anywhere other than in a confession of faith. For it is equivalent to your saying that you believe that God exists, that he is One, that he is the Father, that he is almighty, and so on. We read also 'I believe in the Gospel', that is, 'I believe the Gospel', that is, 'I believe the preachers of the Gospel'; but there the Greek has ἐν, not εἰς.[c]

A 'God is Father', 'God is almighty', etc., are (as dialecticians say) propositions. For they have their subjects and predicates, and some name is clearly attributed to God in them; but I do not understand what name is attributed to God in the statement 'God is'. For I do not think it can be said that God is 'is'; and it is pointless to say that 'God is God'.

APPENDIX AD LEVIATHAN.

De Symbolo Niceno.[a]

A. Explica mihi quaeso Symbolum Nicenum, non dico, ut res ipsas animo comprehendam, sed ut verba Fidei ita intelligam ut consentanea sunt Scripturis Sacris, & primo haec verba [Credo in unum Deum Patrem Omnipotentem Factorem Coeli & Terrae, atque visibilium omnium & invisibilium.][b] Et primò quid est illud, Credo in, vel Graecum πιστεύω εἰς? Nam apud authores Graecos non memini me alibi illam phrasim reperîsse. Lego Credo alicui πιστεύω τινί; Credo ita esse, vel πιστεύω οὕτως εἶναι.

B. Propria est illa vox consentientium in articulos. Nam praepositio εἰς significat inter alia hactenus, ut quando dicitur πιστεύω εἰς θεόν πατέρα &c. si pro θεόν &c. ponetur τοῦτο, idem esset quod credo huc usque sive hactenus. Significat ergo praepositio εἰς determinationem articulorum credendorum, nempe quousque cum Concilio consentiunt subscriptores. Mirum igitur videri non debet, si extra confessionem Fidei phrasim illam non legisti. Eadem enim est ac si te credere diceres: Deum esse, eundemque Vnum esse, Patrem esse, Omnipotentem esse, & sic de caeteris. Legitur etiam credo in Euangelio, id est credo Euangelio, id est praedicatoribus Euangelii; sed ibi Graecum non est εἰς, sed ἐν.[c]

A. Deus est Pater, Deus est Omnipotens &c. sunt (ut loquuntur Dialectici) propositiones. Habent enim sua Subjecta & Praedicata, & apertè in illis Deo nomen aliquod attribuitur, sed in affirmatione hac Deus est, quod nomen Deo attributum sit, non intelligo. Non enim puto dici posse, quod Deus est, est, & frustra dicitur, Deus est Deus.

[a] The creed adopted at the Council of Nicaea (325), and subsequently emended at the Council of Constantinople (381).

[b] Note that in this chapter, the typesetter of the Latin uses square brackets for quotations. These are rendered in the English translation as quotation marks. Throughout the Appendix, the English translation uses square brackets for editorial interpolations: either translations, or explanatory phrases, or citations of Latin or Greek words in the original.

[c] The normal meaning of ἐν is 'in' (or 'on', or 'at'); the normal meaning of εἰς is 'to' (or 'into').

B When it is said that 'God is', the word 'is' is a substantive verb,[d] including both the copula and the predicate, in both Greek and Latin. Thus 'God is' means the same as 'God exists': that is (when the substantive verb is analysed) 'God is an entity', or ὁ ὤν, that is, something real – not a mere phantasm, such as what is called a spectre, or such as the demons worshipped by the Gentiles, which are called 'nothing' by the Apostle St Paul.[e]

A I do indeed remember that idols are called 'nothing' by the Apostle; but not that demons are so called.

B Do you think it was those statues of gold, ivory, and wood that were called 'nothing', and not rather the demons which were worshipped under them? Besides, an idol is properly a phantasm, namely, an idea or image of a thing, not the thing itself; the Greeks made their statues in accordance with those ideas. For they seldom took the ideas or images of their gods from the statues. That word 'entity' ['ens'] also distinguishes God from names. For the actual man is one thing, and the name 'man' is another. Besides, it should be known that the word 'is', as used in Latin and Greek for the copula in propositions, was completely unknown to the Hebrews. Thus they always used a substantive verb; and in every statement, in order to signify what the dialecticians call 'predication', instead of using the copula they simply juxtaposed one name to another name. In Latin and Greek, however, the copula 'is' is not a verb but a conjunction; and just as 'and' signifies that the names between which it is placed are the names of different things, so the conjunction 'is' signifies that the names between which it is placed are names of the same thing. Thus the Hebrews could not have those names which are derived from the copula 'is', such as 'essence', 'entity', and 'being', nor their equivalents. In Latin one says 'the Earth was void'; in Hebrew, 'The Earth existing-thing void', where a Latin-speaker would understand not 'was', but '(was) something existing'.[f]

A What are we meant to believe by this word 'Creator'? That this world was made out of nothing?

B. Cum dicitur Deus est, vox est est verbum Substantiale,[d] includens tum copulam tum praedicatum, tum apud Graecos tum apud Latinos. [329] Itaque illud Deus est, significat idem quod Deus existit, id est (resoluto verbo substantivo) Deus est ens, sive ὁ ὤν, id est reale aliquid, non merum Phantasma, quale est, quod vocatur Spectrum, vel quales colebantur à gentibus Daemones, & ab Apostolo S. Paulo, Nihil.[e]

A. Memini quidem ab Apostolo Idola vocari Nihil, non autem Daemonia sic vocari.

B. Putasne ea Simulachra aurea, eburnea, lignea, an non potius Daemonia, quae sub illis colebantur, vocata esse Nihil? Praeterea Idolum propriè est Phantasma, nimirum Idea, Imago rei, non res ipsa; ad quas Ideas Simulachra sua faciebant Graeci. Nam Deorum suorum Ideas sive Imagines raro sumpserunt à Simulachris. Distinguitur etiam Deus per vocem illam Ens, à nominibus. Aliud enim est res homo, aliud nomen homo. Praeterea sciendum est, quod vox est, ut usurpatur à Latinis, & Graecis ad copulam in propositionibus, Hebraeis omninò ignota erat. Itaque utebantur semper verbo substantivo, & vice copulae in omni affirmatione ad significandam (quam dialectici vocant) Praedicationem, nomen nomini solummodò adjungebant. Latinis autem & Graecis copula est, non est Verbum, sed Conjunctio; & ut & significat nomina, inter quae interponitur esse nomina diversarum rerum, ita conjunctio est, significat nomina inter quae interponitur esse nomina rei ejusdem. Itaque ea nomina quae à copula est derivantur, ut essentia, entitas, esse, Hebraei habere non potuerunt, nec illis aequivalentia. Latinè dicitur Terra erat vacua; Hebraicè Terra existens vacua, ubi ab homine Latino non audiebatur erat, sed [erat] aliquid existens.[f]

A. Quid credendum est per vocem hanc [Creator]? Anne Mundum hunc è nihilo factum esse?

[d] On this grammatical term ('verbum substantivum', or, as here, 'verbum substantiale'), see above, Ch. 46, note as. [e] 1 Cor. 8: 4.

[f] This modifies the argument put forward in Ch. 46 (Latin), at note au (while also switching, for the citation from Gen. 1: 2, to the use of Vulg, which has 'Terra autem erat inanis et vacua'). Apparently Hobbes had been informed that his earlier statement ignored the presence in the Hebrew of a word corresponding to 'was' (derived from the verb 'hayah').

B Certainly, out of nothing; not, as Aristotle thought, out of pre-existent matter. For it is expressly said in the Holy Scriptures that all things were made out of nothing. Aristotle also contradicts himself when he says that the world is eternal.[g] For the word 'matter' is used only about that from which something is made. The Creed therefore says this: that God is the maker of all things out of nothing; and, consequently, that he has his existence by his own power, not from another; and therefore too he exists from eternity; and because there has not been anything that gave God his existence, there will also be nothing that can make him non-existent. God is, therefore, from eternity and to eternity. Now, created things are not from eternity, because they are created, but they will be to eternity in whatever shape and appearance God wills; for the Heaven and Earth will be renewed, and although the world will be consumed by fire, it will nevertheless not be annihilated, but real entities will persist. God, however, who was made neither by another nor by himself, cannot be changed or made to undergo metamorphosis, either by himself or by another, but is immutable and (not having that Aristotelian mixture)[h] utterly simple. All these attributes, 'simple', 'immutable', and 'eternal', are expressly predicated of God in the Holy Scriptures, in the same way that they are implied by the words of the creed.

A 'And in one Lord Jesus Christ the only begotten Son of God.' Why was it necessary to say 'only begotten'?

B Because at that time there were heretics who taught the Christ was not the begotten, but the adoptive, Son of God. And there were others who taught that Christ was not called 'Son of God' in the Holy Scriptures in any other sense from the sense in which all the faithful are so called. However, since the Holy Scriptures expressly and frequently say both that he was begotten, and that he is God, born of the Father before all worlds, we should therefore believe that Christ is God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, begotten not made.

A What is the difference between 'begotten' and 'made'?

[g] Aristotle argued that generation required pre-existing substance (On the Heavens, III.2, 301b31–302a5); however, he also argued that the universe was eternal and not generated (ibid., I.9, 277b26–9; I.10).

[h] Aristotle argued that a 'mixture' came about when elements were compounded to form such a homogeneous substance that the smallest part of it had the same nature as the whole (On Generation and Corruption, I.10). Hobbes's reference may be to this theory, or, more generally, to the idea that all things in the world were made up of the four elements.

B. Certè ex nihilo; non ut Aristoteles ex materia praeexistente. Expressè enim dictum est in Scripturis Sacris, omnia facta esse ex nihilo. Etiam Aristoteles, qui Mundum dicit esse Aeternum, sibimetipsi contradicit.[g] Materia enim non dicitur, nisi de qua aliquid factum est. Symbolum ergo hoc dicit, Deum factorem esse omnium rerum ex nihilo; &, quod sequitur, sua vi habet ut existat, non ab alio; & proinde etiam existit ab aeterno; & quia non fuit, qui Deo dedit ut existeret, nihil etiam erit quod ipsum faciet non existere. Est ergo Deus ab aeterno & in aeternum. Quae vero creata sunt, non sunt ab aeterno, quia creata, in aeternum autem erunt, qua forma & specie vult Deus, nam coelum & terra renovabuntur, & quanquam mundus conflagrabit, non tamen annihilabitur, sed permanebunt entia, Realia. Deus autem qui neque ab alio, neque à se factus est, non potest mutari neque Metamorphosem pati, neque à se, neque ab alio, [330] sed est Immutabilis & (sine mixtione illa Aristotelica)[h] Simplicissimus. Quae omnia attributa Simplex, Immutabilis, Aeternus, sicut ex verbis Symboli deducuntur, ita de Deo in Scripturis Sacris expressis verbis praedicantur.

A. [Et in unum Dominum Iesum Christum Filium Dei unigenitum.] Cur necesse erat dicere Vnigenitum?

B. Quia erant eo tempore Haeretici, qui docebant Christum non esse Filium Dei genitum, sed adoptivum; alii etiam erant, qui docebant Christum non alio sensu in Scripturis Sacris vocari Filium Dei, quam quo fideles omnes ita appellantur. Cum tamen in Scripturis Sacris expressè & passim dicitur tum genitus, tum Deus à Patre natus ante omnia secula, & propterea credi debet Christum esse Deum de Deo, Lumen de Lumine, verum Deum de vero Deo, genitum non factum.

A. Quaenam est differentia inter genitum & factum?

B We understand 'made' to mean 'made by God from nothing', that is, a creature. For although animals are said to be both created and begotten, when they are said to be created it means in relation to God the creator, who created the first male and female of every kind from the created earth. But when an animal is said to be begotten, it means in the natural way, with relation to the first created animals as its matter; and when it is said that Christ was begotten, it means begotten of God the Father himself from the matter of the Virgin.

A What is 'Light of Light'? For it seems to me that light is a phantasm, not an existing thing. For example, if you place between your eye and a candle a piece of glass, the surface of which consists of many planes arranged in a certain way, it will seem to you that there are many candles. Yet we know that there is only one true candle, and therefore that all the others are mere phantasms and idols – that is, as St Paul says, nothing.[i] However, so far as appearances go, there is not one of those candles that is truer than the others; but the true candle, which was put in place at the start, is not one of the merely apparent candles, but the thing itself, and is itself the cause of all those images. For that reason, Aristotle distinguishes it from a phantasm by means of the word 'hypostasis', as if the thing itself were standing there, in hiding, under the image;[j] and the Latins translated that Greek word using the compound 'substance' ['substantia'].[k] And thus both the Greeks and the Latins distinguish the true thing, which subsists in itself, from a phantasm, which seems to subsist, but neither subsists nor is a being. Isn't this the true distinction between the thing itself and its appearance?

B Yes, it is. But the Fathers of the Church in those times, both before and after the Council of Nicaea, seem to interpret the word 'hypostasis' in a different way in their writings, wishing to make the mystery of the Trinity intelligible to all Christians – and they thought that could best be done by a comparison to fire, light, and heat, which three things they regarded as one thing. And they did indeed compare fire to the Father, light to the Son, and heat to the Holy Spirit.[l] This comparison would perhaps have been precisely ap-

B. Per factum intelligimus factum à Deo ex nihilo, id est Creaturam. Quanquam enim animalia dicantur & creata & genita, quando dicuntur creata, intelligitur illud cum relatione ad Deum creatorem, qui in omni genere primum marem & foeminam creavit ex creata terra. Sed quando dicitur animal esse genitum naturali modo intelligi debet, cum relatione ad prima creata ut materiam; at quando dicitur Christum esse genitum, intelligitur genitum ab ipso Deo Patre de materia Virginis.

A. Quid est [Lumen de Lumine]? Lumen enim, ut mihi videtur, Phantasma est, non res existens. Exempli causa, si inter oculum & candelam vitrum statuas cujus superficies ex multi planis constat certo modo dispositis, multae tibi videbuntur candelae. Scimus tamen unicam ibi esse veram candelam, & proinde caeteras omnes mera esse Phantasmata, Idola, hoc est, ut dicit Sanctus Paulus, Nihil.[i] Neque tamen earum una verior est candela, quàm reliquae quatenus apparent; sed vera candela, quae principio posita erat, candelarum apparentium tantùm nulla est, sed res ipsa, eademque causa illarum omnium imaginum, & propterea ab Aristotele distinguitur à Phantasmate per vocem hypostasis, quasi sub imagine staret res ipsa latitans;[j] quam Graecam vocem Latini ad syllabam verterunt substantiam.[k] Et sic distinguunt tum Graeci tum Latini rem veram in se subsistentem, à Phantasmate, quae videtur subsistere, nec subsistit, neque est ens. Nonne haec est vera distinctio inter rem ipsam & suam apparentiam?

B. Ita est. Sed Patres Ecclesiae illis temporibus, tum ante tum [331] post Concilium Nicenum in scriptis suis vocem Hypostasis videntur alio modo interpretari, mysterium Trinitatis Christianis omnibus intelligibile reddere cupientes, & illud optimè fieri posse existimabant per similitudinem ignis, luminis, & caloris, quae tria unum esse putaverunt, & ignem quidem ad Patrem, lumen ad Filium, & calorem ad Spiritum Sanctum retulerunt.[l] In qua

[i] 1 Cor. 8: 4.

[j] The Greek word literally means 'standing under'. Hobbes possibly refers to the work (wrongly) attributed to Aristotle, On the Universe (De mundo), ch. 4, 395a29–30, which says that some of the 'phantasms' occurring in the air are merely apparent, while others exist 'substantially' (καθ' ὑπόστασιν).

[k] The Latin word literally means 'standing under'.

[l] This may refer to Augustine, De symbolo ad catechumenos sermo alius, ch. 9 (PL xl, col. 659), which makes this comparison in general terms to illustrate the Trinity: 'Behold, in a fire we observe three things, the fire, the shining, and the heat; and whilst they are three, the light is one' ('Ecce in igne quaedam tria conspicimus; ignem, splendorem et calorem: et cum sint tria, unum lumen est'). Cf. also a similar passage in a work attributed (dubiously) to Athanasius, Other Questions (PG xxviii, col. 780).

propriate, were it not that fire, brightness, and heat are not substances, nor did they seem to be substances to those Fathers themselves (especially the Aristotelian ones) – unless, perhaps, 'fire' here is taken as meaning the thing that is on fire. For a man extinguishes both fire, and light, and heat as often as he likes; but we are not commanded to believe, nor is it believable, that so weak an agent as man can extinguish and reduce to nothing a true substantial creature, created by almighty God. So whenever the Fathers adduced this comparison themselves in their own writings, they immediately added that it should not be accepted as if it were a sufficient explanation of such a great mystery, but only as the best they could find; for all agreed that the natures of God, of the Trinity, of angels, and (as Athanasius adds) of the rational soul were incomprehensible.[m]

A It seems to me, indeed, that they were not right in wanting to explain that mystery. For what is it to explain a mystery, if not to destroy it, or make a mystery not a mystery? For when faith is turned into knowledge it perishes, so that only hope and charity remain.[n]

B So 'Light of Light' is put in the Creed only to help the faith which should be given to other articles.

A Next there follows that great article which brought so many disturbances, banishments, and murders into the ancient Church: 'being of one substance with the Father, by whom all things were made'.

B And it is indeed most true, having been expressly declared by St John (ch. 1): 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.' And 'all things were made by him'.[o]

A What did the Fathers understand by 'the Word'?

B The Son of God by nature, or begotten of God, from the beginning, that is, from eternity.

[m] This possibly refers to a work attributed (wrongly) to Athanasius, the Questions, to General Antiochus, which argues that as we cannot understand the nature of angels or of our own souls, still less can we understand the nature of their creator (PG xxviii, cols. 597–600).

similitudine congruitas esset fortasse accurata, nisi quod ignis, splendor, & calor, substantiae nec sint, nec ipsis Patribus esse visae sint, praesertim Aristotelicis, nisi forte ipse ignis ponatur pro ignito. A Doesn't 'the Word' in that passage mean some utterance, such as a sound uttered by God?

B Far from it; the Fathers frequently deny that.

A What is it, then? An internal utterance, such as the eternal decree of God concerning the creation of the world and the redemption of man?

B I do not know what the Fathers' opinion was on this matter, but I think it was different from that, so as not to agree too much with the Stoic doctrine that εἱμαρμένη (in Greek) and 'fatum' (in Latin) mean the same as an eternal decree.[p]

A So what, I repeat, did the Fathers understand by 'the Word'?

B I do not know, except that 'the word' in sacred language is often taken to mean the actual thing that is decreed or promised. For often in the Old Testament we read, instead of 'what God promised was done', 'the word of God which he spoke was done.' But I do not usually interpret the Holy Scripture for anyone except myself. However, if that passage of St John is to be understood in this way, I should not wish to enquire further about the mystery of the incarnation. For if 'the Word' in this passage is the thing itself which God decreed should come into the world for our redemption, and which God promised in Paradise, that 'Word' is not a mere utterance, but the true thing, identical with Christ. But as for how he 'was made man', that is not for me to enquire. For me, it suffices that he was made my redeemer. Why, then, should I enquire? If I believe that he created the earth and all other things out of nothing, and man out of the earth, am I not to believe that he could have assumed human nature unless I know how he did so?

A 'Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven; and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man, and was crucified also for us under Pontius Pilate; he suffered and was buried.' There are two difficulties here; the first is that it says from where he came down, namely, from heaven, but does not say how far he came down. I know that the Apostolic Creed has the phrase 'he descended ad inferos [literally: 'to those [p] See Augustine, De civitate Dei, V.9 (commenting on Cicero, De divinatione, I.126). The Greek term, which was used by the Stoics to refer to the fixed order of causes, means literally 'that which has been assigned as one's portion'. On 'fatum' see above, Ch. 36, note i.

A. Numquid eo loco Verbum significat vocem aliquam, ut sonum à Deo prolatum?

B. Absit, Patres id passim negant.

A. Quid ergo? Vocem internam, quale est Dei Decretum aeternum de condendo mundo & redimendo homine?

B. Nescio de hac re quid senserint Patres, sed puto illos aliter [332] sensisse, ne nimium accederent ad doctrinam Stoicorum, quorum (apud Graecos) εἱμαρμένη, & (apud Latinos) Fatum idem significat quod Decretum aeternum.[p]

A. Quid ergo inquam intelligitur per Verbum apud Patres?

B. Nescio, nisi quod in lingua Sacra Verbum saepe accipiatur pro ipsa re quae Decreta est, vel promissa. Legitur enim saepe in veteri Testamento pro factum est quod Deus promisit, factum est Verbum Dei quod locutus est. Ego vero nemini Scripturam Sacram praeterquam mihi interpretari soleo. Veruntamen si locus S. Iohannis ita intelligendus sit, nihil circa mysterium incarnationis quaerere amplius vellem. Nam si Verbum hoc loco sit illud ipsum, quod decreverat Deus venturum in mundum ad nostram redemptionem, & quod promiserat Deus in Paradiso, Verbum illud non est mera vox, sed vera res, eadem cum Christo. Quomodo autem Factus homo est, inquirere non est meum. Sufficit mihi quod Redemptor meus factus est. Quid enim? Si credam creâsse terram & caetera omnia ex nihilo, & hominem ex terra, non credam potuisse naturam assumere humanam, nisi sciam quo modo?

A. [Qui propter nos homines & nostram salutem descendit de coelo; & Incarnatus est de Spiritu Sancto ex Maria Virgine, & homo factus est, crucifixus etiam pro nobis sub Pontio Pilato; passus & sepultus est.] Duae hic sunt difficultates, quarum prima est, quod dictum sit unde descendit, nempe de coelo; non autem dictum est quousque descendit. Scio in Symbolo Apostolorum esse, below']'. But those words do not define a place; for in relation to those who dwell in heaven, men are properly called 'those below'.[q] And in the Scriptures the place where it is said that the enemies of the Church will be has various names; sometimes 'Gehenna',[r] sometimes 'outer darkness' (that is, outside the Church of God – so called on account of the light of the Church in Goshen, because one of the plagues of the Egyptians was darkness);[s] sometimes a lake of fire (with regard, I think, to the punishment of the people of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the lake of brimstone).[t] But, so far as I know, the Church has not yet determined anything in these matters. Some Doctors[u] have maintained, with Bellarmino, that the place of the damned is near the centre of the earth,[v] that is, so that it should be very far from the heaven of the blessed – perhaps taking note of that Greek word used by St Peter, ταρταριζόμενος.[w] And indeed the distance of heaven from the centre of the earth exceeds its distance from the surface of the earth by a whole point.[x] But I do not think that the Apostles believed the heathen poets on the location of Tartarus, which Hesiod makes as far from the earth as the earth is from heaven. An anvil (he says), falling continuously from heaven for nine days and as many nights, will reach the earth on the tenth day; falling continuously from the earth for the same number of nights and days, it will arrive at Tartarus on the tenth day.[y] Vergil, however, makes the distance from the earth to Tartarus twice as great as that from heaven to the earth.[z] Besides, I think that word was used figuratively by the Apostle Peter, which tends to be the case with many expressions of the Holy Scripture.

B However that may be, no determination of the place of the damned has yet been given by the assembled Church – at least, not by ours.

A The second difficulty concerns the saying, 'he was incarnate by the Holy Ghost'. For in Matt. 1: 20 the angel says to Joseph, 'That which is conceived in her is of the Holy Ghost.' Which sounds as if the Holy Spirit begat the Son – that is, was his father.

[q] Hobbes recapitulates here the argument of several Puritan writers who (in support of Calvin's claim that Christ suffered the pains of Hell while on the cross) denied that Christ actually descended into Hell. Cf., e.g., Perkins, Problema, p. 64: 'Sometimes the old authors mean, by the descent of Christ "ad inferos", his descent to the lower parts of the world' ('Aliquando veteres per descensum Christi ad inferos, significant descensum eius ad inferiores partes mundi'); Willet, Limbo-mastix, p. 56: 'for whether wee reade lower or lowest, the sense is the same: for the earth compared with other parts of the world, may be said to be the lower, or lowest part', and his Synopsis papismi, pp. 1149–50.

descendit ad inferos. Sed verba illa locum non definiunt; quia homines etiam respectu coelicolarum propriè dicuntur Inferi.[q] Etiam in Scripturis, locus ubi hostes Ecclesiae dicuntur futuri variè vocatur; quandoque Gehenna,[r] aliquando Tenebrae externae, id est extra Ecclesiam Dei, propter lucem Ecclesiae in Goshen, quia una de plagis Aegyptiorum erat Tenebrae;[s] aliquando lacus ignis, cum respectu, puto, ad poenam Sodomitarum & Gomorrhaeorum, & lacum bituminis.[t] Sed de his nondum, quod sciam, quicquam Ecclesia definivit. Doctores[u] aliqui locum damnatorum statuerunt cum Bellarmino esse circa centrum terrae,[v] ut scilicet longissimè distaret à coelo beatorum; respicientes forte ad vocem S. Petri Graecam ταρταριζόμενος.[w] Et quidem coelum distat à centro terrae longiùs quam à superficie terrae quantum est totum punctum.[x] Sed non credo credidisse Apostolos Poëtis Ethnicis de loco Tartari; quem Hesiodus tantundem à terra distare facit quantum terra à coelo. Incus (inquit) novem dies & totidem noctes perpetuò de coelo cadens, decimo die attinget terram; totidem autem noctes [333] & dies perpetuò è terra cadens perveniet ad Tartarum die decimo.[y] Virgilius autem distantiam à terra ad Tartarum bis tantam facit, quanta est à coelo ad terram.[z] Caeterum vocem illam ab Apostolo Petro positam esse puto figuratè, quod solet fieri de multis dictionibus Scripturae Sacrae.

B. Utcunque id sit, de loco damnatorum nihil ab Ecclesia congregata, saltem à nostra hactenus definitum est.

A. Secunda difficultas est, de eo quod dicitur [Incarnatus est de Spiritu Sancto.] Nam Matth. 1, 20, dicit Angelus ad Iosephum, Quod in illa genitum est, à Spiritu Sancto est. Quod ita sonat ac si Spiritus Sanctus esset Filii genitor, id est Pater.

[u] The term 'Doctors' ('Doctores') is used here and subsequently in the Appendix to mean not just 'teachers', but those prominent teachers whose views have been taken as in some way authoritative by a particular Church.

[v] Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 2, 'De Christo', bk. 4, ch. 10 (i, pp. 548–51) (stating that Hell is at the centre of the earth).

[w] The reference is to 2 Pet. 2: 4, 'God spared not the angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell'; but the word used there is ταρταρώσας, from ταρταρόω, to 'cast into Tartarus', not from ταρταρίζω, to 'shiver or quake with cold'.

[x] This sentence (as translated literally here) makes little sense; some words have apparently been omitted and/or displaced. Hobbes may have meant to say that while it is true that the former distance exceeds the latter, the difference between them, when compared with the whole distance between the earth and heaven, is a mere 'point' or minutely small part.

B Well then? Isn't the Spirit of God God, and the same God as the Son and the Father?

A Then how are the hypostases distinguished?

B Three hypostases are not distinguished or named, either in the Creed or in the Holy Scripture.

A But we find three hypostases in the Athanasian Creed, which is part of the Anglican liturgy.

B The Greek does indeed have 'hypostasis', but in Latin and English it is 'person'.

A I shall ask you about the words 'hypostasis', 'person', 'subsistence', and many others, when you have explained the whole Creed. 'And the third day he rose again, according to the Scriptures, and ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God. And he shall come again with glory to judge both the quick and the dead, whose kingdom shall have no end.' All these things, I confess, are in the Scriptures, and indeed in the same sense as they are in the Creed, where I do not understand 'sitteth on the right hand of God' as making a comparison of honour, but as meaning the greatest honour. 'And in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father and the Son.' Show me from the Holy Scriptures that the Holy Spirit is the Lord and giver of life, that is, God, and that it also proceeds from the Son.

B First, the same Son of God is said (Matt. 1: 20) to have been begotten of the Spirit of God. Next, Job says (33: 4) 'The Spirit of God hath made me', and (26: 13) 'The Spirit of God created the heavens.'[aa] But that it proceeds from the Son as well as from the Father is evident from what Christ says, 'I will send you the Comforter',[ab] and from what he said when he breathed upon the Apostles: 'receive ye the Holy Ghost'.[ac] Note that that phrase 'from the Son' is not in the Nicene Creed, although those words are in the Athanasian Creed – but, in Bellarmino's opinion, they were added in the second general Council of Constantinople.[ad]

A 'Who with the Father and the Son together is worshipped and glorified, who spake by the Prophets.' Why is 'together is . . . glorified' ['conglorificatur'] included?

B. Quid? Nonne Spiritus Dei est Deus, & idem Deus cum Filio & Patre?

A. Quomodo ergo distinguuntur Hypostases?

B. Neque in Symbolo, neque in Scriptura Sacra distinguuntur aut nominantur tres Hypostases.

A. Sed inveniuntur tres Hypostases in Symbolo Athanasii, quae pars est Liturgiae Anglicanae.

B. In Graeco quidem Hypostasis, in Latino autem & Anglicano Persona est.

A. De vocibus Hypostasis, persona, subsistentia, aliisque multis vocibus tunc interrogabo te cum Symbolum totum explicaveris. [& resurrexit tertia die, secundum Scripturas, & ascendit in coelum, sedet ad dextram Dei. Et iterum venturus est cum gloria judicare vivos & mortuos, cujus regni non est finis.] Haec omnia (fateor) in Scripturis sunt, & quidem eodem sensu quo sunt in Symbolo, ubi [sedet ad Dexteram Dei] non intelligo ut de comparatione honoris, sed ut de honore maximo. [Et in Spiritum Sanctum Dominum & vivificatorem, qui ex Patre Filioque procedit.] Ostende ex Scripturis Sacris, Spiritum Sanctum esse Dominum & vivificatorem, id est Deum, & quod procedat etiam à Filio.

B. Primo idem Filius Dei dicitur genitus (Matth. 1, 20.) à Spiritu Dei. Deinde dicit Iob. 33, vers. 4, Spiritus Dei fecit me, & (26, vers. 13.) Spiritus Dei creavit coelos.[aa] Quod autem procedat tam à Filio, quàm à Patre, manifestum est ex eo, quod Christus dicit: ego vobis mittam Paracletum,[ab] & ex eo quod cum spiraret in Apostolos dixit, accipite Spiritum Sanctum.[ac] Nota illud ex Filio non esse in Symbolo Niceno, quanquam verba sunt in Symbolo Athanasii, sed addita esse, ut putat Bellarminus, in Concilio Constantinopolitano generali secundo.[ad] [334]

[aa] Hobbes apparently cites Job 26: 13 from memory. In both Vulg and Junius-Tremellius, the verb is not 'creavit' ('created') but 'ornavit', 'adorned' (AV: 'garnished').

[ab] This statement is adapted from John 15: 26 ('when the Comforter is come, whom I will send unto you from the Father'). [ac] John 20: 22.

[ad] Hobbes has misread or misremembered Bellarmino here. He argued that the 'filioque' ('and from the Son') clause first appeared in the creed issued by the 8th Council of Toledo (653); it was the preceding clause, 'who proceedeth from the Father' ('qui ex Patre procedit'), that he believed to have been added at the Council of Constantinople in 381 (Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 2, 'De Christo', bk 2, chs. 21, 23 (i, pp. 425, 431)).

B I do not know, but this expression 'together is . . . glorified' makes me believe that the formula which is said or sung to glorify the Trinity, 'Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost', was accepted at that time, or before, in the Churches of God.

A Perhaps. 'And in one holy Catholic and Apostolic Church. I acknowledge one baptism for the remission of sins, and I look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come.' Why is that phrase 'one baptism' lacking in the Apostolic Creed?

B About seventy years before the Council of Nicaea, St Cyprian had held a provincial council in the Carthaginian province of Africa, at which it was decreed that heretics should not be accepted by the Church unless they were re-baptized; that decree, I think, was condemned when those words were inserted, 'I acknowledge one baptism'.[ae]

A In the Apostolic Creed it says not 'the resurrection of the dead', but the resurrection of the flesh. What is the difference? When the dead rise again, will they have flesh, bones, blood, hands, feet, and the other parts of the human body?

B Let St Paul answer you, in 1 Cor. 15: 23: 'They will rise again, every man in his own body.'[af] Again, in v. 44: 'It is sown a natural body', that is (in my opinion) a body like the human body when it is dead; 'it is raised a spiritual body.' Therefore it is changed; so also, v. 51: 'I tell you a mystery. Indeed, we shall not all die, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.'[ag]

A But there seem to me to be two difficulties here. One is that to rise again is to come to life again; how is a man to come to life again in the grave, unless his soul is added to his body, coming down to it, that is, either from Heaven or from some heavenly Limbo, or ascending to it from Hell or Purgatory?

B What, then? Will God, who made man a living animal from the earth, be unable to quicken him to life again after he has been reduced to earth?

B. Nescio, sed propter hoc verbum conglorificatur adducor ad credendum Formulam glorificandi Trinitatem, ubi dicitur vel cantatur Gloria Patri & Filio & Spiritui Sancto in Ecclesiis Dei receptam fuisse aut in tempore illo aut ante.

A. Fortasse. [Et unam Sanctam Catholicam & Apostolicam Ecclesiam. Confiteor unum Baptisma in remissionem peccatorum. Expecto resurrectionem mortuorum, & vitam venturi seculi.] Cur in Symbolo Apostolico deest illud Vnum Baptisma?

B. Sanctus Cyprianus circiter septuaginta annis ante Concilium Nicenum, Concilium tenuerat Provinciale in Africa Carthaginense, ubi decretum est Haereticos non debere recipi ab Ecclesia, nisi iterum Baptizarentur, quod decretum puto tunc condemnatum esse, cum inserta essent illa verba confiteor unum Baptisma.[ae]

A. In Symbolo Apostolico non dicitur Resurrectio mortuorum, sed resurrectio carnis. Quaenam est differentia? Habebuntne mortui, quando resurgent, carnem, ossa, sanguinem, manus, pedes, & caetera humani corporis membra?

B. Respondeat tibi S. Paulus 1 Cor. 15, 23, Resurgent unusquisque in proprio corpore.[af] Deinde vers. 44, Seminatur corpus animale, id est (ut ego opinor) quale est corpus humanum quando est mortuum; resurget corpus spirituale. Itaque mutatur; ut vers. 51, mysterium vobis dico. Non omnes quidem moriemur, omnes autem mutabimur in momento, & ictu oculi in tuba ultima. Sonabit enim tuba & resurgent mortui incorruptibiles, & nos mutabimur.[ag]

A. Sed mihi videntur hic duae difficultates; altera, quia resurgere est reviviscere, quomodo homo reviviscet in sepulchro, nisi anima ejus accedat ad corpus, nimirum de coelo vel aliquo coeli Limbo descendens; vel ab Inferno, vel Purgatorio ascendens?

B. Quid? Deusne qui fecit hominem ex terra in animal vivens non poterit eundem resolutum in terram ad vitam resuscitare?

3 receptam 70] receptas 68 11 Baptizarentur] Baptizentur 70

[ae] Two synods held at Carthage under Cyprian (d. 258) in 255 and 256 decreed that Christians baptized by heretics should be re-baptized; this brought Cyprian into conflict with Pope Stephen, who threatened to excommunicate him. Bellarmino comments on this (from the papalist point of view) in Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 2, 'De Christo', bk 2, ch. 2 (i, p. 384).

[af] Hobbes appears to quote from memory (from 1 Cor. 15: 22–3); Vulg and Beza have 'vivificabuntur', 'they shall be made alive', and 'suo ordine', 'in his own rank [or: order]', which are accurate translations of the Greek.

[ag] Correctly: 1 Cor. 15: 51–2. Hobbes's Latin appears to be his own version of AV, with one significant change, 'Non omnes . . . moriemur' ('we shall not all die') for 'We shall not all sleep'.

A So it seems that after the resurrection a man will have two rational souls, namely, one by means of which he rises again, and another which, having been separated from his body by death, has migrated to Heaven, Limbo, Purgatory, or Hell. For everyone says that the human soul never perishes once it has been created, and that it cannot cease to be even for the briefest moment, as it is a thing subsistent in itself.

B I shall indeed say nothing to you on this matter except what I find said clearly and without any ambiguity in the Scriptures, openly contradicted by no other text. Together with almost everyone else, you have indeed acquired this idea, that the human soul cannot perish, from the philosophers – whom I do not wish to have as my masters, when I already have the Holy Scriptures. Nevertheless, if you offer me some passage from the Holy Scriptures where an immortality is attributed to the human soul, other than that which is given to men under the description 'eternal life', I too shall agree with the philosophers. But if you offer those passages where God threatens the reprobate with eternal tortures, you will not be able to infer from them that the souls of those people have existed between the day they died and the day of judgement, but only after the day of judgement. Besides, from the justice of God, who has threatened sinners with eternal tortures, you cannot argue for the eternity of those tortures themselves. For even if that man is unjust who does not render the good that is owed, nevertheless he who does not render harm or evil when it is due is not unjust, but merciful. How much less will God, who is infinitely merciful, be unable, without violating his own justice, to moderate both the length and the severity of deserved punishments? Again, Scripture says (Rev. 20) 'Hell itself will be cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death.'[ah] Thus the reprobate will rise again, it seems, to a second death. Finally, if the soul is not the same as life, but is rather a substance, existing in itself distinct from the body, and is also the essence or nature of a man, it seems to follow that, with the addition of the divine nature, there are three natures in Christ, which is contrary to the Faith.

A Even if it cannot be demonstrated from Scripture that the human soul is a substance separate from the body, nevertheless it does not seem possible to demonstrate the opposite from Scripture.

[ah] Rev. 20: 14.

A. Videtur ergo homo post Resurrectionem habiturus duas animas rationales, nimirum illam qua resurgit, alteram quae in morte à corpore separata, migravit in Coelum, vel Limbum, vel Purgatorium, vel Infernum. Dicunt enim omnes animam humanam nunquam interire postquam semel creata est, ne minimo quidem momento, ut rem in se subsistentem, desinere esse.

B. Ego vero nihil super hac re tibi dicam, nisi quod reperio dictum disertè, & sine omni ambiguitate in Scripturis, nulloque alio textu [335] apertè contradicente. Tu quidem una cum caeteris ferè omnibus, quod anima humana interire non potest, habes à Philosophis, quos ego post Scripturas Sacras Magistros mihi non desidero. Veruntamen si locum aliquem mihi attuleris ex Scripturis Sacris ubi alia attribuitur animae humanae immortalitas, praeter illam quae hominibus sub nomine aeternae vitae data est, ego etiam sentiam cum Philosophis. Verum si attuleris loca illa quibus comminatur Deus reprobis aeternos cruciatus, non inde poteris colligere animas eorum inter diem mortis, & diem judicii, sed tantum post diem judicii extitisse. Praeterea à Iustitia Dei qui cruciatus aeternos peccatoribus comminatus est, arguere aeternitatem ipsorum cruciatuum non potes. Etsi enim qui bona, quae debentur, non praestat, injustus sit, is tamen qui mala vel damna debita non praestat injustus non est, sed misericors. Quanto minus Deus, qui est infinitè misericors non poterit sine justitiae suae violatione mitigare tum diuturnitatem tum acerbitatem meritarum poenarum? Deinde Scriptura dicit (Apocal. cap. 20.) Ipsum Infernum conjectum iri in lacum ignis, quae est secunda mors.[ah] Resurgent ergo reprobi, ut videtur, ad secundam mortem. Denique si anima non sit idem, quod Vita, sed substantia in se existens distincta à corpore, eademque hominis essentia, sive natura, sequi videtur addita natura divina tres esse in Christo naturas, quod est contra Fidem.

A. Etsi ex Scriptura demonstrari non possit Animam humanam substantiam esse separatam à corpore, non videtur tamen ex Scriptura demonstrari posse contrarium.

B Then let us see what agreement there is between both the Old and the New Testaments concerning the nature of the human soul. For as the previous articles are of special importance to theologians, this article concerning the resurrection to eternal life is of special importance to all Christians, because in it lies all their hope, after the afflictions of this life, and all the joy they expect. God said to Adam in Paradise (where there were two trees excelling all the rest, namely, the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil), 'In the day that thou eatest of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt die, by dying.'[ai] But the Devil said to Eve: it is forbidden for you to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, lest you become like Gods. Now, both Adam and Eve, led on by ambition, believed the serpent, and did not believe God; they ate of the forbidden fruit, and therefore God expelled them both from Paradise, lest they put forth their hands to the tree of life and live for ever.[aj]

A I understand from this that Adam could have lived for ever as a result of eating the fruit of the tree of life, and that he was created immortal not in his own nature, but only by virtue of the tree of life. I understand, further, that the punishment inflicted on Adam for violating the divine command was mortality, which followed necessarily from the fact that he had lost the thing without which he could not live for ever. I see that these obvious facts are in the holy text. But I do not see why Adam did not die (in accordance with the words of the divine threat) as soon as he had eaten, but lived for more than nine hundred years.[ak]

B God did not simply say 'thou shalt die', but 'thou shalt die, by dying' – that is, when you die you will die, that is, you will not return to life, but will be dead in perpetuity. That is how Athanasius explains the passage,[al] and he does so correctly; for it is an idiom of the Hebrews. From which we may understand that that threat also concerned Adam's posterity, that is, the human race. And hence it is that the Apostle Paul says, 'By one man's sin death entered into the world';[am] from which it follows that not only the rest of mankind, but Adam too, needed to make use of the benefit of Jesus Christ's death, for the eternal life which by his own fault he had lost.

A Why so?

B. Videamus ergo quid Scriptura dicit tum in veteri tum in novo Testamento de natura animae humanae, Harmonicè. Ut enim articuli praecedentes praecipui sint apud Theologos, articulus tamen hic de Resurrectione ad vitam aeternam praecipuus est apud Christianos universos, quia in illo omnis eorum post praesentis vitae afflictiones collocatur spes, & praesumptum gaudium. Dixit Deus ad Adamum in Paradiso (ubi erant duae prae caeteris arbores excellentes, nempe Arbor Vitae, & Arbor Cognitionis Boni & Mali) quo die comederis de fructu Arboris Cognitionis Boni & Mali, moriendo morieris.[ai] Diabolus autem ad Evam dixit, Prohibetur vobis ne comedatis de fructu Arboris Cognitionis Boni & Mali, ne fiatis sicut Dii. Ambo autem Adamus & Eva ambitione ducti, Serpenti crediderunt, Deo non crediderunt, & de fructu vetito comederunt, itaque Deus utrumque à Paradiso expulit, ne manum ad Arborem Vitae extenderent, & viverent in aeternum.[aj] [336]

A. Intelligo hinc Adamum ex esu fructus Arboris vitae vivere potuisse in aeternum, ac fuisse creatum non sua natura, sed tantummodo virtute Arboris Vitae immortalem. Praeterea, poenam violati Praecepti Divini Adamo inflictam fuisse mortalitatem, quae necessario consequebatur ab eo quod illud perdiderit sine quo vivere in aeternum non potuit. Haec manifesta inesse in Sacro textu video. Sed non video, quare Adamus (secundum verba comminationis divinae) non statim ac comedisset mortuus sit, sed vixit plusquam nongentos annos.[ak]

B. Deus non dixit simpliciter Morieris, sed Moriendo Morieris, id est, cum Morieris Morieris, id est, non revivisces, sed mortuus perpetuò eris. Sic explicat locum Athanasius,[al] & rectè; nam Idioma est Hebraeorum. Ex quo intelligitur comminationem illam pertinere etiam ad Adami posteritatem, id est, ad genus humanum. Atque hinc est quod dicit Apostolus Paulus per peccatum unius hominis mors intravit in mundum,[am] unde sequitur non modo caeteros homines, verùm etiam Adamum ipsum necessitatem habuisse utendi beneficio mortis Iesu Christi ad vitam aeternam quam perdiderat sua culpa.

A. Quid ita?

2 Ut] Vtut 70 14 esu this edn.] usu 68, 70 21 nongentos 68-Errata] nonaginta 68

[ai] Gen. 2: 17. When he cited this in Ch. 38 (above, p. 701) Hobbes used the phrase given in Vulg, 'morte morieris' ('thou shalt die of death'); here he adapts the phrase given in the interlinear literal translation (by Sante Pagnino, revised by Benito Arias Montano) of the Hebrew in the London Polyglot Bible (Biblia sacra polyglotta, i, p. 8), 'moriendo morieris' ('thou shalt die, by dying', or: 'in dying, thou shalt die').

[aj] Gen. 3: 5–6, 22–4. [ak] Gen. 5: 5.

[al] Athanasius, Sermon on the Incarnation of the Word (PG xxv, col. 101). [am] This adapts Rom. 5: 12.

B Because St Paul says (1 Cor. 15: 22), harmonizing the Old and New Testaments, 'As in Adam all are dead, so in Christ shall we all be made alive. Every man in his own body: Christ the firstfruits: afterward they that are Christ's, at Christ's coming. Then cometh the end', etc.[an]

A Christ's coming will be the same as the day of judgement. So only on the day of judgement itself, not before it, will anyone come to life again. Therefore I think that Adam must certainly be saved, but he will not receive life before the last day. Meanwhile, how may he be said to live? If by means of his soul, in heaven, Adam will be living before he is animated [again], his soul (if only it is a living substance) will also be living without the body being animated, which is a very hard thing to say. As for the souls of those men who are living on earth at the day of judgement, those same souls will be raised to the clouds and from there to heaven; they will have spiritual bodies, and those bodies will be animated by spiritual souls (if indeed souls are substances existing in themselves). Now what will the difference be between those two spiritual entities, body and soul?

B To me, indeed, the difference is inexplicable, unless it be granted that eternal life begins for men only from the resurrection, and that life and the soul are the same thing, since nowhere in the Holy Scriptures are they clearly distinguished. As for those words of Christ on the cross to the robber, 'Today thou shalt be with me in Paradise',[ao] and his words to the Disciples, 'I am the tree of life',[ap] what is their purpose, if not to let the faithful know that the flaming sword has been removed from the gates of Paradise,[aq] and that, by means of Christ's sacrifice, the way has been laid open to the tree of life, that is, to eternal life? What need, then, does a pious man have to attribute his immortality to his creation, that is, to his nature, rather than to his redemption?

A But I am swayed by the agreement of all those in the past and the present who – even though they have been ignorant of sacred doctrine – have believed that the rational soul is immortal by its own nature, from the moment of its creation.

B Indeed, I do not disparage those who think so. For someone who thinks highly of his own soul takes care, usually, not to dishonour it by a base life. But I do not grant that he will take less care about that if he firmly believes that his soul is redeemed and made eternal by the blood of Christ. Nor should

B. Quia dicit S. Paulus 1 Cor. 15, 22, (quae est harmonia veteris & novi Testamenti) Sicut in Adamo omnes mortui sunt, ita in Christo omnes vivificamur. Vnusquisque in proprio corpore. Primitiae Christus. Deinde illi qui sunt Christi, in adventu Christi. Deinde finis &c.[an]

A. Adventus Christi erit idem cum die Iudicii. Nemo ergo reviviscet ante diem Iudicii, sed in illo ipso die. Adamum ergo certè salvandum esse puto, nec tamen vitam recipiet ante diem ultimum. Intereà quomodo dicetur vivere? Si per animam in coelo vivet Adamus antequàm est animatus, & anima ejus (si modo sit substantia vivens) vivet non animato corpore, quod valde durum est dicere. Animae autem hominum eorum, qui in die Iudicii in terra vivent, eaedem animae elevabuntur ad nubes & inde ad coelum, corpora habebunt spiritualia eademque animata animis (si quidem animae sint substantiae in se existentes) spiritualibus. Quaenam ergo erit differentia illa inter duo illa Entia Spiritualia Corpus & Animam.

B. Mihi quidem differentia illa inexplicabilis est nisi concedatur vitam aeternam hominibus non incipere nisi à resurrectione, & vitam & animam eandem esse rem, cum in Scripturis Sacris nusquam apertè distinguantur. Verba autem illa Christi in Cruce ad latronem, Hodie mecum eris in Paradiso,[ao] & illa ad Discipulos, ego sum Arbor Vitae,[ap] [337] quorsum spectant, nisi ut sciant fideles amotum esse à porta Paradisi gladium illum flammantem,[aq] & per Sacrificium Christi patefactam viam esse ad Arborem Vitae, id est, ad Vitam aeternam. Quid ergò opus est pio homini immortalitatem suam Creationi, id est naturae potius quam redemptioni attribuere?

A. Sed commoveor consensu omnium, qui fuere & sunt credentium animam rationalem immortalem esse, sua natura simul atque est creata, quamvis ignari doctrinae Sacrae.

B. Equidem illos, qui sic sentiunt, non vitupero. Nam qui praeclarè sentit de anima propria, cavet plerumque ne illam per vitae turpitudinem dedecoret. Caeterum non concedo, illum minùs cavere idem, qui constanter credit animam suam redemptam esse per sanguinem Christi, & factam aeter-

[an] Correctly: 1 Cor. 15: 22–4. As above (see note af), Hobbes seems to cite from memory, giving his own translation from English; 'all are dead' here is 'moriuntur' ('all die') in Vulg and Beza, and 'all die' in AV.
[ao] Luke 23: 43.
[ap] This phrase does not occur in the New Testament. Hobbes is perhaps thinking of John 6: 35 ('I am the bread of life') and 11: 25 ('I am the resurrection, and the life').
[aq] Cf. Gen. 3: 24.

one grant you that that opinion was and is held by all men universally. For those who have said in their hearts, 'let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die',[ar] were not of that opinion, and they are not few. Besides, the opinions of all those who follow the dictates of their masters without using their own reasoning are not properly their own opinions. So one should not say that that opinion is held by peasants, workmen, and other people who, being kept busy by ordinary life, usually give almost no thought to the nature of their souls, thinking rather about getting riches and honours, or their own bodily necessities. So that agreement of all people is reduced to the agreement of philosophers only. Then again, among the philosophers there were the Sadducees, who did not believe that there were any created spirits at all,[as] and therefore did not recognize any existence of the soul other than that existence which is called life. And the followers of Aristotle and Plato believed it not through an examination of the arguments, but only on the authority of their masters; so they should not be reckoned as the authors of the opinion which they profess. Consequently, those whom you call all people are reduced to Plato, Aristotle, and a few other leading figures in philosophy. Lastly, let us consider the words of Ecclesiastes, chapter 3, towards the end. The [Latin] interlinear version in the Polyglot Bible is: 'I said in my heart, concerning the words of the sons of Adam (to cleanse them, God, and to see what they are, an animal for itself) that the end of the sons of Adam and the end of an animal is one. That one dies just as the other dies. And there is one spirit in all, and no superiority of a man above an animal. For all is vanity, everything going to one place. Who is there that knows, the spirit itself of the sons of man ascending on high, and the spirit itself of a beast descending below the earth?'[at] Where, for 'to cleanse them', the Septuagint translation has διακρίνει, and for 'concerning the words', περὶ λαλιὰς.[au] So the meaning of those words is, 'Concerning what men say about God, that he will make an essential difference between the life of a man and the life of a beast, I have said this: since the end of a man and of a beast is the same, and since a man does not have any superiority by his essence over a beast, how will it be proved that the soul of a man will ascend, and the soul of a beast will descend?' But the same Eccle-

Hobbes cites here, in a slightly altered form, the interlinear translation (by Sante Pagnino, revised by Benito Arias Montano) given in the London Polyglot Bible (Biblia sacra polyglotta, iii, p. 404). The original, which matches the Hebrew word for word, is: 'Dixi ego in corde meo, Super verbum filiorum Adam, ad purgandos eos Deus & ad videndum quòd ipsi animal ipsi sibi Quia eventus filiorum Adam, & eventus animalis, & eventus unus eis sicut mori istud, sic mori illum, & spiritus unus omnibus siastes often asserts, in the same book, the day of the last judgement.[av] This is a great argument against that agreement which you call the agreement of all people. Otherwise (lest I should seem obstinate to you), give me a demonstration out of Aristotle, or Plato, or any other philosopher, by which he proves the immortality of the soul from natural principles as plainly as I have demonstrated from the Holy Scriptures that there will be an eternity of life for the elect, acquired through Christ, and I shall yield. The soul (they say) thinks, remembers, and reasons. What if, denying this, I say that it is the animal itself that thinks and remembers? How will they refute me? What is it to reason, if not to impose names on things, join names into statements, and link statements in syllogisms? From these comes dialectic. In Paradise, before Adam imposed names, how was he more rational than the other animals, except merely potentially? So it seems to me that men are not substantially distinguished from beasts by virtue of the fact that the former dispute and the latter do not. Let others await whatever kind of immortality they wish; I await that immortality which Christ, having defeated death, acquired for us by his blood.

Non ergò ita sentire dici debent agricolae, artifices, aliique homines qui circa vitam communem occupati, numquam fere de natura animae suae, sed de divitiis & honoribus comparandis, vel de necessitatibus suorum corporum cogitare solent. [au] The verb διακρίνω means to 'separate', 'distinguish'; λαλιά means 'chatter, babble'. The London Polyglot Bible prints the Septuagint text on the same page, with a Latin version of it, in which these terms are translated as 'separabit' and 'loquela' (ibid., iii, p. 404).

A What do you think about the expression 'God-bearer' which very many give to the Holy Virgin?[aw]

B It seems to me that a woman can correctly be said to 'bear' what she brings forth in childbirth.[ax] But she brought forth Christ, God and human being, because his assumption of human nature was accomplished in the womb. So she bore both God and human being. However, she engendered only the human being, without the seed of a man; the power of a man's seed was supplied instead by God.

A But here a new difficulty arises, namely, how the son of Mary, that is, the flesh of Christ, is not of the divine substance.

B Not even the flesh of a human being begotten by a human being is of the substance of its begetter, unless you believe that what is born is made from the seed as from its matter. The woman's blood is the only matter of the foetus, growing as it is nourished every day until it reaches the stage of being ready for birth. The seed in the womb is the efficient cause of fertility; it is not the matter of the foetus.[ay] So if you believe that a woman can become pregnant by the power of human seed, why do you doubt that the same thing can happen by the power of almighty God?

diei ultimi in eodem libro saepe asserit.[av] Magnum hoc argumentum est contra consensum illum, quem dicis omnium hominum. Praeterea (ne obstinatus tibi videar) demonstrationem ex Aristotele, aut Platone profer vel ex alio quocunque Philosopho, quâ naturalem animae immortalitatem, tam apertè concludit ex principiis naturalibus, quam apertè ego ex Scripturis Sacris demonstravi futuram Electis aeternitatem vitae per Christum acquisitam, acquiescam. Anima (inquiunt) cogitat, meminit, ratiocinatur. Quid si hoc negans, dixero esse ipsum animal quod cogitat, & meminit? Quomodo refutabunt? Ratiocinari quid est, nisi rebus imponere nomina, nomina connectere in Dicta, Dicta conjungere in Syllogismos? Ab his fit Dialectica. Quomodo erat in Paradiso Adam, ante nomina ab ipso imposita, rationalis magis quam caetera animalia, nisi potentia tantùm? 16 Deipara] Deiparae 70

[av] Some kind of divine judgement is referred to in Eccles. 3: 16–17; 11: 9; 12: 14.

[aw] The term 'Deipara' was formed as the Latin version of θεοτόκος ['God-bearer'], which acquired a doctrinal significance at the Council of Ephesus (431): against Nestorius, who said that Mary bore the human nature of Christ, the Council decreed that she bore Christ as God (with his divine and human natures united in one person).

[ax] 'Pario' here ('bear'), the verb for the production of a child by its mother, could have connotations of 'producing' that went beyond merely 'bearing'; used of a father, the verb meant to beget.

[ay] Cf. Aristotle, Generation of Animals, I.21 (729b1–21).

A Since the substance of God exists equally in all flesh, will not this argument of yours prove that all other people too have, just like Christ, a human and a divine nature?

B Hardly. For even though God is everywhere omnipotent, doing everywhere whatever he wants to every creature, nevertheless he does not everywhere do whatever he is able to do. In the generating of a human being from a human being, he willed from eternity that there should be produced just a human being, who cannot do everything he wants to do. But in the generating of a human being supernaturally, by means of the Holy Spirit, he willed from eternity to produce a human being who could do everything he might want to do, that is, both a human being and God. And there is no place here for asking 'how?' – because not only Christians, but also all the heathen, believe in the omnipotence of him whom they believe to be God, and they do not ask how he begets those whom they say he has begotten.

A Thus far, you have explained the doctrine of the Nicene Creed in such a way that you seem to me not to have shaken the Christian faith in any way, but rather to have strengthened it – albeit in your own way. Show me, now, what it is that the Greeks call 'hypostasis'.

B When you look at something that you call 'white', you impose that name on a substance, or an underlying body, such as marble, even though your eyesight cannot penetrate the substance of the marble or of any other entity whatsoever. Therefore 'white' is a name of the body which subsists by itself, not of the colour; and it is imposed because of a certain definite appearance, or, as the Greeks say, ἔμφασις, or φάντασμα,[az] which does indeed seem to be something, but is in reality nothing. We understand well enough that that appearance cannot be without some cause and foundation – in other words, that 'white' cannot exist unless there is in reality some substance that stands under the appearance itself, being its cause and (as logicians say) its subject. The Greeks call this subject τὸ ὄν [the entity], ὑφιστάμενον [that which is placed under], or ὑποστάς [standing under], and ὑπόστασις [substance]; the Latins call it 'ens' [entity], 'subjectum' [subject], 'suppositum' [underlying thing], 'substantia' [substance], 'basis' [basis], and 'fundamentum' [foundation]. Now, what I have said about perception by sight is also to be understood of the other senses. For the 'hypostasis' is opposed to the phantasm as a cause to its effect, that is, relatively. Similarly, if there are three relative things, such as father, son, and grandson, even though the son is one real entity, he has two names on account of his different relations – one is the name of 'father', because he has begotten, and the other is the name of 'son', because he has been begotten. So the son, as the one in the middle, although he is only one entity, has two names which are themselves said to have been imposed or 'placed on' him ['imposita'], but the entity itself is the thing 'placed under' ['suppositum'] the two names – in other words, the ὑφιστάμενον [that which is placed under], 'hypostasis', or foundation of the relation. Thus 'hypostasis' can be applied not only to phantasms but also to names.

A. Nonne tua hac ratione, cum Dei substantia in omni carne aequaliter existat, probabitur etiam omnes alios homines habere utramque naturam humanam & divinam sicut Christus? [339]

B. Minimè. Etsi enim Deus sit ubique omnipotens, faciens ubique omnia quae vult in omni creatura, non tamen ubique facit quicquid potest. In generatione hominis ab homine voluit ab aeterno produci tantùm hominem, qui omnia facere quae vult non potest; at in generatione hominis supernaturali modo, per Spiritum Sanctum, voluit ab aeterno producere hominem qui facere posset omnia quae vellet, id est Hominem & Deum. Neque locus hîc ullus est quaerendi Quomodo; quia non modo Christiani, sed etiam Gentes omnes quem credunt esse Deum, eundem credunt esse omnipotentem; nec requirunt, quomodo gignat, quem genuisse dicunt.

A What is the difference between ὑφιστάμενον, ὑποστάς, and ὑπόστασις?

B There is no difference between the first two, except that the second means 'standing under' and the first means 'standing under now'. For both of them, the Greeks generally use the word 'hypostasis', and the Latins 'substantia' [substance] or 'essentia' [essence]; the Latin Fathers do not make a distinction between those two terms, as is clear from Peter Lombard.[ba]

A What is the word 'hypostasis' taken to mean in the New Testament?

B The same that it is taken to mean by other writers. As in Heb. 1: 3, where Christ is called 'the imprint of the hypostasis of God'.[bb] For the 'hypostasis' is there opposed to the imprint, that is, the substance is opposed to the image of that same substance. In the same passage he is also called 'the brightness of the divine glory',[bc] or (what is the same thing) light from the luminous, for the luminous is the substance or subject of light. Then in Heb. 11: 1 faith is called 'the hypostasis of those things for which we hope',[bd] that is (for the expression is metaphorical), faith is the foundation of hope. Thirdly, in 2 Cor. 9: 4 the Apostle Paul, who had boasted to the Macedonians of the good-will promised to him by the Corinthians, calls that promise the hypostasis of his boasting,[be] that is, its foundation.

A What does 'essence' mean?

B The Fathers did not make a distinction (as I said) between 'essence' and 'substance'.

ut causa effectui, nempe relativè. Similiter si sint tria relativa, ut Pater, Filius, & nepos, ubi Filius per diversam relationem, etsi unum Ens reale, habet duo nomina, alterum Patris, quia genuit; alterum Filii, quia genitus est. Filius ergo ut medius, quanquam unum tantum sit Ens, habet duo nomina quae ipsi dicuntur Imposita, ipsum autem Ens est duorum nominum Suppositum, sive ὑφιστάμενον, Hypostasis, Fundamentum Relationis. Itaque Hypostasis non modo ad Phantasmata referri potest, sed etiam ad Nomina.

A. Quaenam est differentia inter ὑφιστάμενον & ὑποστάν & ὑπόστασιν?

B. Inter duo priora differentia alia nulla est, nisi quod hoc Subsistens, illud nunc Subsistens significet. Pro iisdem autem utuntur Graeci plerumque voce Hypostasis, & Latini voce Substantia vel Essentia, [340] inter quas Patres Latini non distinguunt, ut constat ex Petro Lombardo.[ba]

A. Quomodo accipitur vox Hypostasis in Testamento novo?

B. Eodem modo, quo accipitur à Scriptoribus caeteris. Ut Heb. 1. 3, ubi Christus dicitur Character Hypostaseos Dei.[bb] Nam Hypostasis ibi opponitur characteri, id est Substantia imagini ejusdem Substantiae. Dicitur etiam eodem loco splendor gloriae divinae,[bc] sive (quod idem est) lumen de lucido, nam lucidum est Substantia sive Subjectum luminis. Deinde Heb. 11. 1. Fides vocatur Hypostasis earum rerum quas speramus,[bd] id est (nam dictio metaphorica est) Fides est Fundamentum Spei. Tertio 2 Cor. 9. 4. ubi Paulus Apostolus, qui benevolentiam Corinthiorum promissam apud Macedonas jactaverat, promissionem illam appellat jactationis suae Hypostasin,[be] id est, Fundamentum.

A. Quid significat Essentia?

B. Patres (ut dixi) non distinguunt Essentiam à Substantia.

[ba] See below, note bs. [bb] AV: 'the express image of his person'.
[be] AV: 'this same confident boasting' (where 'hypostasis' is taken to mean 'confidence').

A So what is 'substance'?

B The same as 'entity', that is, anything that is truly existent, distinguished from a phantasm or a name.

A So what need did the Greeks and Latins have to distort names that were sufficiently well known and understood into uncertain names, for which no equivalent is found in Hebrew, and which are not necessary in any language?

B When names are distorted, as when the word οὐσία [essence] is made from ὄν [entity or: that which is], or ὑπόστασις [substance] from ὑφιστάμενον [that which is placed under], or 'essentia' [essence] from 'ens' [entity], or 'substantia' [substance] from 'substans' [standing under], or 'albedo' [whiteness] from 'album' [white thing], the philosophers call that distortion 'abstraction', and for that reason the name ὄν is called 'concrete' and the name οὐσία 'abstract'; 'ens' [entity] is called 'concrete', and 'essentia' [essence] 'abstract'; 'album' [white thing] is called 'concrete', and 'albedo' [whiteness] 'abstract'. But sometimes they use an infinitive verb instead of an abstract term: as when the Greeks say τὸ εἶναι [to be] instead of οὐσία [essence], or the Latins 'esse' [to be] instead of 'essentia' [essence]; the Greeks say τὸ εἶναι λευκόν [to be white] instead of λευκότης [whiteness], or even τὸ λευκόν [the white], applying the article τὸ not to λευκόν, but to the implied term ὄνομα [name]. Likewise, from the concrete term 'vivens' [living] the Latins make as an abstract term not only 'vita' [life], but also 'vivere' [to live]. These terms can be called abstract, without absurdity. For when people have imposed different names (on account of different appearances) on a truly existing thing, calling the same thing 'large', 'coloured', 'hard', and 'heavy', they are sometimes considering the fact that that thing is 'of such a size' (which is how geometers consider it), and sometimes the fact that it is 'coloured', or 'hard', or 'heavy' (which is how physicists consider it). That is why, in order to distinguish one phantasm (the cause of which is understood to exist concretely) from all the other phantasms of the same thing, they designate the thing by some distortion of names, so that they no longer say 'large', 'coloured', 'hard', or 'heavy', but rather say 'magnitude', 'colour', 'hardness', and 'heaviness'. This abstraction of terms is more or less necessary for the teaching of causes (since it is nothing other than the consideration of a phantasm or a name, set apart from all the other considerations or names of the same concrete thing). If you

A. Quid ergo est Substantia?

B. Idem quod Ens, id est quicquid est verè Existens, distinctum à Phantasmate, & Nomine.

A. Quid ergo opus erat Graecis & Latinis detorquere Nomina satis cognita & intellecta in nomina incerta, quorum aequivalentia in lingua Hebraea non inveniuntur, neque in ulla lingua sunt necessaria?

B. Quando Nomina detorquentur, ut cum fit à voce ὄν, οὐσία; ab ὑφιστάμενον, ὑπόστασις, ab Ente, Essentia; à Substans, Substantia; ab Album, Albedo; Detorsio illa à Philosophis dicitur Abstractio propterea nomen ὄν Concretum οὐσία Abstractum; Ens Concretum, Essentia Abstractum; Album Concretum, Albedo Abstractum appellatur. Aliquando autem pro voce Abstracta utuntur verbo infinitivo; ut cum pro οὐσία Graeci dicunt τὸ εἶναι; Latini pro Essentia, Esse; Graeci pro λευκότης, τὸ εἶναι λευκόν, vel etiam τὸ λευκόν, articulum τὸ referentes non ad λευκόν, sed ad subauditum ὄνομα. Item Latini à Concreto Vivens, Abstractum faciunt non modo Vita, sed etiam Vivere. Quae voces Abstractae dici possunt, nec absurdè. Cum enim Rei verè existenti nomina (propter apparitiones diversas) diversa imposuerint, vocantes eandem rem magnam, coloratam, duram, gravem, considerant in illa re aliquando quod tanta est (quae est consideratio Geometrarum) aliquando quod colorata, vel dura, vel gravis est, (quae consideratio est Physicorum.) Et propterea ad distinctionem Phantasmatis cujus causam in Concreto esse intelligunt, ab omnibus aliis Phantasmatibus ejusdem rei, detorsione aliqua nominum ita rem signant, ut non jam Magnam, coloratam, duram, gravem dicant, [341] sed magnitudinem, colorem, duritiem, gravitatem dicant. Quae vocum abstractio (cum nihil aliud sit quam Phantasmatis vel Nominis, ab aliis omnibus ejusdem concreti considerationibus, & nominibus separata consid-understand these matters correctly, you will also understand that it is impossible for the essence of any entity to exist separately from the entity itself, in other words, that there should be a white thing where there is no whiteness, or whiteness where there is no white thing, or a human being where there is no humanity; and that Aristotle's assertion is false, that 'some essences exist in separation from those things of which they are the essences',[bf] and hence that the soul either is not (as he says) the essence of the animal, or does not exist when the animal is dead; and that, consequently, Aristotle was wrong to make no distinction between separate things and separate considerations of the same thing.

A I understand that abstract terms are more or less necessary for investigating the causes of apparent things, ones existing only in our imaginations; but the name 'essence', taken simply, was not imposed on account of a phantasm we have, in the way that 'magnitude', 'colour', etc., were, which have their causes in the five organs of sense. For (as you said earlier) the substance itself or the entity itself does not appear, but only the effects of it appear, and are called phantasms; and the essence of the entity, taken simply, is not a phantasm. So what is 'essence' or 'being' ['esse'] (whenever the latter is used as a name), and of what thing is it the name?

B The 'essence' of an entity, taken concretely – for example, of the entity 'a white thing' – is a name of the white thing itself, but considered insofar as it is white. For the same reason, the 'essence' of an entity taken simply is a name of the entity, but considered simply insofar as it is an entity; and, in general, abstract names are the names of concrete things, when they are considered apart from the other names of the same concrete thing. For example, 'white' is [the name of] a white entity. If, in the case of a white entity, we now consider 'white' apart from the entity, we shall say (for theory's sake) 'whiteness', or 'to be white', instead of 'white'.

A So when we say 'essence' instead of an entity taken simply, 'essence' and 'entity' will be synonyms, and consequently the term 'essence' is superfluous.

eratio) ad doctrinam causarum ferè necessaria est. Haec si rectè intelligas, intelligis etiam impossibile esse, ut Essentia ullius Entis separata existat ab ipso Ente, nempe ut ibi sit Album ubi non est Albedo, aut Albedo ubi non est Album, aut Homo ubi non est Humanitas, falsumque esse quod asserit Aristoteles, Essentias aliquas existere ab illis rebus separatas, quarum illae sunt Essentiae,[bf] & proinde Animam vel non esse (ut ille dicit) Essentiam animalis, aut mortuo animali non existere; & per consequens errâsse Aristotelem eò quod non distinxerit inter separatas res, & separatas ejusdem rei considerationes.

A. Intelligo voces abstractas ad causas rerum apparentium, nec nisi in imaginatione nostra existentium indagandas, necessarias ferè esse; sed nomen Essentia simpliciter, non impositum erat propter Phantasma nostrum, sicut magnitudo, color, &c. quae causam habent in quinque organis sensuum. Nam (ut dixisti supra) non ipsa Substantia sive ipsum Ens, sed tantummodo effectus ejus apparent, & appellantur Phantasmata; Essentia autem Entis simpliciter, Phantasma non est. Quid ergo est Essentia vel Esse (quoties usurpatur ut nomen); cujus rei nomen est?

B. Essentia Entis in concreto, puta Entis Albi, est nomen ipsius Albi, sed considerati quatenus Albi. Eadem ratione Essentia Entis simpliciter est nomen Entis, sed considerati simpliciter quatenus Ens; & in universum, abstracta sunt nomina concretorum, quando considerantur seorsim à caeteris nominibus ejusdem concreti. Album (verbi gratia) est Ens Album. Si jam in Ente Albo consideremus Album seorsim ab Ente, dicimus pro Albo (doctrinae causa) Albedinem, vel esse Album.

A. Quando ergo pro Ente simpliciter dicimus Essentiam, erunt Essentia & Ens Synonima, & per consequens vox Essentia superflua est.

17 nomen); this edn.] nomen) cujus 68, 70

B I would go further and say that it is in fact inconsistent with the truth of the Faith. Witness John Damascene, in ch. 11 of his Exposition of the Faith, where, having said that 'the Word was made man', he added: 'but we have in no way heard it said that godhead was either made flesh or made man'.[bg] So it is evident that in an entity taken simply there is no[bh] difference between 'entity' and 'essence', and much more so in concrete things.

A What reason did the Doctors have for asserting that unless 'entity' and 'essence' were the same in God, the divine substance would be composite?

B Because the definition, which is the explanation of the essence of the thing defined, is commonly called the essence itself by philosophers. Thus, if the definition of 'man' is 'a rational animal', they call 'rational animal' the essence, and say that it is composed of 'animal' and 'rational', as if they were its parts – not making a distinction between the definition of man (which is an expression, having as its parts the names 'animal' and 'rational'), and the man himself (whose parts are the head, breast,[bi] legs, and the other limbs). But since it is hard to call a rational animal, taken concretely, an 'essence', some people, in an attempt to soften that way of speaking, say that not 'rational animal' but the rational soul is the essence of a man, and that this is a substance existing separately from the human body. And thus they make the essence an integral, and at the same time an essential, part of the man himself.

A How wonderful are the conjuring tricks of vain philosophy! Tell me now, what is the true and proper meaning of 'person'?

B It is a Latin term, meaning any individual thing whatsoever that acts in whatsover way, either by its own will or by the will of another. Thus Cicero: 'I bear three persons, of myself, judge, and adversary.'[bj] What does this mean except that Cicero himself acted his own part, and the judge's part, and the adversary's? And what is the meaning of that passage in the Anglican catechism, where the minister asks, 'What dost thou chiefly learn in these articles of thy belief?, and the catechumen is to answer, 'First, I learn to believe in God the Father, who hath made me and all the world. Secondly, in his Son Jesus Christ, who hath redeemed me and all mankind. Thirdly, in the Holy Qui cum dixisset Verbum factum esse hominem, adjecit, Quod tamen Deitas aut incarnata aut humanata esset, nullo pacto audivimus.[bg] Manifestum ergò est, in Ente simpliciter non[bh] differre inter se Ens & Essentiam, & multo magis in concretis.

A. Quae causa erat Doctoribus affirmandi, quod nisi Ens & Essentia [342] in Deo idem essent, substantia divina esset composita?

B. Quia Definitio, quae est explicatio Essentiae Definiti vocatur vulgo à Philosophis ipsa Essentia. Ut, si definitio hominis sit animal rationale, Essentiam vocant animal rationale, & compositam esse dicunt ab animali & rationali, ut à suis partibus; non distinguentes inter Definitionem hominis (quae est Oratio habens pro partibus nomina animal, & rationale) & hominem ipsum (cujus partes sunt caput, bustum,[bi] crura, & reliqua membra.) Sed quoniam durum est animal rationale in concreto appellare Essentiam, nonnulli formulam illam loquendi mollire cupientes, non animal rationale sed animam rationalem, Essentiam hominis esse dicunt; eandemque Substantiam esse seorsim ab humano corpore existentem. Atque ita Essentiam faciunt partem ipsius hominis integrantem simulque Essentialem.

Quid etiam est id quod invenitur in Catechismo Anglicano, ubi Minister rogat, Quid ex Fidei tuae Articulis praecipuè discis? Catechumenus respondet: *Disco primò, credere in Deum Patrem, qui creavit me & universum mundum. [bh] The Latin lacks 'non' ('no'); it is supplied here, as Hobbes's argument seems to require it. He argues that the use of 'essence' to mean something different from the entity itself is both unnecessary and, in relation to the 'essence' of God, theologically wrong.

[bi] 68 has 'bustum', apparently an error by Hobbes, who was perhaps influenced by the Italian 'busto', meaning 'bust' or upper part of the body (a word which may have been derived from the Latin 'bustum' in the sense of 'sepulchral monument'; but the general meaning of 'bustum' is 'tomb'); 70 replaces it with 'thorax'.

[bj] Cicero, De oratore, II.102.

Ghost, who hath sanctified me and all the elect people of God'?[bk] It is, surely, that God created all things in his own person; in the person of his Son he redeemed mankind; and in the person of the Holy Spirit he sanctified the Church. What can be said about the divine persons more clearly than this, or more in conformity with the Faith? But if we use the term 'hypostasis' instead of 'person', as the Greek Fathers do, we shall – since 'hypostasis' and 'substance' mean the same thing – make three divine substances, that is, three Gods, instead of three persons. Bellarmino and almost all the other Doctors define a 'person' as an intelligent first substance,[bl] that is, an individual substance, that is, individual but intelligent – for example, God, Christ, the Holy Spirit, Gabriel, or Peter. But what are those three first substances, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, if not three divine substances? That, however, is contrary to the Faith. Bellarmino did not understand the force of the Latin term 'person'. If that term means 'first substance', would not πρόσωπον [person or: face] mean the same in Greek? But that is not true; for its proper meaning is a man's face, whether a natural face or an artificial one (a mask), or even a representative face, and that not only in the theatre but also in the law-court and in church. But what is a representative face, other than the image or imprint ['character'] of the person represented? And in that sense St Paul calls our Saviour (Heb. 1: 4)[bm] the imprint of the substance of God.

A But what does πρόσωπον mean in Holy Scripture?

B Properly, nothing other than the face or countenance. By synecdoche, however, it is sometimes used for the man himself, as in the term προσωπολημψία [acception of persons].[bn] But in the Creed of the Faith there is no mention either of 'person', or of 'hypostasis', or of the Trinity; and although 'hypostasis' is used in the Greek Athanasian Creed, that Athanasian Creed is accepted by the Church (without, however, the term 'hypostasis') only as a paraphase of the Nicene Creed. For neither the Creed, nor any one article of Faith whatsoever, could be established by the authority of individual Doctors, nor by the universal Church, except by way of interpreting the Holy Scriptures.

[bk] This is from the catechism given in the order of Confirmation in the 1559 Book of Common Prayer; Hobbes's wording varies in minor ways from the English original (of which it is his translation; it does not correspond to the official Latin version published in 1560): he gives 'his son Jesus Christ' instead of 'God the son', 'the holy Ghost' instead of 'God the holy Ghost', and 'hath sanctified' instead of 'sanctifieth'.

[bl] Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 2, 'De Christo', bk 2, ch. 4 (i, p. 388): '"Hypostasis" means a first [or: primary] substance, which we generally call the "suppositum" [underlying thing], and in the case of an intelligent nature we call it a "person"' ('Hypostasis significat primam substantiam, quam vniuersè dicimus suppositum, & in natura intelligente personam').

Quid hoc de Personis divinis clariùs, aut Fidei congruentiùs dici potest? Quod si pro Persona utamur voce Hypostasi cum patribus Graecis (cum Hypostasis & substantia idem significent) facimus pro tribus Personis tres Substantias divinas, id est tres Deos. Bellarminus & Doctores caeteri ferè omnes Personam definiunt esse Substantiam primam intelligentem,[bl] id est substantiam individuam, id est singularem, sed intelligentem, ut Deum, Christum, Spiritum Sanctum, Gabrielem, Petrum. Quid autem sunt tres illae Substantiae primae Pater, Filius, & Spiritus Sanctus, nisi tres Substantiae divinae? Quod tamen est contra Fidem. Non intellexit Bellarminus vim Latinae vocis Personae. Quae vox si significet primam Substantiam, nonne πρόσωπον significaret idem Graecè? Quod non est verum; nam significat propriè faciem hominis, tum naturalem, tum artificialem sive larvam, tum etiam faciem representativam, idque non modo in [343] Theatro, sed etiam in Foro, & Ecclesia. Facies autem representativa, quid aliud est quam Imago vel Character repraesentati? Atque eo sensu à Sancto Paulo Servator noster, Heb. 1, 4,[bm] appellatur Character Substantiae Dei.

A. Quid autem in Scriptura Sacra significat πρόσωπον?

B. Nihil propriè praeter faciem seu vultum. Synecdochicè autem aliquando ponitur pro ipso homine, ut in voce προσωπολησία.[bn] Sed in Symbolo Fidei, mentio nulla est, neque Personae, neque Hypostaseos, neque Trinitatis; etsi Hypostasis ponatur in Symbolo Athanasii Graeco, quod Symbolum Athanasii (sed sine voce Hypostasi) recipit Ecclesia non aliter, quam pro Fidei Nicenae paraphrasi. Nam neque Symbolum, neque Fidei articulus unus quicunque, authoritate Doctorum singularium, neque (nisi per modum interpretandi Scripturas Sacras) ab Ecclesia universa constitui potuit.

A So why have the old Fathers and many other more recent Doctors used those terms?

B Because they could not otherwise explain the words of the Holy Scripture, such as 'Go and baptize all nations in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit',[bo] or again the words of St John, 'There are three that bear witness in heaven, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit',[bp] and similar passages about the divinity of Christ.

A But why was it necessary at all to explain those things, which they themselves knew to be incomprehensible, that is, inexplicable?

B The Fathers of the Church do indeed profess, both before and after the Council of Nicaea, that the incarnation of the Son of God is incomprehensible; but they excuse themselves on the ground that they were forced by heretics to dispute about those things. Thus Epiphanius at the beginning of book 7 of De trinitate: 'For believers the word of God did indeed suffice, saying, "Go now and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." But we are compelled by the errors of heretics and blasphemers to do what is not lawful, and to utter what is inexpressible – and to fall into an error which is the opposite of those other people's error.'[bq] Also Bellarmino, in book 1 of De Christo: 'Our Doctors do not dispute philosophically in order to demonstrate the Trinity, but in order to refute the sophistries of the philosophers.'[br] And Lombard in book 1, distinction 23 (D), citing Augustine's De trinitate, book 7: 'The Greeks understand "substance" differently from the Latins. The Latins speak of one essence or substance, and three persons. For in our language "essence" should mean the same as "substance". However, this way of speaking was chosen so that we might understand, at least in a mystery, so that when it was asked what the three are, we should have something to say. So when it is asked what or who the three are, we apply ourselves to finding some name which might embrace those three, but none comes to mind; for the supereminence of the Divinity is beyond the power of ordinary speech.'[bs]

A. Cur ergò Patres veteres, & multi alii Doctores recentiores vocibus illis usi sunt?

B. Quia verba Scripturae Sacrae, nempe, Euntes Baptizate omnes gentes in nomine Patris, Filii, & Spiritus Sancti,[bo] item verba Sancti Iohannis, Tres sunt qui testimonium perhibent in coelis, Pater, Filius, & Spiritus Sanctus,[bp] & loca similia de divinitate Christi aliter explicare non potuerunt.

A. At cur omnino necesse erat ea explicare, quae sciebant ipsi incomprehensibilia, id est inexplicabilia esse?

20 Non aliter this edn.] Aliter 68, 70

[bo] Adapted from Matt. 28: 19.

[bp] 1 John 5: 7. (The Latin here is neither Vulg nor Beza; Hobbes apparently cites from memory, giving his own Latin version.) This is part of the 'Johannine comma', an explicit statement of Trinitarianism which was correctly identified by Erasmus as a later interpolation into the text of the epistle.

[bq] The reference to Epiphanius is an error. This is an abbreviated and altered quotation from Hilary of Poitiers (d. 368), De trinitate libri XII, II.1–2 (PL x, cols. 50–1). The biblical citation is Matt. 28: 19.

[br] Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 2, bk 1, ch. 14 (i, p. 370).

[bs] Hobbes's Latin here corresponds roughly to the original (Peter Lombard, Sententiarum liber quatuor, bk 1, dist. 23, sect. 4: PL clxxxxii, col. 584), with the omission of one long clause, and the mistaken omission of 'Non' from 'Non aliter in sermone nostro' (emended here). Peter Lombard's text (apart from the first sentence) roughly corresponds, in turn, to Augustine, De trinitate, VII.4 (PL xlii, col. 939).

A Epiphanius' excuse for himself is not correct. For no one can be compelled by another's error, without force or threats, to do that which is unlawful. And when Bellarmino says that his Doctors dispute philosophically not in order to demonstrate the Trinity, but in order to refute the sophistries of the philosophers, that is not true. For almost all of those theologians who have published expositions of the Nicene Creed use definitions borrowed from Aristotle's logic and metaphysics, when they should have demonstrated the Holy Trinity only from the Holy Scripture. I am also surprised that the Nicene Fathers, among whom there were so many philosophers, did not introduce into the Creed itself those words which they used in their explanations.

B To me that is really not surprising, when I consider that in great councils those who can boldly discourse and dispute are few. The rest, therefore, who approved only those arguments that were adduced from Holy Scripture, being more numerous than the disputers, easily prevailed with their votes, deciding that nothing should be brought into the Creed other than those things that were plainly inferred from the Scriptures.

A What is 'body', what is 'incorporeal', and what is 'spirit'?

B Those names have seemed to be so well known and understood by all learned people that I do not know whether any theologian or philosopher has deigned to explain them. You, then – what thing do you have an idea of in your mind when you utter that word 'body', or hear it uttered?

A By 'body' I now understand that thing of which it can truly be said that it really exists in itself, and also has some magnitude – I say, has magnitude, not that it is magnitude itself. But I remember thinking sometimes that 'body' was only that which presented itself to my touch or sight. Therefore I thought that an appearance of a body in a mirror, or in sleep, or in darkness, was (although I marvelled at this) also a body. But when I later considered that those appearances fade away, as if their existence depended not on themselves but on animate nature, they seemed to me no longer to be real, but to be phantasms and effects of things acting on the organs of sense – and therefore to be 'incorporeal'. But my opinion about spirits came from the air, which is a spirit, and from the wind, which I felt by touch; for that reason I thought that a spirit was indeed a body, but a tenuous one, and that some spirits could be more tenuous and purer than others, and that some could also differ from others in their powers, no less than liquids which, although they are equal-

A. Non rectè se excusat Epiphanius. Alieno enim vitio compelli ad faciendum id, quod est illicitum sine vi aut minis nemo potest. Et quod Bellarminus doctores suos Philosophicè disputare negat, ut ostendant Trinitatem, sed ut solvant Sophismata Philosophorum, non est verum. Utuntur enim Theologi illi qui Expositiones Symboli Niceni ediderunt, omnes ferè definitionibus desumptis ex Logica, & Metaphysica Aristotelis; cum Sanctam Trinitatem ex sola Scriptura Sacra ostendere debuerint. Miror etiam Nicenos Patres, cum tot essent inter illos Philosophi, verba illa artis quibus in explicationibus usi sunt in ipsum Symbolum non intulisse.

B. Mihi vero illud mirum non est, consideranti, Quod in Synodis magnis, qui audacter perorare & disputare possunt, pauci sint. Reliqui ergò, qui sola illa argumenta approbârunt, quae ex Sacra Scriptura allata erant (cum numero Disputatores superarent) facile suffragiis suis evicerunt, ut nihil in Symbolum admitteretur praeter ea, quae ex Scripturis apertè inferebantur.

A. Quid est Corpus, quid incorporeum, quid Spiritus?

B. Nomina illa ita eruditis omnibus cognita & intellecta visa sunt, ut nesciam an ullus aut Theologus aut Philosophus Definitionibus ea explicare dignatus sit. Tu ergò, cujus rei Ideam in animo habes, quando profers vel prolatum audis vocabulum illud Corpus?

A. Ego per Corpus intelligo nunc id de quo verè dici potest, quod existit realiter in seipso, habetque etiam aliquam magnitudinem, habet (inquam) magnitudinem, non quod sit magnitudo ipsa. Memini tamen quod Corpus putarem aliquando id solum esse, quod Tactui meo vel Visui obstaret. Itaque speciem quoque corporis in speculo, aut somno, aut tenebris apparentem, quanquam miratus, corpus tamen esse arbitrabar. Sed consideranti posteà Species illas evanescere, ut quarum existentia dependeret non à seipsis, sed à natura animata, non amplius mihi visae sunt reales, sed Phantasmata & effectus rerum in organa sensuum, agentium; & proinde esse incorporeas. De Spiritibus autem judicabam ex aëre qui Spiritus est, & vento quem Tactu sentiebam, & propterea Spiritum existimavi corpus quidem sed tenue esse, & Spiritus alios aliis esse posse tenuiores, puriores, & alios ab aliis differre posse etiam virtute, non minùs quàm liquores, qui quanquam sint transpar-ly transparent, nevertheless differ hugely from one another in their powers. But I could not conceive of an intermediate nature between body and spirit, or between spirit and phantasm (that is, between spirit and nothing). So we should enquire whether the Holy Scripture contains the phrase 'incorporeal substance', or 'immaterial substance', or 'separated essences'.

B Those expressions are not in Holy Scripture. On the other hand, in the first of the Thirty-Nine Articles of Religion published by the Church of England in 1562, is it expressly said, 'God is without body and without parts.'[bt] So it must not be denied. And the penalty decreed for those who do deny it is excommunication.

A It will not be denied. However, in the twentieth Article it says that nothing should be ordered to be believed by the Church that cannot be deduced from the Holy Scriptures.[bu] Would that it had been deduced! For I do not yet know in what sense something can be called 'greatest', or 'great', which is not a body. But tell me: what is the difference between 'to be begotten' and 'to proceed'?

B See Matt. 1: 20, where the angel speaks to Joseph and says, 'fear not to take unto thee Mary thy wife: for that which is begotten in her is of the Holy Ghost.'

A But I do not know whether that phrase 'is of the Holy Ghost' means 'is begotten of the Holy Ghost' or 'proceeds from the Holy Ghost'.

B This passage of Matthew is part of the Gospel for the Feast of Circumcision, where we read in the liturgy that was published in Latin under Edward VI, 'What is begotten in her has originated from the Holy Ghost', and this is translated by our Church as if it were 'comes from the Holy Ghost'.[bv] So you see how the Church of England has interpreted that passage – in my opinion, correctly.

A Why then, since the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Son (as in the Creed), and the Son (as in this text) proceeds from the Holy Spirit, and each is said to be 'begotten', there does not seem to be any difference at all between 'to be begotten', and 'to proceed'. For what purpose has the Roman Church distinguished between those terms?

entes aequè, virtutibus tamen inter se immanè discrepant. Naturam autem [345] mediam inter Corpus & Spiritum, aut Spiritum & Phantasma (id est inter Spiritum & Nihil) concipere non potui. Quaerendum ergo est, an in Scriptura Sacra reperiatur vox substantia incorporea, vel substantia immaterialis, vel essentiae separatae.

B. Voces illae in Scriptura Sacra non sunt. Caeterùm in primo ex 39 Articulis Religionis editis ab Ecclesia Anglicana Anno Domini 1562 expresse dicitur, Deum esse sine corpore & sine partibus.[bt] Itaque negandum non est. Poena etiam in negantes constituitur excommunicatio.

A. Non negabitur. In Articulo tamen vicesimo dicitur, quod nihil ab Ecclesia credendum injungi debet, quod non è Scripturis Sacris deduci possit.[bu] Sed utinam deductum fuisset. Nondum enim scio quo sensu aliquid Maximum vel Magnum dici possit, quod non sit Corpus. Sed dic mihi, quaenam est differentia inter gigni & procedere?

B. Vide Matth. 1, 20, ubi Angelus Iosephum alloquitur dicens, Ne metuas accipere Mariam uxorem tuam. Quod enim in illa genitum est, ex Spiritu Sancto est.

A. At illud, ex Spiritu Sancto est, nescio an significat ex Spiritu Sancto genitum est, an ex Spiritu Sancto procedit.

B. Locus hic Matthei pars est Euangelii ad Festum Circumcisionis, ubi legitur in Liturgia sub Edwardo Sexto Latinè edita, Quod in illa genitum est, à Spiritu Sancto profectum est; & ab Ecclesia nostra ita vertitur ac si scriptum esset, à Spiritu Sancto venit.[bv] Vides ergo quomodo locum illum interpretata est Ecclesia Anglicana (& opinor) rectè.

A. Quid igitur, cum Spiritus Sanctus à Filio procedat (ut est in Symbolo) & Filius (ut in hoc textu) procedat à Spiritu Sancto, & uterque genitus dicatur, gigni & procedere, omnino differre non videntur. Quorsum verba illa distinxit Ecclesia Romana?

[bu] Article 20: 'It is not lawful for the Church to ordeyne any thyng that is contrary to Gods worde written . . . as it ought not to decree any thyng agaynste the same, so besydes the same, ought it not to enforce any thing to be beleued for necessitie of saluation.'

[bv] Hobbes's reference to the Latin prayerbook published under Edward VI is mistaken; that version (Ordinatio ecclesiae, an unofficial translation by Alexander Alesius), does not include this text. Hobbes cites the official Latin version published under Elizabeth I (Liber precum publicarum, sig. G3r), where it is part of the Gospel not for the Feast of Circumcision but for the service immediately preceding it, for the Sunday after Christmas. Hobbes also refers to the English text of the Book of Common Prayer, 1549 and 1552 edns.; this used the 'Great Bible' (1540–41), which gave the translation by Myles Coverdale, 'for that which is conceived in her, cometh of the Holy Ghost'.

B I do not know. But you know that once upon a time the Sphinx terrified the people by means of her riddle.[bw]

A What distinction between these terms do the Fathers make?

B None that I have seen. Cyril says, 'the Son has the same relation to the Holy Spirit as the Father to the Son.'[bx]

A So it seems to Cyril that the Son begat the Holy Spirit; thus, once again, 'to be begotten' and 'to proceed' are the same. To me, indeed, it is obvious enough that the Son of God was begotten by God, who comprehends the whole Trinity. But it does not seem to me that men's salvation turns on such small verbal quibbles. He who believes in Jesus Christ and repents of his sins, even if he is not a theologian, must nevertheless be saved – of that I have no doubt. Nor indeed do I depart from the doctrine of the Nicene Creed, which I see to have been very evidently derived from Holy Scripture: that these three, Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, are one God, and that too in three persons (assuming, that is, that 'person' is taken in its true and proper sense, as one who acts on his own part or on the part of another). On the other hand, if the expression 'person' is taken simply for an individual intelligent substance (in the way that it is taken by Bellarmino), such as Peter, Paul, or John, or (what is the same thing) if it is taken for a 'hypostasis', I do not understand how the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are not three individual substances, that is, numerically three Gods; nor do I see how it can be proved from the Scriptures, where neither 'hypostases' nor 'persons' are distinguished in God. It is only said there that there are three who bear witness in heaven, namely the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and that these three are one.[by] Those things that are said by the Fathers, going beyond the Holy Scripture in their particular explanations of the Faith, do not oblige Christians, each one of whom must search out his own salvation in the Holy Scriptures at his own greatest peril – not at the peril of anyone else. Now I pass on to other things.

[bw] In the Greek myth, the Sphinx was a monster that lay in wait for travellers outside the city of Thebes, asking them a riddle and devouring those who could not solve it.

[bx] This is not a quotation, and does not adequately represent the views of Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) on the matter, but it seems to paraphrase an argument which appears twice in his works: that just as Christ is the perfect similitude of the Father, so the Holy Spirit is the perfect similitude of Christ (Thesaurus, sect. 33, and On the Trinity, dialogue 7: PG lxxv, cols. 572, 1089).

[by] See above, note bp.

B. Nescio. Scis autem Sphingem aenigmate quondam fuisse populo formidabilem.[bw]

A. Quam distinctionem harum vocum faciunt Patres?

B. Nullam quam ego vidi. Cyrillus dicit, ita se habere Filium ad Spiritum Sanctum, ut Pater ad Filium.[bx]

A. Videtur ergo Cyrillo Filium genuisse Spiritum Sanctum, & sic rursus idem esse gigni & procedere. Mihi vero satis perspicuum est Filium Dei genitum esse à Deo qui totam comprehendit Trinitatem. Verùm non mihi videtur in tantillis verborum argutiis versari Salus hominum. Qui credit in Iesum Christum, quemque suorum peccatorum poenitet, quin is (etsi Theologus non sit) salvandus tamen [346] sit, nullus dubito. Neque vero à doctrina discedo Symboli Niceni, quam video è Sacra Scriptura manifestissimè derivatam esse; & tres, Patrem, Filium, & Spiritum Sanctum unum esse Deum, idque in tribus Personis, sumpta scilicet Persona in sua significatione vera & propria, pro eo qui partes suas vel alterius agit. Caeterum si vox Persona sumatur simpliciter pro substantia intelligente singulari (quemadmodum sumitur à Bellarmino) ut Petrus, Paulus, Iohannes, vel (quod idem est) pro Hypostasi, quomodo Pater, Filius, & Spiritus Sanctus non sint tres Substantiae individuae, id est, tres numero Dei, non intelligo; neque quomodo è Scripturis probari possit, video, ubi neque Hypostases, neque Personae in Deo distinguuntur. Solummodo dicuntur esse tres qui testimonium perhibent in coelo, nempe Pater, Filius, & Spiritus Sanctus, & tres illi esse unum.[by] Illa quae Patres dicunt extra Scripturam Sacram in suis Fidei explicationibus particularibus Christianos non obligant, quorum unusquisque non alieno periculo, sed suo & summo, salutem suam in Scripturis Sacris scrutari debet. Transeo nunc ad alia.

CHAPTER 2

On Heresy

A What is 'heresy'?

B It is a Greek word, meaning the doctrine of any sect whatsoever.

A What is a sect?

B A sect is a number of people following one and the same master in the sciences, whom they have chosen for themselves, at their own discretion. And as we say 'sect' from 'to follow' [sequor], so we say 'heresy' from 'to choose'.[a] Lucian (who was indeed a blasphemer, but a good writer of the Greek language) entitled his book about choosing a master περὶ αἱρέσεως [about choice].[b]

A What sects were there, and which men did they follow?

B They followed philosophers: namely, Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Epicurus, and others. And they were called Academics, Peripatetics, Stoics, and Epicureans; those were the principal sects of the Greek philosophers, or of those who demanded that they be regarded as philosophers. For even though I think that the heresiarchs themselves – Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Epicurus – were true philosophers, so far as pagans could be, that is, they strove after truth and virtue, and for that reason their names have deservedly shone with the glory of wisdom almost throughout the world, nevertheless I do not think that their sectaries should be called philosophers: apart from the fact that they knew what the opinions of their masters had been, they understood nothing. For they were ignorant of the principles and the arguments on which their masters' doctrines were founded; and their lives had no semblance of philosophy about them, apart from the fact that they walked around looking gloomy, let their beards grow, and wrapped themselves in threadbare cloaks; generally they were miserly men, haughty and irascible, and strangers to civil behaviour.

[a] The Greek word αἵρεσις [hairesis] means, primarily, 'choice' (and, secondarily, a chosen set of principles or beliefs); it derives from the verb αἱρέομαι, to 'choose', 'prefer', or 'take for oneself'.

[b] Hobbes gives the subtitle of Lucian's philosophical dialogue Hermotimos. Lucian of Samosata (d. c.200) was regarded by Christians as an irreligious scoffer, mainly on the basis of comments on the gullibility of Christians in his The Death of Peregrinus.

CAPVT II.

De Haeresi.

A. Quid est Haeresis?

B. Vox Graeca est, significans cujuscunque Sectae Dogma.

A. Quid est Secta?

B. Secta est numerus hominum sequentium unum eundemque in scientiis Magistrum, quem pro suo arbitrio sibi elegerunt. Ut autem Secta à sequendo, ita Haeresis ab eligendo dicitur.[a] Lucianus Librum suum de magistro eligendo (homo quidem Blasphemus, sed bonus author linguae Graecae) inscripsit περὶ αἱρέσεως.[b]

A. Sectae quaenam erant, & quorum hominum?

B. Philosophorum; nimirum Platonis, Aristotelis, Zenonis, Epicuri, & aliorum. Nominabantur autem Academici, Peripatetici, Stoici, Epicurei; quae Sectae erant principales Philosophorum Graecorum, vel eorum, qui se Philosophos videri postulabant. Etsi enim Haeresiarchas ipsos Platonem, Aristotelem, Zenonem, Epicurum, pro captu Ethnicorum verè Philosophos fuisse puto, id est, veritatis & virtutis studiosos, & propter eam rem nomina eorum fere per totum orbem Sapientiae gloria meritò floruisse; Sectatores tamen eorum Philosophos dicendos esse non puto; qui praeterquam quod scirent, quaenam fuerint [347] magistrorum suorum sententiae, nihil intelligebant. Principia enim & ratiocinationes, quibus eorum dogmata innitebantur nesciebant; neque quicquam ad Philosophiae speciem in vita habuerunt, praeterquam quod tristes incederent, barbam promitterent, & pallium tritum amicirentur; homines alioqui avari, fastuosi, iracundi, & à more civili alieni.

24 pallium tritum] pallio trito 70 25 à more 70] amore 68

A Do the words 'truth' and 'error' (which you have not mentioned) have nothing to do with the definition of heresy? One or other of them must necessarily apply to every doctrine.

B Nothing whatsoever; for 'heresy' refers only to a declared opinion, whether true or false, whether lawful or unlawful.

A So it seems that if people call one another heretics, there is no reproach in it.

B Those sects of the Greek philosophers did not call one another heretical, but criminal, sacrilegious, thieving, parricidal, μιαρός [impure], κατάρατος [accursed], and the other names which the lowest class of people use when they are aroused almost to fisticuffs. But after heresies had arisen in the Church, the greatest reproach of all was 'heretic'.

A Were there no heresies other than those of the Greek philosophers?

B In Judaea, too, the sects of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes were called heresies, as is evident from the New Testament.[c] Hellenism, and likewise Judaism, and Christianity, were at that time regarded as so many heresies.[d] Similarly, in Gal. 5 heresy is classified as a crime.[e] And in Gal. 1, it means a doctrine contrary to the doctrine of St Paul himself, that is, contrary to the Gospel of Christ:[f] (v. 8) 'Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel than that which we have preached unto you, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω [let him be accursed].'

A What is ἀνάθεμα?

B Ἀνάθημα (with the letter 'eta') means anything dedicated, consecrated, or separated from common use. But ἀνάθεμα (with the letter 'epsilon') sometimes means a person consigned to the gods of the underworld.[g]

A How can an angel be consigned to the gods of the underworld?

A. Nihilne ad Definitionem Haereseos pertinent voces (quas omisisti) Veritas, & Error, quorum alter omni dogmati adhaeret necessariò?

B. Nihil omnino; Haeresis enim solam denotat sententiam declaratam, sive vera ea sit, sive falsa; sive juxta, sive contra legem.

A. Videtur ergo si homines mutuò se Haereticos appellent, convicium non esse.

B. Sectae illae Philosophorum Graecorum non appellabant alter alterum Haereticum; sed scelestum, sacrilegum, furem, parricidam, μιαρόν, κατάρατον, aliisque nominibus quibus utuntur infimi ordinis homines, quando ferè ad pugnam excandescunt. Postquam autem in Ecclesia Haereses ortae essent, maximum omnium convicium erat Haereticus.

A. Nullaene erant Haereses praeterquam Philosophorum Graecorum?

B. Etiam in Iudaea, Pharisaeorum, Sadduceorum, Essenorum sectae dicebantur Haereses, ut ex Novo Testamento manifestum est.[c] Graecismus, item Iudaismus, Christianismus, habebantur eo tempore pro totidem Haeresibus.[d] Haeresis item Gal. 5. inter crimina ponitur.[e] Et Gal 1, doctrinam significat doctrinae ipsius Sancti Pauli contrariam, id est contrariam Euangelio Christi,[f] vers. 8, Si nos aut Angelus de coelo Euangelium aliud praedicaverit praeter illud quod vobis praedicavimus, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω.

A. Quid est ἀνάθεμα?

B. Ἀνάθημα (per H) significat quamlibet rem dedicatam, consecratam, vel ab usu communi separatam. Sed ἀνάθεμα (per ε) significat aliquando personam Diis Manibus devotam.[g]

A. Quomodo Diis Manibus devoveri potest Angelus?

[c] The term αἵρεσις [hairesis] is used of the Sadducees in Acts 5: 15, and of the Pharisees in Acts 15: 5; its meaning there is (roughly) 'sect'. The Essenes are not mentioned in the New Testament; knowledge of them was derived principally from Josephus, who used the term αἵρεσις to describe the Essenes, Pharisees, and Sadducees (The Jewish War, II.119–66).

[d] The term αἵρεσις (see above, note c) is used, by Jews, about Christianity in Acts 24: 5, 14; 28: 22. It is possible that 'Judaism' here refers to the practices of strict judaizers in the early Christian Church, and 'Hellenism' ('Graecismus') to the laxer practices of Hellenized Jews (cf. Hobbes's reference to early Christians choosing whether to follow 'Paul, or Cephas, or Apollos' (above, Ch. 47, p. 1116), where Apollos may represent 'Judaism', and Cephas (in the light of Gal. 2: 11–14), 'Hellenism'). But note also that St Paul uses 'Judaism' (Ἰουδαϊσμός) to refer to the Jewish religion (Gal. 1: 13–14), and that Jews and Greeks are frequently mentioned in tandem in accounts of the first conversions to Christianity (e.g., Acts 18: 4; 19: 10). If Hobbes was in fact referring here to the beliefs of Greeks and Jews, he may have been influenced by Epiphanius, who described Greek philosophy and the Jewish religion as 'heresies' in his major treatise Against Eighty Heresies; in Denis Petau's edn. of Epiphanius, Opera omnia (1622), in the prefatory letter to that treatise, Epiphanius' term for Greek philosophy, Ἑλληνισμός, was in one place (i, sig. i3v) translated, unusually, as 'Graecismus'.

[e] Gal. 5: 20.

[g] Hobbes's comments are accurate. Both words are derived from the verb ἀνατίθημι, meaning to 'set up' as a votive offering in a temple; in New Testament Greek, ἀνάθεμα means someone 'accursed', 'damned'.

B Indeed, it cannot be burned or killed; but it could have been regarded not as an angel but as merely a spectre, and been declared a detestable deceiver, that is, in the words of Holy Scripture, delivered unto Satan.[h]

A What, pray, was the cause of heresies in the primitive Church (given that it had the rule of correct faith, the written Gospel)?

B The arrogance of the philosophers whom I mentioned earlier, unlearned men (who flourished in the time of the Apostles); they had learned to dispute more cleverly and to plead more forcefully than other people. When these people joined the school of Christ, they were chosen, more or less necessarily, as presbyters and bishops, to defend and propagate the faith; even after becoming Christians, they retained the doctrines of their own heathen masters, so far as they could. And for that reason, they tried to interpret the Holy Scriptures in such a way as to preserve at the same time both their own philosophy and (as if it were the same thing) the Christian faith.

A You have sufficiently explained what heresy was in philosophy. But I do not yet understand what was called heresy in the Church.

B In the primitive Church, up to the time of the Council of Nicaea, the dogmas over which Christians differed among themselves at that time were mostly about the doctrine of the Trinity; although the mystery of the Trinity was held to be incomprehensible by everyone, nevertheless one man ventured to explain it in one way, another in another, each relying on the philosophy of his own master. From this there arose first disputations, then quarrels; and finally, to avoid scandal and to establish peace in the Church, synods were summoned – they were not convened by any order from the rulers, but took place by the voluntary coming together of bishops and pastors, when they were able to do so, after the cessation of persecution. In these councils they defined what was to be held, concerning the Faith, in controverted matters. Now, that which was defined was called the Catholic Faith; and that which was condemned was called heresy. For in relation to an individual bishop or pastor, the council was the catholic – that is, entire, or universal – Church; likewise, the council's opinion was 'catholic'; and the individual doctrine of any pastor was 'heresy'. And this (so far as I have been able to find out from histories) was the origin of the name 'Catholic Church'; and in every Church, 'catholic' and 'heretic' are relative terms.

A If 'Catholic Church' means nothing other than that, there are surely many Catholic Churches in the world.

B There are as many Catholic Churches as there are heads of Churches. And there are as many heads as there are Christian kingdoms and republics. For in every region, the prince of the Christians in that region is the head of his own subjects,[i] and does not depend on any other head on earth. So there are as many heads of Churches as there are visible Churches. However, since the number of God's elect scattered over the whole world, with Jesus Christ himself as its head in heaven, is called, and is, the true, most Catholic, and only Church, that is also the Church in which we profess our belief, in the Creed. For there neither is nor can be any other Catholic Church, so long as we take 'Catholic' to mean all Christians together. For in Christian commonwealths, the kingdom and the Church are the same people. Therefore, if it were granted to anyone on earth to be head of the whole Christian Church, it would be granted to him at the same time to be the king of all kingdoms and republics.

A What, pray, were those doctrines that were called heresies by the primitive Churches?

B Among many others, the main ones were those that concerned the doctrine of the Trinity which is contained in the Nicene Creed. That creed, though it did indeed begin to be drawn up at the Ecumenical Council of Nicaea, was completed by the three following ecumenical councils, namely the Councils of Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon,[j] and was confirmed by the Roman emperors of those times (who had called those councils). The reason for convening the Council of Nicaea was Arius, a priest of Alexandria; when Alexander, the bishop of that city, had said to him that the Son of God was ὁμούσιος (that is, of one substance) with the Father, Arius contradicted him, and when, in the presence of many presbyters, the disputation became heated, he also denied the divinity of Jesus Christ – which led, shortly afterwards, to sedition and slaughter in the city of Alexandria. Now, in order to

[i] Possibly the comma here should come after 'Christianorum', not after 'Regione'; the meaning would then be 'For in every region of Christians, the prince in that region is the head of his own subjects . . .'.

[j] Hobbes's source for this statement may have been Bellarmino, Disputationes, tom. 1, controv. 2, 'De Christo', bk. 2, ch. 29 (i, pp. 457–8), which discusses the additions made at the Councils of Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), and Chalcedon (451).

A. Si nihil aliud significet Ecclesia Catholica, multae sanè sunt in orbe Christiano Ecclesiae Catholicae.

B. Tot sunt Ecclesiae Catholicae, quot sunt Ecclesiarum Capita. Sunt autem tot capita quot sunt Regna & Respublicae Christianae. In omni enim Regione, Christianorum in ea regione Princeps subditorum suorum Caput est,[i] nec ab alio in terris Capite dependet. Itaque quot sunt Ecclesiae visibiles, tot sunt Ecclesiarum Capita. Quoniam autem electorum à Deo numerus per totum orbem terrarum disseminatus Caput habens in coelis ipsum Iesum Christum dicitur, & est vera Ecclesia Catholicissima, & unica; illa quoque est, in quam credere profitemur in Fidei Symbolo. Nulla enim alia est aut esse potest Ecclesia Catholica, si modo Catholica sumatur pro omnibus simul Christianis. In Christianis enim Civitatibus Regnum & Ecclesia [349] populus idem est. Itaque si alicui in terris concederetur, ut esset totius Ecclesiae Christianae Caput, eidem simul concederetur ut esset Regnorum & Rerumpublicarum omnium Rex.

A. Quaenam erant illa Dogmata ab Ecclesiis Primitivis appellatae Haereses?

B. Inter multas alias praecipuae fuerunt, quae pertinebant ad doctrinam Trinitatis, quae continetur in Fidei Symbolo Niceno. Quod quidem Symbolum constitui coepit in Concilio Oecumenico Niceno, absolutum autem est à tribus Conciliis Oecumenicis sequentibus, nempe Constantinopolitano, Ephesino, Chalcedonensi,[j] & ab Imperatoribus Romanis illorum temporum (qui illa Concilia indixerunt) confirmatum. Causa Concilii Niceni convocandi fuit Arrius Presbyter Alexandriae, cui cum Alexander ejusdem urbis Episcopus dixisset Filium Dei esse Patri ὁμούσιον, id est ejusdem substantiae cum Patre, Arrius contradixit; cumque, multis presentibus Presbyteris, fervesceret disputatio, negavit quoque Iesu Christi Divinitatem; unde nata est paulò pòst in urbe Alexandrina seditio & caedes. keep the peace, the Emperor Constantine the Great[k] convened that Council of Nicaea, where the Fathers settled the Creed so far as the words 'I believe in the Holy Spirit'; and, having condemned the opinion of the Arians, they excommunicated Arius himself together with certain bishops and presbyters who were his associates, and deposed them from their churches – although, because of a number of subsequent emperors who were Arians, that heresy could not be extinguished. Another general council was held fifty years later in Constantinople, where they condemned the heresy of Macedonius, who denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit.[l] Then, after another fifty years, at the General Council of Ephesus they condemned the doctrine of Nestorius, who denied, like Arius, the divinity of Christ.[m] Finally, at the General Council of Chalcedon they condemned the heresy of Eutyches and Dioscorus, who denied the union of two natures, divine and human, in Christ.[n] And thus the creed which is called 'Nicene' was at last completed, and, together with the heresies just mentioned, other ones related to them were also condemned.

A After those heresies were condemned, did no new ones later arise?

B Many more; I do not know how many. For after the Roman Church had arrogated to itself, by its own decrees, inerrancy about articles of faith, after the Emperor Phocas had granted to the Pope a primacy over all other bishops,[o] when the power of the Empire (in Italy) was languishing, and when Christian princes were preoccupied with fear of the Saracens, the Pope, already much increased in riches and power, convened general councils by his own authority, having paid no heed to the authority of the emperors or the petty kings of Italy, and even dared to excommunicate some of those kings and emperors as heretics. So, with the passage of time, they condemned as heresies all doctrines that seemed either to impede the rise, or take away from the achievement, of ecclesiastical power. And thence arose those numerous heresies, on account of which (after the publication of Luther's writings) so many Christians were burned in this Kingdom of England and in other countries – until, when the princes of those countries finally awoke, they were liberated from such heavy persecution and Roman slavery.

[k] See Ch. 42, note a. [l] Macedonius (Bishop of Constantinople, 342–6, 351–60) was associated with Arianism; he was also accused of denying the divinity of the Holy Spirit. In response to the teachings of his followers, the Council of Constantinople added to the Nicene Creed the statement that the Holy Spirit 'proceeds from the Father', implying that it was of the same substance as God the Father.

[m] Nestorius (d. *c.*451) did not deny the divinity of Christ, but argued that the divine and the human must be considered separately in Christ, so that it was only the human Christ that was borne by Mary and that suffered and died on the cross. The Council of Ephesus (431) condemned him and his followers as heretical.

tem pacis causa Imperator Constantinus Magnus[k] Concilium illud Nicenum convocavit, in quo Symbolum usque ad haec verba Credo in Spiritum Sanctum, Patres constabiliverunt, & damnata sententia Arrianorum, ipsum cum sociis ejus quibusdam Episcopis & Presbyteris excommunicaverunt, & ab Ecclesiis deposuerunt; quanquam (propter sequentes Imperatores aliquot Arrianos) Haeresis illa extingui non potuit. Concilium aliud generale post annos 50 habitum est Constantinopoli, ubi damnata est Haeresis Macedonii negantis Divinitatem Spiritus Sancti.[l] Deinde, post annos alios 50 in Concilio Generali Ephesino damnata est doctrina Nestorii negantis, sicut Arrius, Divinitatem Christi.[m] Postremò, in Concilio generali Chalcedonensi damnata est Haeresis Eutichetis & Dioscori, qui negaverunt duarum naturarum in Christo, Divinae & Humanae, Vnionem;[n] & ita Symbolum quod vocatur Nicenum tandem perfectum fuit, & cum dictis Haeresibus etiam aliae his affines condemnatae sunt.

A. Post Haereses illas damnatas, nullaene postea subortae sunt novae?

B. Etiam multae, nescio quot. Postquam enim Ecclesia Romana decretis suis arrogâsset sibi, circà Articulos Fidei errare se non posse; & Primatum super omnes Episcopos concessisset Papae Imperator Phocas;[o] & Imperii (in Italia) vis languesceret, & metus Saracenorum Principes Christianos occupâsset, Papa jam ante divitiis & potentia multum auctus Concilia generalia propria authoritate convocabat, [350] neglecta Imperatorum, & Italiae Regulorum authoritate, quorum etiam aliquos Reges & Imperatores, ut Haereticos excommunicare ausus est. Itaque progressu temporis omnes doctrinas, quae potentiam Ecclesiasticam aut surgentem impedire, aut consummatae detrahere videbantur, pro Haeresibus condemnabant. Atque inde ortae sunt Haereses illae numerosae, propter quas (post edita Lutheri scripta) tot Christiani in hoc Regno Angliae, aliisque in locis combusti sunt, donec evigilantibus tandem illorum locorum Principibus, à tam gravi persecutione & servitute Romana liberati fuerunt.

[n] Eutyches (d. c.456) was an anti-Nestorian who asserted that Christ had a single nature; this claim (which contradicted the prevailing view that Christ had two natures united in a single person) was supported by Dioscorus (Patriarch of Alexandria, 444–51), but was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon (451).

[o] That the Emperor Phocas (r. 602–10) bestowed this power on the Pope was asserted by Protestant historians (e.g., Flacius et al., Ecclesiastica historia, iv, cent. 7, col. 228; Carion, Chronicon, p. 358), and denied by Roman Catholic ones (e.g., Baronius, Annales, viii, col. 258).

A When the Roman Church ordered Lutherans, Anabaptists, and others to be burned, did it regard them as Christians, or as heathens?

B As Christians, undoubtedly; and not only these, but also Arians, and all those who were condemned by the Synod of Nicaea. Nor did it call them by any other name than 'heretics'. For even though, having used philosophical arguments about the nature of the Saviour and about the Holy Trinity, they had opinions which were other than they should have been, and were contrary to the Holy Scriptures, nevertheless they did hold Christ to be the true Messiah, and Jesus Christ to be the Son of God, and they called upon his name.

A If that is so, it is inequitable (in my opinion) for the Roman Church to complain about the ancient persecutions by heathen Emperors. For the Christians of those times were certain sects that had the same relation to the established religion in the Roman Empire as heresy has to the Catholic Church today. But it is rather more oppressive for Christians to be tortured by Christians than by infidels.

B So it seems to me too. Nevertheless, it is absolutely necessary, in kingdoms and republics, for care to be taken lest seditions and civil wars spring up. Since these very often originate from a difference in doctrines, and from intellectual rivalries, some punishment should certainly be enforced against those who, in sermons or books, teach things contrary to what is ordered[p] to be taught by the laws of their princes and republics. Thus when Queen Elizabeth of England succeeded her sister Mary, under whom many heretics were burned (and Elizabeth herself was not free from danger), on receiving the kingdom her very first act was, with the consent of the nobles and people, [to take] the right of ruling the Church of England (which belongs by natural right to all kings in their own dominions) and remove the supremacy of the Anglican Church from all foreign powers;[q] and, by an ordinance under the Great Seal of England, confirmed that the administration of the Church was committed, under her, to her bishops together with a few members of her privy council. In this ordinance it was enjoined that they should not pronounce any doctrine heretical that had not been declared heretical in one

A. Ecclesia Romana quos comburi jussit Lutheranos, Anabaptistas, aliosque, habuitne pro Christianis, an pro Ethnicis?

B. Pro Christianis sine dubio; nec hos tantùm, verum etiam Arrianos, & eos omnes quos damnavit Synodus Nicena. Neque eos aliter vocavit quam Haereticos. Nam etsi Philosophicis rationibus usi de Natura Salvatoris, & de Sancta Trinitate aliter senserunt quam oportuit, contra Scripturas sacras; Christum tamen pro vero Messiah habuerunt, & Filium Dei Iesum Christum, & nomen ejus invocarunt.

A. Si ita est, Ecclesia Romana de Imperatorum Ethnicorum antiquis persecutionibus (ut mihi quidem videtur) iniquè conqueritur. Christiani enim temporum illorum Sectae quaedam erant, eandem habentes rationem ad Religionem in Romano Imperio stabilitam, quam Haeresis hodie ad Ecclesiam Catholicam. Gravius autem aliquanto est Christianos à Christianis quam ab infidelibus cruciari.

B. Idem videtur & mihi. Sed tamen in Regnis & Rebuspublicis, ut cautio adhibeatur ne seditiones & bella civilia oriantur, omnimodo necessarium est. Quae cum saepissimè nascantur à diversitate doctrinarum, & concertationibus de ingenio, poenâ certè aliquâ illi coërcendi sunt, qui in Concionibus, vel Libris contraria docent iis, quae doceri, Principum & Rerumpublicarum legibus jubentur.[p] Itaque Angliae Regina Elizabetha, sorori Mariae succedens, sub qua multi Haeretici combusti sunt (nec ipsa Elizabetha sine periculo erat) accepto regno, jus regendae Ecclesiae Anglicanae (jure naturali omnibus Regibus in suis Dominiis debitum) ante omnia, consensu Procerum & populi, omnibus Potestatibus extraneis Ecclesiae Anglicanae Suprematum abstulit;[q] & administrationem ejusdem sub seipsa Episcopis suis unà cum paucis ex consilio suo privato, Diplomate sub Sigillo Magno Angliae commisit & confirmavit. In quo Diplomate [351] provisum erat ne quam doctrinam Haereticam esse pronuntiarent, quae Haeretica declarata non fuisset, of those first four general councils which I have mentioned.[r] Thus, so far as heresies are concerned, the position of the Anglican Church was similar to that of the Roman Church under Constantine the Great; and so it remained until the seventeenth year of King Charles I, who, more or less compelled by the requests of his subjects (who found the power of the bishops unbearably great), revoked that ordinance of Elizabeth, leaving the bishops with only their ordinary power, namely, the power to make canons, which could become ecclesiastical laws with the king's consent.[s]

A Then the condition of the Church of England as we see it today is both equal to the condition of the Church in the time of Constantine where purity of doctrine is concerned, and superior to it where the equity of its ecclesiastical laws is concerned. For it seems inequitable that a man who embraces a faith, at his own peril, and his alone, should be punished on the grounds that it is erroneous, especially by those who are not harmed by another person's error.

B To err, to be deceived, or to have a wrong opinion is not a crime in itself; nor can an error become a crime so long as it is confined to a person's heart. For who is the informer who will denounce him, and who is the witness on whose testimony will he be convicted? How then will he be judged? But words can be a crime, and can be punished without injury with whatever punishments the legislators wish – indeed, with the ultimate penalty. If blasphemy against the king can be punished with death, much more can blasphemy against God. Nevertheless, it is only equitable that such a law should plainly define both what is the crime that is condemned, and what is the method of punishment, in order that the evil man should be deterred from evil-doing by the expectation of that punishment. For the purpose of lawful punishment is not to satiate people's anger against someone, but, so far as possible, to prevent injuries, for the benefit of mankind. Every law that does not threaten before it strikes is inequitable; and however arbitrary the right of sovereign powers to make laws may be, it is not arbitrary in the way of exacting punishments that have not previously been defined by laws. Besides, if a law has not been declared and promulgated, so that all plausible excuse of ignorance is removed, not even an action against the law can be rightly punished, or called a crime.

[r] The Act of Supremacy authorized the Queen to appoint, by letters patent, commissioners from among her subjects to exercise jurisdiction over the Church. The relevant part of the letters patent is summarized in Coke, Third Part of the Institutes, ch. 5, p. 40, as follows: 'if any person be charged with Heresy before the High Commissioners, they have no authority to adjudge any matter or cause to be

A. Ecclesiae ergo Anglicanae conditio qualis hodie cernitur, tum puritate Doctrinae conditioni Ecclesiae quae erat tempore Constantini, aequalis est; tum aequitate Legum Ecclesiasticarum superior. heresy, but only such, as hath been so adjudged by the authority of the Canonicall Scripture, or by the first four generall Councells, or by any other generall Councell, wherein the same was declared heresie by the expresse and plain words of the Canonicall Scripture'. The first four general councils of the Church were at Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), and Chalcedon (451)

[s] Hobbes refers to the Act for the Abolition of the Court of High Commission of July 1641 (17 Car. I. c. 11) (see Gardiner, ed., Constitutional Documents, pp. 186–9).

A Surely an action against the Natural Law is a crime, and can be punished, even if no method of punishment has been specified by law?

B The natural law is eternal, divine, and written only in our hearts. But there are few who know how to look into their own hearts and read what is written there. So they learn from the written laws what things are to be done, and what avoided; and they do things and avoid doing things in accordance with whatever will seem, from the punishments they foresee, profitable or harmful to themselves. Besides, if something is done against the Natural Law, it is usually called a sin, not a crime, and people think that if they repent it, they should be forgiven straight away, unless it entails some harm to the commonwealth or to their neighbour – and even then, they think they can be punished no further than by reparation of the harm that has been caused. But they think that malice is left to God alone to punish. For if one sinner punishes another sinner merely for a sin, after the law has been satisfied, it is like civil war.

A What? If someone is an atheist, and there is no written law to define the method of punishment, is he not to be punished?

B Certainly he is to be punished, and very severely. But first he must be accused, heard, and condemned. And nothing can be the object of an accusation other than something said or something done. But what deeds will serve as evidence of atheism? For what deed have you ever heard of so wicked or impious that a similar deed has not been committed at some time by people who not only are not regarded as atheists, but are even professed Christians? So no one can be judged an atheist on the basis of his deeds. Nor in any way can he stand accused on the basis of something he has said, whether in speech or in writing, unless he has directly denied that God exists.

A Will not that person be called an atheist, too, who has said or written something from which it necessarily follows that God does not exist?

B Yes indeed, if, when he said it or wrote it, he himself saw the necessity of such an implication. For if what the law prohibits – and therefore can punish – is a saying or a deed, it should be defined in such a way that all those who are obliged by that law should know that this or that deed (so far as it and the relevant circumstances have been defined by the law), or these or those words (as written in the law itself) are to be punished. For the implications of words are extremely difficult to judge. Therefore, if the accused has spoken against the letter of the law (without harming anyone) because he is ignorant

A. Quod factum est contra Legem Naturalem, nonne crimen est, & puniri potest, etiamsi nullus Legi adscriptus sit puniendi modus?

B. Lex naturalis aeterna, divina, & cordibus solummodò inscripta est. Pauci autem sunt, qui in sua ipsorum corda inspicere, & quae illic scripta sunt sciunt legere. Itaque quae facienda, quae fugienda [352] sint, à Legibus scriptis discunt; faciuntque & fugiunt prout praevisis poenis videbitur sibimet ipsis utile vel damnosum. Praeterea si quid factum sit contra Legem Naturalem, non id crimen vocari solet, sed peccatum, idque sibi poenitentibus statim condonandum existimant, nisi cum aliquo damno civitatis vel proximi conjunctum sit; neque tunc ulteriùs puniri se posse putant, quam ut pro damno illato satisfaciant. Malitiam autem soli Deo puniendam relinqui. Nam si peccator peccatorem puniat peccati solius nomine, postquam Legi satisfactum sit, simile est Belli civilis.

A. Quid, si quis Atheus sit, nec sit Lex scripta quae modum poenae definiat, nonne punietur?

B. Punietur profectò, & gravissimè. Sed priùs accusandus, audiendus & damnandus est. Accusari autem praeter Dictum & Factum nihil potest. Quibus autem Factis arguetur Atheismus? Quodnam enim Factum audivisti unquam tam sceleratum aut impium, cujus simile non commissum sit aliquando ab illis, qui non modò non putantur Athei, sed etiam professione tenus sunt Christiani? Non ergo ex factis judicatur Atheus. Dicto igitur aliquo sive prolato sive scripto reus fieri, neque ullo alio modo potest, nempe si directè negaverit Deum esse.

A. Nonne Atheus dicetur etiam is, qui dixerit scripseritve id, ex quo Deum non esse necessariò sequitur?

B. Ita sane, si ipse quando id dixit, vel scripsit, consequentiae talis necessitatem vidit. Nam si Dictum vel Factum sit, id quod Lege prohibetur, & proinde puniri possit, illud definiri ita debet, ut illi omnes qui Lege illa obligandi sunt, cognoscant hoc & illud Factum, prout Lege cum circumstantiis definitum est, vel haec vel illa Verba, quae in Lege ipsa scribuntur, punienda esse. Nam Verborum consequentiae difficillimae judicatu sunt. Itaque si reus, ignoratione benè ratiocinandi, contra literam Legis loquutus sit (nullo of how to reason well, his ignorance will excuse him; but if a judge, through his ignorance of some implication, delivers an innocent man to be punished, he cannot be excused. Yet if someone knows that his actual words are against the law, he can be punished. That is why a man who denies that God exists, or plainly professes to doubt whether he exists or not, can be punished even if the method of punishment has not been specified by law – but punished by exile, as is also in accordance with natural equity. For religion and the acknowledgement of divine power are commanded by law in every commonwealth. And it is essential to every commonwealth that people should keep the promises made in covenants, especially if those promises have been confirmed by swearing oaths. So, because an atheist cannot be obliged by swearing an oath, he should be banished from the commonwealth, not as a rebel, but as a public nuisance. But, once that harm to the public has ceased, I do not see why he should be killed, when he might at some time be converted from his impiety; for what is there that a person may not hope for, before he dies, from the forbearance of God? Something similar should be said about blasphemy, which is speaking defiantly against God, and is atheism, if the mind agrees with the speech.

A Why then were blasphemers not banished, rather than killed, under Mosaic law?[t]

B Because by the same right with which an earthly king can banish (under a law that has been issued) a blasphemer from his kingdom, the king of the people of Israel –who, in the time of Moses, was God himself, the king established by covenant, who was also king by nature of the whole world – could banish (under a law that had been issued) a blasphemer from the whole earth, that is, kill him. But take this answer of mine to your question not as an explanation of the reason why God decided to make that law, but as a defence of its equity, once it was made.

A I now understand what heresy is: namely, that at first it was merely the opinion of a sect; then it was the opinion of a Christian sect; and thirdly the opinion of a Christian sect that was condemned by the Catholic Church. I should also like to know this: by what power, and in what way, has it usually been punished, from the beginning until today?

[t] Lev. 24: 16 ('And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, he shall surely be put to death').

B Before Constantine the Great, the first Christian emperor,[u] neither pastors nor the Apostles themselves had the power to inflict any penalty on the heretics they condemned – neither the power to send them into exile, nor to deprive them of bodily freedom, nor to ill-treat them in any way at all, since this belonged only to the sovereign, for the preservation of peace. They were able to excommunicate them, that is, refuse and avoid their company in society, at meals, and in meetings, as heathens and publicans – which is not a punishment, and in many cases was more disadvantageous to the excommunicator than to the excommunicated. At the Council of Nicaea a punishment was ordained (in the case of condemned heretics) only for the clergy, and that was that they should be deprived of their churches. But nothing was laid down against their disciples, perhaps because lay people were hardly expected to judge the doctrines of their own pastors, or perhaps because very many of them were soldiers, who had served under the Emperor himself, and were dangerous people to annoy. Also, the actual teachers of heresies were summoned to the Council; their arguments were heard, disputed, and refuted from the Holy Scriptures. As a last resort, if they refused to subscribe to the judgement of the Church, then at last they were deprived of their churches. And indeed if they persisted in infecting the people with their heresies after that, they were sometimes sent into exile. Otherwise, those same people, if they abandoned their defiance and later subscribed, were reinstated by the Emperor; in just this way, Arius himself, after he had given the Emperor a written confession of his faith, which did not differ (in the Emperor's opinion) from the judgement of the other Fathers, was reinstated, and Athanasius, who did not want to accept him, was for that reason sent into exile.[v]

A Did not that great man Athanasius think that it was a sin to refuse to obey the command of the sovereign ruler?

[u] See Ch. 42, note a.

[v] Hobbes brings together here two separate developments. Arius was pardoned soon after the Council of Nicaea (325); Athanasius was exiled to Trier in 336, after various accusations had been made against him by Arians and others (see Hermias Sozomenos, Ecclesiastical History, II.28: PG lxvii, col. 1017).

B. Ante Constantinum Magnum, Imperatorem Christianum primum,[u] neque Pastores neque ipsi Apostoli Potestatem habuerunt Haereticis à se condemnatis poenam ullam infligendi, neque illos in exilium mittendi, neque libertate corporis privandi, neque quomodocunque molestandi; quippe quod soli summo Imperanti ad conservationem pacis competebat. Excommunicare potuerunt, id est, eorum societatem, convictum, congressum declinare & fugere, tanquam Ethnicorum vel Publicanorum; quae poena non est, & saepenumero excommunicanti magis, quàm excommunicato incommoda erat. In Concilio Niceno poena (damnatis Haereticis) in Clericos tantum constituta est, eaque erat ut Ecclesiis suis privarentur. Sed contra Discipulos illorum statutum est nihil, quia Laici fortè de Pastorum suorum doctrinis judicare minimè tenebantur; vel forte, quia plerique eorum milites erant, qui sub Imperatore ipso meruerant, nec irritandi sine periculo erant. Etiam Doctores Haeresium ipsi citabantur ad Concilium, eorum rationes audiebantur, disputabantur, & ex Scripturis Sacris refutabantur. Ad extremum si Ecclesiae judicio subscribere recusarent, tùm demum privabantur Ecclesiis. Et siquidem posteà populum Haeresi sua pergerent inficere, in exilium quandoque mittebantur. Caeterum illi iidem si positâ contumaciâ [354] posteà subscriberent, ab Imperatore restituebantur; sicut ipse Arrius postquam Fidei suae confessionem Imperatori scriptam dedisset, quae à Iudicio patrum reliquorum (ut Imperatori videbatur) non discrepabat, restitutus fuit; & Athanasius qui eum recipere noluit, ob eam rem in exilium missus est.[v]

A. Athanasius ille Magnus summi Imperatoris mandato obedientiam negare, peccatum esse non putavit?

B It seems that he did not; nevertheless, those passages of the New Testament are not obscure where Christ and the Apostles require obedience even to heathen powers. But Athanasius opposed the Emperor himself over the reinstatement of Arius with the same zeal with which he had attacked the Arian heresy at the Council of Nicaea a little earlier. Nor should that seem surprising, given that when teachers of theology subject to the minutest scrutiny those passages of Holy Scripture that bear on the present controversy, they pass over – either through negligence, or sometimes, even, deliberately, and out of their contempt for human laws – other passages that concern the rights of princes. But (to go back to the punishment of heretics) you should know that the most extreme of ecclesiastical punishments is the one called anathematizing or excommunication, and therefore that every other punishment depends on the civil power. Now the reason why Constantine and other Roman emperors ordained many punishments for heretics – such as exile, confiscation of goods by the state, and the burning of books (and even death, but not for the heretical writers themselves, rather, for those who did not hand over those condemned books to be burned)[w] – was to prevent the Christians, and especially the soldiers, from dividing into factions and killing one another. However, I cannot find any imperial law that decrees that heretics are to be killed, except Manichaeans, whom I consider to have been not so much heretics, as feigned Christians and criminals.[x] I do indeed find a law which says that a heathen person or a Jew should be burned if he had tried to draw away from the Christian faith a relative of his who had become a Christian.[y] But this has nothing to do with the punishment of heretics. I have indeed heard that the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa issued a law about the burning of heretics; but although I find, in the code of Justinian, a decree by that Frederick confirming the decrees of previous emperors on the punish-

[w] See ibid., I.21 (PG lxvii, col. 925).

[x] Codex, I.v.5 (a decree of the Emperors Theodosius and Valentinian, in 428, ordaining capital punishment for Manichaeans, and also treating them as pseudo-Christians who met in pseudo-churches ('quasi Ecclesias')). Manichaeism was a separate religion, founded by the Persian prophet Mani (*c.*216–76); but its similarity to Gnosticism led many early Christians to regard it as a heresy.

[y] Codex, I.ix.3 (a decree of Constantine, in 315, ordaining the burning of any Jew who assails a convert from Judaism to Christianity; 'heathen' offenders are not mentioned in the original text of the decree, but this 'title' ('titulus') of the Codex is called 'Concerning Jews and worshippers of the heavens' ('De Judaeis et coelicolis'), and in the standard edn. which Hobbes may have consulted (Corpus iuris civilis, ed. Godefroy et al., 2nd pagination, p. 36) the term '[& Coelicolis]' has been interpolated into the decree).

B. Ita videtur; loca tamen Testamenti Novi illa, quibus obedientia Potestatibus etiam Ethnicis à Christo & Apostolis praecipitur, obscura non sunt. Sed Athanasius quo zelo Haeresim Arrianam in Concilio Niceno paulò antè oppugnaverat, eodem posteà de Arrio restituendo ipsi Imperatori se opposuit. Neque mirum id videri debet, cum Theologiae Doctores dum in loca illa Scripturae Sacrae, quae pertinent ad praesentem controversiam, intentissimè inspiciunt, loca alia quae spectant ad jura Principum aut negligentia, aut aliquando etiam studio, spretisque Legibus humanis, praetereunt. Sed (ut redeamus ad Haereticorum poenas) sciendum est inter Ecclesiastica supplicia, ultimum esse quod vocatur Anathematizatio sive Excommunicatio, & propterea aliam omnem poenam dependere à Potestate Civili. Causa autem, quare Constantinus, & caeteri Imperatores Romani multas poenas in Haereticos constituerunt, ut exilium, publicationem bonorum, librorum combustionem (etiam mortem sed non in Scriptores Haereticos ipsos, sed in eos qui libros illos damnatos ad ignem non protulerint)[w] causa erat ne Christiani & praecipuè milites secederent in partes, & mutuò se occiderent. Nullam tamen Legem Imperatoriam invenire possum, qua Haeretici necandi sunt, exceptis Manichaeis, quos ego non tam pro Haereticis, quam pro fictis Christianis & sceleratis habeo.[x] Legem quidem invenio, quâ homo Ethnicus vel Iudaeus si gentilem suum factum Christianum tentaverit à Fide Christiana revocare, comburendus esset.[y] Sed hoc nihil attinet ad supplicium Haereticorum. Audivi quidem Imperatorem Fredericum Aenobarbum de comburendo Haeretico Legem tulisse, sed, etsi in codice Iustiniani, Constitutionem reperio Frederici illius, confirmantem Imperatorum praecedentium ment of heretics, there is no surviving decree about the burning of heretics.[z] Therefore, so far as I can conjecture, that method of punishing heretics began shortly after the times of Pope Alexander III, who was the first to trample under foot not only that emperor but also the Empire itself, and the laws of all princes.[aa] However that may be, it is certain that in this England of ours, from roughly that time until the time of Queen Elizabeth, by a certain custom that passed into law, it was the practice to burn heretics.[ab]

A So a few words need to be added to the definition of heresy, from that time onwards: namely, that heresy is doctrine contrary to the Catholic Faith, to be punished by fire.

B Just so.

A By what judge, and with what judicial procedure, were heretics to be condemned?

B Before popes exercised their rule over the emperors, the judges were for the most part those people to whom the imperial rescripts concerning the punishment of heretics had been sent, namely, chief magistrates of towns, and governors of provinces. But I know nothing about the procedure for the conviction of a heretic. However, after the growth in strength of pontifical authority, one or more bishops were responsible for hearing the case; and indeed if the accused renounced the doctrine which he had taught, having been publicly asked twice (if necessary) to do so, and if he did penance in the form prescribed by the ecclesiastical court, he was acquitted. But if he later relapsed into the same heresy, or fell into another (for they were innumerable), he was delivered to the secular power to be burned. Nor was there any scope whatsoever for pardon (because of the distinction between ecclesiastical and civil power) without the agreement of the Pope.

[z] The edn. of the Corpus iuris civilis edited by Godefroy and others (see above, note y) included some laws issued by the Holy Roman Emperors Frederick I 'Barbarossa' (r. 1155–90) and Frederick II (r. 1220–50). These do not include any law by Frederick I confirming previous laws against heresy, but they do include (4th pagination, p. 27) the 'constitutiones' of Frederick II, some of which decree punishments for heretics and those who favour them. The statement that Frederick I did not decree the burning of heretics is correct; what Hobbes had 'heard' may have concerned the papal decretal Ad abolendam of 1184, which specified that heretics be handed to the secular authorities for 'due punishment', and which was later taken as the basis for their subjection to capital punishment.

[ab] As Hobbes correctly noted in his Dialogue of the Common Laws, the first English law specifying capital punishment (by burning) for heresy was the statute 'De haeretico comburendo' (2 Henry IV c. 15) of 1401 (Writings on Common Law and Hereditary Right, pp. 97–8). He also referred there to an earlier use of capital punishment for apostasy; but the grounds for his statement here about a customary punishment for heresy operating from the late 12th century onwards are unclear, and in the Dialogue of the Common Laws (op. cit., p. 102) he explicitly rejected it, observing that 'before the time of Henry the 4th, there was no such Custom in England'. 'De haeretico comburendo' was repealed first by Edward VI and then (after its revival by Mary) by Elizabeth (1 Eliz. c. 1, art. 6).

A How were they to be convicted and punished, between the first year of Elizabeth and the seventeenth year of Charles I?

B Very few heretics indeed appeared during that entire time, thanks to the fact that the people to whom the Queen had committed the government (under herself) of the Church were forbidden by law to pronounce any doctrine heretical if it had not previously been condemned as heretical at one of the first four general councils[ac] – that is (as is evident from those councils themselves), if it was not contrary to the Faith declared in the Nicene Creed. But those who were convicted were burned.

A How can it be known what is or is not contrary to the Creed, except if the very words of the Creed, precisely as they are written, are denied to be true, or said to be false?

B A heretic should not be punished by law, unless he contradicts the actual words of the Creed. For it is inequitable to say that the Faith is denied by implication, and that someone should be punished for that reason. Is it equitable to seek to take a man's life by means of clever arguments about implications? Or that his life should be staked on the skill of his enemies – or even of a judge – in the art of logic? Shall the law, which demands nothing other than obedience, take vengeance on a piece of false reasoning? The Fathers themselves thought otherwise at the Council of Nicaea. For when there were some people (only a few) among them who hesitated to subscribe to the Creed on account of the word ὁμούσιος, and demanded a fuller explanation of that term, the other Fathers gratified their request and declared that the term ὁμούσιος should be understood to mean that the Son of God was indeed of the substance of the Father, but not that he was a part of the Father. One of those who requested this explanation from the Fathers was Eusebius, Bishop of Caesarea, and he wrote a letter to the clergy of all dioceses, called an encyclical letter, in which he informed them of what was decreed at the Synod about the Faith as it concerns the Holy Trinity, and about the reason why he and the others, who had previously refused to subscribe, were now subscribing. In that letter he put the reason for his own subscribing as follows: that a formula had been prescribed by the Fathers, by means of which a guarantee was given that he would not fall away from a correct interpretation of the Faith; and that the reason why he did not reject the term ὁμούσιος was that peace was like a mark to aim at, placed in front of our eyes.[ad] From this one may understand that whenever words are made to be a crime, in accordance with the opinion of the Council of Nicaea, those words must be reduced to a formula, so that each person may be certain which words contain the crime and which do not, without further syllogisms – in just the same way as, where deeds are concerned, that which is a crime is distinguished from that which is not a crime by a formula of the law. All the popes were of the same opinion. For when they condemn some doctrine as heretical at general councils, they write out in the decree itself, in express formulas, as many possible consequences as they foresee to arise from that doctrine.

A You said just now that in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, those who exercised, under her, the government of the Church were forbidden by law to pronounce anything a heresy if it had not been condemned by one of the first four general councils. I ask therefore whether those governors of the Church, who were put in place at that time by the Queen, had promulgated in all the parish churches which doctrines those were, and which were the formulas of words that it was a capital crime to contradict? For I do not believe that unlearned people, who had not been required to read anything for their salvation other than the Holy Bible, were obliged to possess a true record of the councils – and I do not know if such a record exists. For there are those who say that those records do not exist, having been corrupted by the Arians, and for that reason suppressed by the Catholics.[ae]

B It cannot be doubted that that part of the councils in which the Creed was settled does survive in uncorrupted form.[af] But as for the disputations between Catholics and heretics, it does not greatly matter whether that part has perished or not. Anyway, to answer your question about whether the formulas of words that constituted heresy under Elizabeth were promulgated in the churches: none was promulgated, nor indeed were the royal letters pat-

[ad] Socrates Scholasticus, Ecclesiastical History, I.8, states that Eusebius was one of the few who refused at first to accept the Creed, and gives the text of his letter (which, however, was to his own diocese only); for the passage from it paraphrased here by Hobbes, see PG lxvii, col. 73.

[ae] Hobbes may have been expanding here on a passage in Daillé, Traicté de l'employ des saincts peres, pp. 36–7, which argued that there were no authentic records of the Council of Nicaea, denying the claim that Rome had kept one authentic copy which had 'escaped the corruptions of the Arians' ('eschappé les corruptions des Arriens').

[af] The translation here follows the Latin, taking 'pura extet' as having the implied subject 'ea pars'. However, given the previous sentence (where 'extare' was in an object-clause with 'illa', apparently meaning 'illa exemplaria'), it is possible that 'extet' here is an error for 'extent' (with 'exemplaria' implied here too); in which case the meaning of the sentence would be 'It cannot be doubted that uncorrupted records do survive of that part of the councils in which the Creed was settled'.

nempe quia Pax nobis tanquam scopus ante oculos versabatur.[ad] Ex quo intelligitur, quoties Verba fiunt crimen, juxta Concilii Niceni sententiam, Verba illa in Formulam debere redigi, ut unusquisque quae verba crimen habent, quae non habent, sine pluribus Syllogismis certus esse possit. ent themselves published until much later; so that an accused person could not know, before he was arraigned, what was heresy and what was not. For although, thanks to those royal letters patent, anything could be declared a heresy that had been so declared by the councils I have mentioned, it was nevertheless possible for it not to be so declared on the basis of those letters. This negligence on the part of the governors of the Church under Elizabeth, in not publishing those royal letters patent more quickly, is censured by that most distinguished legal expert Edward Coke in the third book of his Institutes.[ag]

A Was not the Creed itself, published in the Anglican liturgy, a sufficient promulgation of the law concerning heresy?

B Yes, if it had been written in the law. But no mention is made there of the Nicene Creed; nor did uneducated people (nor even, perhaps, some of the clergy) understand what that Creed had in common with the councils, or how the decree of Constantine had become English law.

A When the authority of those governors, who were responsible for judging about heresy, was taken away by law in (as you say) the seventeenth year of Charles I,[ah] how did it come about that the laws about heresy which existed in the time of Queen Mary did not regain their authority?

B Because, before that power of the governors of the Church was set up, a law had already been issued for the abolition of all ecclesiastical power other than that of the monarch;[ai] so when that power was taken away by law, those governors had no authority to punish heretics (other than the ordinary authority to excommunicate), nor do they have any today.[aj]

A So a heretic cannot be punished today with any penalty other than excommunication?

[ag] This possibly refers to a rather different criticism made by Coke in The Fourth Part of the Institutes, ch. 74, p. 326, concerning slowness in 'enrolling' (entering into the legal records) the High Commission: 'never any High Commission was inrolled (as they all ought to have been) untill my Lord Chancellor Egertons time, so as no man before that time could know what their Jurisdiction was.' Sir Thomas Egerton became Solicitor-General in 1581, Master of the Rolls in 1594, Lord Keeper in 1596, and Lord Chancellor in 1603. [ah] See above, note s. B He can also be punished with those penalties that follow excommunication, by virtue of the civil laws. For he will be arraigned before the ecclesiastical court, which, if he does not condemn his error himself, will deliver him to the secular power to be put in prison, to remain there until he renounces his heresy and performs the penance that is established by the laws.

A How can it be known whether he has genuinely recanted or not?

B It cannot be known at all, except by God alone.

A Can he be forced to abjure his heresy?

B He cannot. When the Church governors I have mentioned had their authority, there was indeed sometimes the practice of examining people on oath about their internal opinions. But that power was taken away, together with that authority, on the grounds that it was inequitable, because the punishing of people's thoughts seems to belong only to God, by whom our thoughts are seen. For human laws take notice only of disobedient behaviour.

A Is no punishment for heretics laid down in the Gospel?

B None, except that they should be avoided, and forbidden to take part in the common life of the saints (who lived at that time on goods held in common).[ak] I find no secular penalty ordained. Nor do I find excommunication on account of heresy, but on account of a life, and crimes, that dishonoured religion. On the contrary, if the parables of the New Testament are to be applied to the Christian religion, I think that a Christian is forbidden to punish a heretic with a civil penalty. Matt. 13: 27–30: 'Whence are these tares? He (Jesus) said unto them, An enemy hath done this. The servants said unto him, Wilt thou that we gather them up? But he said, Nay; lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest.'[al] Is it not evident from this that the tares, that is, the heresies, are to be reserved for the Last Judgement? How then are they to be uprooted [al] The Latin here appears to be Hobbes's own translation from his version (AV, approx) of the English.

B. Etiam poenis iis, quae excommunicationem (virtute Legum Civilium) consequuntur. Citabitur enim ad Curiam Ecclesiasticam, ubi, nisi errorem suum ipse damnet, tradetur potestati seculari in carcerem conjiciendus, ibi mansurus, donec Haeresi suae renuntiet, penitentiamque egerit Legibus constitutam.

A. Quî sciri potest an verè renuntiaverit necne?

B. Omnino sciri non potest, praeterquam à Deo solo.

A. Nonne cogi potest Haeresim suam abjurare?

B. Non potest. Solebant quidem stante authoritate dictorum Rectorum Ecclesiasticorum examinari aliquando cum juramento de sententia ipsorum interna. Sed ea potestas una cum ipsa authoritate ablata est, ut iniqua; propterea, quod cogitationum vindicta ad solum videtur pertinere Deum, cogitationum inspectorem. Leges enim humanae in contumaciam tantum animadvertunt. [358]

A. Nullane Haereticorum poena constituitur in Euangelio?

B. Nulla, nisi quod fugiendi sunt, & communione Sanctorum (qui illo tempore de divitiis communibus alebantur)[ak] prohibendi. Nullam poenam sancitam invenio secularem. Neque excommunicationem reperio propter Haeresim, sed propter vitam, & scelera quibus Religio dedecorabatur. Contra autem, si ad doctrinam Christianam parabolae Novi Testamenti adhibendae sunt, puniri Haereticum à Christiano homine poena civili prohibitum puto. Matth. 13. vers. 27, unde haec Zizania? 28. dixit illis (Iesus) *Inimicus homo hoc fecit. in this world, by death or exile? Again, 1 Cor. 3: 11–13, 15: 'For other foundation can no man lay, than that Jesus is Christ. Now if any man build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, straw; Every man's work shall be made manifest. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.'[am] What does this mean, if not that he who holds this foundation, 'Jesus is Christ', that is, he who is truly a Christian, even if he builds thereon wood, hay, or straw, that is, false doctrines, will lose his work, yet will himself be saved – but as if by fire, that is, by the expurgation of errors from his mind. Also 2 Tim. 2: 25: 'The servant of the Lord should in meekness instruct those who oppose themselves; if God peradventure will give them repentance so that they acknowledge the truth.'[an] Is not this against those people who, when a heretic has been arraigned twice, immediately have him burned if he does not recant his doctrine, and, so far as they can, shut out a Christian from the divine mercy? Add to these passages of Holy Scripture the opinion of all theologians that no one is accepted by Christ who has been forced to him by the fear of death.

A How is blasphemy usually punished?

B If blasphemy proceeds from one's internal beliefs, it is atheism. For who would dare to blaspheme against God, if he thought that God existed and had charge over human affairs? But what is commonly called blasphemy is nothing other than an affected abuse of divinity in unnecessary oaths. This crime is defined by Justinian in Novella 77: Blasphemies are '"by God's hair", "by God's head", and words like these'.[ao] Then the punishment that is laid down is the ultimate penalty.

[am] The Latin here appears to be Hobbes's own translation from his version (AV, approx, with 'straw' instead of 'stubble'); 'quod Iesus est Christus' ('that Jesus is Christ') here differs from Vulg and Beza (and AV), which identify the foundation with Jesus Christ himself, not with the credal statement about him.

[an] Adapted from vv. 24–5; the Latin here appears to be Hobbes's own translation from his remembered version (AV, approx) of the English. His word 'mititia' (meekness) is not classical Latin; Vulg has 'Cum modestia' (modestly), and Beza has 'Cum lenitate' (gently).

[ao] The citation is almost verbatim, but these oaths are not presented as a definition of blasphemy in the decree, merely as examples of it: 'we order them to abstain from suchlike and other blasphemous expressions, and not to swear by "the hair" or "the head" [of God], and similar expressions' ('istis injungimus abstinere ab hujusmodi, & aliis blasphemis verbis, & non jurare per capillos & caput, & his proxima verba').

in hoc mundo morte vel exilio? Item 1 Cor. 3. 11, Fundamentum aliud ponere nemo potest, praeterquam quod Iesus est Christus. 12. Sin quis huic fundamento superaedificaverit aurum, argentum, lapides pretiosos, lignum, foenum, culmum. 13. Vniuscujusque opus manifestum fiet. 15. Si alicujus opus comburetur, damnum sustinebit, ipse autem salvabitur, ita tamen ut per ignem.[am] Quid hoc, nisi quod qui fundamentum tenet hoc, Iesum esse Christum, id est, is, qui verè Christianus est, etsi superaedificaverit lignum, foenum, culmum, id est, dogmata falsa, operam perdet, ipse tamen salvabitur. Sed quasi per ignem, id est, animo erroribus expurgatis. Etiam 2 Tim. 2. 25, Ministrum Domini docere oportet eos qui se opponunt, in mititia,[an] si forte Deus ipsis det resipiscentiam ut agnoscant veritatem. Nonne hoc contra eos est, qui Haereticum bis citatum, nisi renunciet doctrinae suae, statim comburi faciunt, aditumque homini Christiano ad misericordiam divinam, quantum in ipsis est, occludunt? Quibus locis Scripturae Sacrae sententiam adde Theologorum omnium, neminem à Christo recipi, qui metu mortis ad illum cogitur.

A. Quomodo puniri solet Blasphemia?

B. Blasphemia si procedat ab animi sensu Atheismus est. Quis enim blasphemare Deum auderet quem esse, & curam rerum humanarum gerere existimaret. Sed id quod vulgo Blasphemia dicitur, nihil aliud est, praeter affectatum divinitatis in juramentis non necessariis abusum. Quod crimen definitur à Iustiniano Novella 77, hoc modo: Blasphema sunt per Dei capillos, & caput, & his proxima, verba.[ao] Deinde poena constituitur supplicium ultimum.

10 mititia] mititate 70

A Are oaths of this sort not punished by any law in our country?

B I do not know. However, I do not doubt that they can be punished by ecclesiastical censures. For they are a scandal to the Church, and an outstandingly impudent violation of the third commandment of the Decalogue.[ap] Any unnecessary oath is a sin, and no small one, as it arises from the fact that men are in the habit of lying. Thus a person who has said the truth, and who sees that he is not believed, swears in order to show that he has spoken seriously – and he swears by him whom he ought to swear by if it were absolutely necessary to swear, namely God. Certain dissolute-minded people, seeing that those who swore like this were not punished, divided God into bodily parts in the manner of the Anthropomorphites[aq] and began to swear by them individually, angling for praise for the novelty of their oaths. Hence those expressions, 'by the body. . .', 'by the nails. . .', 'by the hair. . .', which are both blasphemous and heretical. The Church will have seen to the manner of their punishment.

A. Ejusmodi juramenta nullane Lege puniuntur apud nos?

B. Nescio. Quin tamen puniri ea posse censuris Ecclesiasticis [359] non dubito. Nam & scandalum est Ecclesiae, & tertii praecepti Decalogi transgressio in primis audax.[ap] Iuramentum quodlibet non necessarium, Peccatum est non parvum, ortum habens ab eo, quod soleant homines mentiri. Itaque qui verum dixerit, videtque sibi creditum non esse, ne non seriò dixisse videatur, jurat per quem, si jurare omnino necesse esset, jurare debet, Deum. Horum impunitatem cum videant ingenia quaedam luxurantia, Deum in membra dividentes more Anthropomorphitarum,[aq] per singula jurare coeperunt, nonnullam ex novitate juramentorum laudem aucupantes, atque inde verba illa, per Corpus, per Vngues, per Capillos, Blasphema simul & Haeretica. CHAPTER 3

On some Objections to Leviathan

A In the year of our Lord 1651 a certain book was published, written in English, with the title Leviathan. It has four parts: the first on the nature of man, and on natural laws; the second on the nature of the commonwealth, and the right of the sovereign power; the third on the Christian commonwealth; and the fourth on the kingdom of darkness. In each of these parts there are some teachings contrary to received opinion, in both philosophy and theology; and there are so many things said against the power of the Roman pontiffs over other princes, that it may easily appear that the author considered that the cause of the civil war which was being waged at that time throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland was nothing other than the quarrelling, first between the Roman Church and the Anglican, and then within the Anglican Church between the Episcopalian and Presbyterian pastors, about theological issues. That civil war began in Scotland in 1639, but was lulled to sleep on the spot by certain royal concessions (one of which was the removal of episcopal power from the kingdom of Scotland);[a] but in 1640, at the urging of the English Presybterians, it was quickly revived. There was at that time an ecclesiastical government that was administered, on the strength of royal letters patent, by bishops.[b] Parliament was also sitting, and it was almost entirely Presbyterian; for the Presbyterian faction far surpassed the Episcopalian faction in power and popularity. So in the following year the King was also forced, in order to placate Parliament, to remove the bishops from all extraordinary ecclesiastical government.[c] When this was done, there no longer remained any power in England to try heresies; all kinds of sects appeared, of people writing and publishing whatever theology anyone wanted. The author of the book I have mentioned was then living in Paris, making use of the ordinary right to write freely. And he did indeed champion with distinction the rights of the King in both temporal and spiritual matters. But when he tried to do this on the basis of the Holy Scriptures he fell into unheard-of doctrines, which have been charged with heresy and atheism by very many theologians.

[a] After the Treaty (or 'Pacification') of Berwick (18 /28 June 1639), Charles I sent John Stewart, Earl of Traquair, to Edinburgh as his commissioner; Traquair agreed the Act of the General Assembly there which rendered episcopal government of the Church unlawful.

CAPVT III.

De quibusdam Objectionibus contra Leviathan.

A. Prodiit anno Domini 1651 Liber quidam Anglico Sermone scriptus, cui Titulus est Leviathan, cujus quatuor sunt partes, Prima de Natura hominis, & Legibus Naturalibus. Secunda de Natura Civitatis, & Iure Potestatis summae. Tertia de Republica Christiana. Quarta de Regno Tenebrarum. Insunt in singulis partibus Paradoxa quaedam tum Philosophica, tum Theologica; & ita multa contra Potestatem Romanorum Pontificum in alios Principes, ut facile appareat Authorem existimasse causam Belli Civilis quod eo tempore per Angliam, Scotiam, & Hyberniam gerebatur aliam non fuisse quam dissensionem, primò inter Ecclesiam Romanam & Anglicanam, deinde in Ecclesia Anglicana inter Pastores Episcopales & Presbyterianos, circa quaestiones Theologicas. Bellum illud Civile incepit in Scotia anno 1639, sed concessionibus quibusdam Regiis (quarum una erat sublatio potestatis Episcopalis è Regno Scotiae)[a] illico sopitum est; sed citò, instigantibus Presbyterianis Anglicis anno 1640 resuscitatum. Erat eo tempore Regimen Ecclesiasticum administratum virtute Literarum Regiarum per Episcopos.[b] Sedebat etiam Parlamentum, totum ferè Presbyterianum. Factio enim Presbyteriana Factionem Episcopalem potentia & favore populi longè superabat. Itaque anno proximo coactus est Rex, quo Parlamentum placaret, Episcopos etiam à Regimine omni Ecclesiastico extraordinario removere.[c] Quo facto, nulla amplius potestas remansit inter Anglos cognoscendi Haereses, sed omnimodae Sectae apparuerunt scribentium & publicantium qualem quisque voluit Theologiam. [360] Iam Parisiis degebat Author dicti libri, vulgata jam libertate scribendi utens. Et jura quidem Regis tum in Temporalibus tum in Spiritualibus egregiè vindicavit. Caeterùm dum hoc ex Scripturis Sacris conatur facere, in dogmata lapsus est inaudita, quae à plerisque Theologis Haereseos & Atheismi accusata sunt.

B What are those doctrines?

A What do you think of this statement towards the end of Chapter 2: 'The opinion people have about walking ghosts has been taught deliberately (I think), or not confuted, in order to maintain people's high regard for exorcisms, signs of the cross, holy water, and other arts of the clergy'?[d]

B It would certainly seem true, wise, and Christian to me, unless you proved the contrary from Holy Scripture. Indeed, I read in Matt. 27: 52 that when Christ was dying on the cross, dead bodies were raised from their graves – but not souls.[e]

A Then, near the beginning of Chapter 4 he denies that there are any incorporeal substances.[f] What is this if not to deny that God exists, or to assert that God is a body?

B He does indeed assert that God is a body. But Tertullian asserted the same thing before him. For in his dispute against Apelles and other heretics of his time, who taught that our Saviour Jesus Christ was not a body but a phantasm, he uttered this general statement: 'Whatever is not a body is not an entity.' And again, against Praxeas: 'Every substance is a body of its own kind.'[g] And this doctrine was not condemned in any of the first four general councils.[h] Show me the expression 'incorporeal' or 'immaterial', if you can, in the Scriptures. But I will show you that 'in Christ dwelleth all the fullness of the Godhead bodily',[i] that is (as Athanasius expounds it), 'divinely'.[j] 'In God we all move and have our being.'[k] These are the words of the Apostle. Now, we all possess quantity. Can that which is quantitative exist in that which is not quantitative? 'God is great',[l] but greatness without a body is impossible to understand. Nor, even, did the Council of Nicaea determine that God

[d] See above, Ch. 2, p. 34. Here and in all subsequent quotations from Leviathan, Hobbes gives a Latin version that differs from the version previously given, and also paraphrases (and/or abbreviates) his original text rather freely. The English translations given here are made afresh from his Latin, though incorporating words or phrases from his original English where possible.

[f] See above, Ch. 4, p. 60.

[g] See above, Ch. 46, note w; the first quotation here seems to be a version of the quotation given there, and the second quotation here is close to the statement immediately preceding that in Tertullian's text, 'Everything that exists is a body of its own kind' ('Omne quod est, corpus est sui generis'). Hobbes has perhaps confused that statement with one in Tertullian's Adversus Praxeam, ch. 7: 'For who will deny that God is a body, even though God is a spirit? For spirit is a body, of its own kind and in its own form' ('Quis enim negabit Deum corpus esse, etsi Deus spiritus est? Spiritus enim corpus sui generis in sua effigie': PL ii, col. 162).

B. Quaenam sunt illa Dogmata?

A. Quid tibi videtur oratio haec cap. 2. versus finem; Opinionem hominum de Spiritibus mortuorum ambulantibus, de industria (puto) traditam fuisse, aut non confutatam, ad sustentandam existimationem Exorcismorum, Signi Crucis, Aquae benedictae, aliarumque artium Cleri.[d]

B. Mihi quidem vera, prudens, & Christiana videbitur, nisi contrarium evincas ex Scriptura Sacra. Equidem lego Matth. 27. vers. 52. Christo in Cruce moriente corpora mortua è Sepulchris excitata esse, non autem animas.[e]

A. Deinde, cap. 4. sub initium negat substantias ullas esse incorporeas.[f] Quid aliud est hoc quam negare Deum esse, vel affirmare Deum esse Corpus?

B. Affirmat quidem Deum esse Corpus. Sed ante eum idem affirmavit Tertullianus. Disputans enim contra Apellem, aliosque sui temporis haereticos, qui Salvatorem nostrum Iesum Christum non Corpus, sed Phantasma esse docuerunt, dictum hoc universale pronuntiavit, Quicquid Corpus non est, non est Ens. Item contra Praxeam, Omnis Substantia est Corpus sui generis.[g] Neque in ullo ex quatuor Conciliis primis generalibus[h] doctrina haec condemnata est. Ostende si potes vocem incorporeum vel immateriale in Scripturis. Ego vero ostendam tibi plenitudinem divinitatis habitare in Christo corporaliter,[i] id est (ut exponit Athanasius) Dealiter.[j] Omnes sumus & movemur in Deo.[k] Sunt verba Apostoli. Quantitatem autem habemus omnes. An quantum inesse potest in non quanto? Magnus est Deus,[l] sed magnitudinem intelligere sine corpore impossibile est. Ne à Concilio Niceno quidem definitum [h] See above, Appendix, Ch. 2, note r. [i] Col. 2: 9 (Vulg (approx); AV (approx)).

[j] Hobbes cites a treatise attributed (dubiously) to Athanasius (or, alternatively, to the 5th-century bishop Vigilius of Tapsus), De trinitate libri XII, which, commenting on Col. 2: 9, describes Christ as 'him in whom all the fullness of the godhead dwells bodily, that is, so to speak, divinely' ('in quo omnis plenitudo divinitatis corporaliter habitat, id est, ut sic dicatur, dealiter': PL lxii, col. 253, where 'dealiter' (apparently an adverb from 'deus', 'god') is a word unknown in classical Latin, and possibly coined for the occasion – or, perhaps, a scribal error for 'realiter', 'really').

was incorporeal. However, the Fathers who were there (whether all of them, I do not know) were of that opinion; and Constantine himself approved the term ὁμούσιος, meaning 'co-essential', because he thought it followed from that term that God was incorporeal.[m] Nevertheless, they did not want to introduce into the Creed that term 'incorporeal', which is not in Holy Scripture. Nor, indeed, can it be inferred from the term 'co-essential' (although essence is not body) that God is incorporeal. David's father and Obed's son were co-essential, being one and the same person, Jesse;[n] does it follow from that that David's father and Jesse were incorporeal? Besides, the intention of the Fathers of the Council of Nicaea was to condemn, by that Creed, not only Arianism but also all the heresies that had crept into the Church after the death of our Lord, of which one was the heresy of the Anthropomorphites, who attributed to God the parts of the human body;[o] but they did not intend to condemn those who had written, like Tertullian, that a true, real, and pure spirit is corporeal. Those who attribute purity to God are indeed right to do so: for it does him honour. But it is dangerous to attribute to him tenuousness, as that is one of the steps on the way to nothingness. John Damascene, in his exposition of the Nicene Creed, says in book 1, chapter 13: 'Some of the names of God are negative, signifying that which is above substance, such as ἀνούσιος (without essence), ἄχρονος (without time), ἄναρχος (without beginning), not because he is inferior to these [categories], but because he is raised above them all. For God is not among the number of entities, but above them all.'[p] You see that John Damascene, who was (as can be seen from his work on dialectic) an Aristotelian philosopher,[q] as well being a Father of the Church and a pious Doctor, fearing to say with Tertullian that God is a body, and preferring to attenuate[r] that bodily density which he thinks (I do not know why) unworthy of God, falls into atheistic expressions, saying that God is ἀνούσιος, and not one of the things that exist.

[m] This claim is perhaps derived from a passage in Eusebius' letter to his diocese (see above, Appendix, Ch. 2, note ad), saying that Constantine did not take the term ὁμοούσιος (or ὁμούσιος) in a physical sense, as he believed that it was impossible for a nature which was incorporeal to have bodily qualities (PG lxvii, col. 72). On Constantine see above, Ch. 42, note a.

[q] The first section of John Damascene's major work The Fountain of Wisdom (of which the third section is the Exposition of the Orthodox Faith), known as the Philosophical Chapters or Dialectic, makes much use of Aristotelian terminology (PG xciv, cols. 525–676).

[r] The translation here follows the Latin, where the dative construction ('attenuando') suggests that 'studet' means 'being favourable towards', 'preferring'; possibly 'attenuando' is an error for 'attenuare', in which case the translation would be 'being eager' or 'being anxious'.

est Deum esse incorporeum. Patres autem qui aderant (nescio an omnes) ita senserunt; & ipse Constantinus vocem illam Ὁμούσιον, id est, coëssentialem ideo comprobavit, quod ex ea voce videretur illi sequi Deum esse incorporeum.[m] Nihilominus vocem illam incorporeum, quae non est in Scriptura Sacra, in Symbolum inferre noluerunt. Neque vero ex voce coëssentialis (quanquam Essentia corpus non sit) inferri potest Dei incorporeitas. Pater Davidis, & Filius Obedi, cum fuerit unus & idem Iesseus, erant coëssentiales;[n] sequiturne inde Patrem Davidis & Iesseum fuisse incorporeos? Praeterea Patribus Concilii Niceni in animo erat condemnare per illud Symbolum non [361] modo Arrianismum, sed etiam Haereses omnes, quae post mortem Domini in Ecclesiam irrepserant, quarum una erat Anthropomorphitarum, qui Deo corporis humani membra attribuerant,[o] non autem condemnare eos, qui verum, realem & purum Spiritum, Corporeum esse cum Tertulliano scripserant. Illi quidem, qui Deo puritatem tribuunt rectè faciunt; est enim honorificum. Sed tenuitatem attribuere, quae gradus quidam est ad nihilitatem, periculosum est. Iohannes Damascenus exponens Fidem Nicenam lib. 1, cap. 13: Divinorum nominum (inquit) alia negativa sunt, significantia id quod est supra substantiam, ut ἀνούσιος (id est sine Essentia) ἄχρονος, sine tempore, ἄναρχος, *sine principio, non quod his inferior sit, sed quod supra haec omnia elatus sit. Damascenum Philosophum Aristotelicum (ut videre est ex opere ejus Dialectico)[q] eundemque Patrem Ecclesiae & Doctorem pium, dum metuit dicere cum Tertulliano Deum esse Corpus, & studet crassitudinem corpoream attenuando,[r] quam (nescio quare) Deo indignam putat, in verba Athea incidere, dicentem Deum ἀνούσιον esse, & nihil eorum quae sunt.

A By ἀνούσιος he meant (I think) nothing other than 'uncreated'.

B Perhaps. But what need was there, after he had said enough about that attribute 'uncreated' a few lines earlier,[s] to say the same thing again using that unacceptable term ἀνούσιος? In short, since he knew that every spirit, however tenuous, is nevertheless a body, what substance or real entity could he imagine to make it seem that incorporeal substance exists, apart from idols or phantasms of the sort that we see in mirrors, dreams, and darkness, which the Apostle Paul describes as 'nothing'?[t]

A Thirdly, towards the end of Chapter 6 he says: 'Fear of powers invisible, whether those powers are feigned by the person fearing, or imagined from tales publicly allowed, is religion; from those not allowed, superstition. And when the powers feared are truly such, it is true religion.'[u]

B Ecclesiastes says the same: 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.'[v] And so does the Psalmist: 'The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God.'[w]

A Fourthly, in Chapter 16: 'The person of even the true God was borne, first by Moses, when he ruled not his own but God's people, saying, "Thus said the Lord." Secondly by the Son, who came into the world to bring back the Jews and bring all peoples into the heavenly kingdom. Thirdly, by the Holy Spirit, which was sent to sanctify the people of God.'[x]

B It seems that in this passage the author wanted to explain the doctrine of the Trinity, although he does not name the Trinity. His purpose was pious, but the explanation is mistaken. For he seems to make Moses a person in the Trinity, on the grounds that he too did in some way bear the person of God (as do all Christian kings). This was gross carelessness. If he had said that God created the world in his own person, redeemed mankind in the person of the Son, and sanctified the Church in the person of the Holy Spirit, he would not have said anything other than what is in the catechism published by the Church.[y] Or if he had said that God established a Church for himself (through the ministry of Moses) in his own person, redeemed that Church in the person of the Son, and sanctified it in the person of the Holy Spirit, he would not have been in error.[z]

A. Per ἀνούσιον nihil ille (credo) significare voluit praeter Increatum.

B. Fortasse. Quid autem opus erat, postquam paucis antè versibus de Attributo illo Increatum satis locutus esset,[s] rursus idem dicere per nomen illud non ferendum ἀνούσιος? Cum denique sciret Spiritum omnem utcunque tenuem, esse tamen Corpus, quam Substantiam sive Ens reale potuit ille sibi fingere, quod Substantia videretur esse Incorporea, praeter Idola seu Phantasmata qualia videmus in speculis, in somno, in tenebris, & quae Paulus Apostolus dicit esse Nihil?[t]

A. Tertiò. Cap. 6, versus finem, Timor (inquit) Potentiarum Invisibilium, sive Potentiae illae fictae sint à timente, sive conceptae à Fabulis publicè permissis, Religio est. A non publicè permissis Superstitio est. Quando verò potentiae quae timentur verae sunt, vera Religio.[u]

B. Idem hoc dicitur ab Ecclesiaste, Timor Domini est initium sapientiae;[v] & à Psalmista, Stultus in corde suo dixit, Non est Deus.[w]

A. Quartò. Cap. 16, Etiam Dei veri personam gerebat primo Moses cum regeret populum non suum, sed Dei, dicendo hoc dicit Dominus. Secundo Filius, qui venit in mundum ad reducendos Iudaeos, & inducendos omnes populos in regnum coeleste. Tertio Spiritus Sanctus qui missus est ad sanctificandum Dei populum.[x]

B. Videtur Author voluisse hoc loco doctrinam explicare Trinitatis, [362] quanquam Trinitatem non nominat. Pia voluntas, sed erronea est explicatio. Nam Mosem, quoniam is quoque aliquo modo gessit Personam Dei (ut faciunt omnes Reges Christiani) unam videtur facere Personam in Trinitate. Valdè hoc negligenter. Si dixisset Deum in Persona propria creâsse mundum; in Persona Filii redemisse genus humanum; in Persona Spiritus Sancti sanctificasse Ecclesiam, nihil aliud dixisset nisi quod est in Catechismo ab Ecclesia edito.[y] Vel si dixisset Deum in Persona propria constituisse sibi (ministrante Mose) Ecclesiam; in Persona Filii eandem redemisse; in Persona Spiritus Sancti eandem sanctificâsse, non errasset.[z]

A But he repeats the same thing in several passages.

B But in each one of those passages it can easily be emended.

A In Chapter 34 he says it is impossible to prove from the canon of the Old Testament that angels are real and permanent substances, but that they are supernatural phantasms, which are called angels (because God uses them to declare his will).[aa]

B It is certain that 'angel' is the name of a function, and that because of the transparent nature of spiritual substance no spirits can be seen, except in the sense in which phantasms are said to be seen in a mirror, sleep, and darkness. So whenever someone is said in the Holy Scriptures to have seen an angel, that vision is not the human sense-perception which takes place through the eyes, but the sort that Jacob had, while he slept, when he saw angels ascending and descending on a ladder.[ab] The Sadducees denied that angels were substances.[ac] Why? Not because they did not believe in the Old Testament, but because there is no mention of the creation of angels in the Old Testament. Nevertheless they were not excommunicated by the Jews. Does he also say that it is impossible to prove from the New Testament that angels are substances?

A He does not say that; but if they are, he says that it can thence be proved that they are corporeal substances.

B This is not contrary to the received opinion of any of the ancient Fathers, nor to that of any of the Doctors of the reformed Churches; nor is it condemned by the Church of England.

A In Chapter 38 he says that the human soul is immortal not by its own nature, that is, by its very creation, but rather by the grace of God when he offered Adam and Eve the fruit of the tree of life, so long as they did not taste of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. But when they had violated God's commandment about eating the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, and were then excluded from approaching the tree of life, they became mortal, both they and their descendants; dying, they have remained dead, until, thanks to the remission of their sins by the death of Christ, they will come to life again, to live eternally, at the general resurrection of the dead. But according to this doctrine, no souls of the dead whatsoever will have an immortal existence if they were wicked, and the souls of the just will have no immortal existence before the day of judgement.[ad]

A. Sed idem repetit in pluribus locis.

B. Sed in unoquoque loco facile emendari potest.

A. Cap. 34. Negat probari posse ex Canone Veteris Testamenti, Angelos reales & permanentes substantias esse, sed Phantasmata supernaturalia; quae (quia illis Deus utitur ad voluntatem suam declarandam) appellantur Angeli.[aa]

B. Certum est Angelum nomen esse Officii, Spiritusque omnes propter diaphanitatem substantiae spiritalis invisibiles esse, nisi eo sensu, quo videri dicuntur Phantasmata in Speculo, Somno, vel Tenebris. Itaque quoties aliquis dicitur in Scripturis Sacris vidisse Angelum, Visio illa non est Sensio humana quae fit per oculos, sed qualem habuit Iacob, cum videret Angelos ascendentes & descendentes per scalam, cum dormiret.[ab] Sadducaei negabant Angelos esse Substantias.[ac] Quare? Non quod non crederent Testamento Veteri, sed quia creationis Angelorum in Veteri Testamento nulla est mentio. Neque tamen à Iudaeis excommunicati sunt. An etiam negat probari posse Angelos Substantias esse ex Testamento Novo?

A. Non negat; sed si sunt, probari inde posse dicit Substantias corporeas esse.

B. Hoc neque antiquis Patribus omnibus, neque Doctoribus omnibus Ecclesiarum Reformatarum Paradoxum est, neque ab Ecclesia Anglicana condemnatur.

A. Cap. 38. Animam humanam sua natura, id est ab ipsa creatione immortalem esse negat, sed gratia Dei praebentis Adamo & Evae fructum Arboris Vitae, dum non gustarent de fructu Arboris Scientiae Boni & Mali. Quando autem praeceptum Dei de esu fructus Arboris Scientiae Boni & Mali transgressi erant, tunc exclusi aditu ad Arborem Vitae, facti sunt mortales, & ipsi & eorum posteritas; morientesque mortui manserunt, donec per mortem Christi remissis peccatis, [363] reviviscant ad vitam aeternam in Resurrectione mortuorum generali. Sed juxta hanc doctrinam animae mortuorum nullae omnino existent immortales impiorum, nec piorum ante diem Iudicii.[ad]

B I have just now explained my opinion about this, at sufficient length.[ae] But I add that I do not understand how someone can be said to sin against the Christian faith when he professes belief in eternal life, whether he regards it as having been received by creation or by redemption. Nor do I understand how it can be against Christian doctrine or Christian worship, given that that expression 'immortal soul' is not found anywhere in Holy Scripture (which contains the doctrine) or in the liturgy (which contains the worship). But 'eternal life through Christ' is very frequently found.

A In the same chapter he says that the Kingdom of God will be after the resurrection, on earth.[af]

B Does he say this on the basis of his own philosophy, or from Holy Scripture?

A He adduces some passages from the prophets Isaiah, Obadiah, and Joel, which I myself have not sufficiently understood, as well as what is said by St Peter about the conflagration and renovation of this world.

B Then add to those the passage, which is clearer, from Rev. 5: 9–11:[ag] 'The four beasts and one hundred and twenty-four elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of incense, which are the prayers of saints. And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation; And hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth.'[ah] What is clearer than that?

A In the same chapter he says that the punishment of the reprobate will also be on earth, and not eternal.[ai]

B Undoubtedly, if the reprobate are to be destroyed by the saints militant, they will be destroyed on earth; nor indeed [will they be punished] eternally, if it is true that they will die the second death.

[ah] Hobbes appears to quote here from memory; he follows AV (approx), but with the strange error of 'one hundred and twenty-four' for 'twenty-four'. His Latin is apparently his own version, following neither Vulg nor Beza, and possibly influenced by a memory of the Greek ('thuris', from 'thus', 'incense', differs from the terms used by Vulg and Beza, but is closer to the Greek θυμιαμάτων, from θυμίαμα, 'incense'). Neque quomodo contra doctrinam vel cultum Christianum esse possit, cum neque in Scriptura Sacra (quae doctrinam) neque in Liturgia (quae cultum Christianum continet) inveniatur usquam vox illa immortalis anima; sed vita aeterna per Christum frequentissimè.

A. Eodem capite, punitionem Reproborum in Terra quoque fore dicit, nec aeternam.[ai]

B. Dubitandum non est, quin si Reprobi à Sanctis Militantibus destruendi sint, destruentur super terram; neque quidem aeternè, si verum sit morituros esse mortem secundam.

A In Chapter 39 he defines the Church as follows: 'A Church is a number of men professing the Christian religion, united in one sovereign person, at whose command they ought to assemble, and without whose authority they ought not to assemble.'[aj] It follows from this definition that in the time of the heathen emperors neither the Council of the Apostles nor any other council of Christians before Nicaea was lawful.

B Under the heathen emperors there were sometimes meetings, that is, synods, of Christians. But by 'Church' he understands a synod with the authority to make decrees, and whose decrees it was unjust to disobey. Now, such synods cannot exist without sovereign power.

A In Chapter 43,[ak] in reference to John 1: 1, 14: 'The Word was with God', and 'The Word was made flesh', he says that 'the Word' means the same as 'the promise', and 'the promise' the same as 'the thing promised', that is, Jesus Christ, as in Psalm 105: 19; Gen. 40: 13;[al] and other similar passages.

B Why not? For do you think that it was this term 'word' that was made flesh, or the thing signified by the word? What is the meaning of those words of the same Apostle in Rev. 13: 8, 'The Lamb slain from the foundation of the world'? Could he have been slain before he was made flesh? Does it not follow from that that both the incarnation and the passion of the Lord, which occurred in time, were nevertheless from the foundation of the world? How can this be, except in the eternal decree of the Father? And what else is that decree but the thing decreed? Is not the Holy Spirit also called, in the same way, the promise of the Father (Luke 24: 43)?[am] 'I send' (Christ says) 'the promise of my Father upon you.'

A In Chapter 42, to the question, 'What if one of the faithful is commanded by his lawful prince to deny Christ?',[an] he replies that it is lawful to obey, after the example of Naaman the Syrian, to whom the Prophet said, 'Go in peace.' These words seem to me to be not a permission, but a way of saying goodbye.

[al] Hobbes has misread his own text here: he had cited Gen. 40: 13 (which does not use the term 'word') only to elucidate the reference to Joseph in Ps. 105: 19 (which does). [am] Correctly: Luke 24: 49.
[an] See above, Ch. 42, p. 784.

A. Cap. 39. Definit Ecclesiam hoc modo, Ecclesia est hominum numerus profitentium Religionem Christianam, unitorum in Persona una Suprema, cujus jussu convenire debent, & sine cujus Authoritate convenire non debent.[aj] Ex qua Definitione sequitur, quod tempore Imperatorum Ethnicorum, neque Concilium Apostolorum, neque aliud Christianorum Concilium ante Nicenum, erat licitum.

B. Conventiones, id est Synodi fuere aliquot Christianorum sub Imperatoribus Ethnicis. Sed per Ecclesiam intelligit Synodum cum Authoritate decernendi, & cujus Decretis non obtemperare injustum erat. Tales autem Synodi sine summa Potestate existere non possunt. [364]

A. Cap. 43.[ak] Ubi dicitur (Iohan. 1. 1. & 14.) Verbum erat apud Deum, & Verbum factum est Caro; Verbum dicit idem significare quod Promissio, & Promissionem idem quod Res promissa, id est Iesum Christum, ut Psalm. 105. 19, & Genes. 40. 13.[al] aliisque locis similibus.

B. Quidni? Nam vocem hanc Verbum, an rem Verbo significatam, Carnem factam esse putas? Quid significant illa verba ejusdem Apostoli Apocal. 13. 8: Agnus occisus à fundatione mundi? Potuitne occidi antequam incarnaretur? Nonne sequitur inde, tum Incarnationem tum Passionem Domini, quae in tempore erant, fuisse tamen à fundatione mundi? Qui potest hoc esse aliter, quam in Decreto aeterno Patris? Quod Decretum, quid aliud est, quam res Decreta? Nonne eodem modo etiam Spiritus Sanctus dicitur (Luc. 24. 43.)[am] Promissio Patris? Ego (dicit Christus) mittam in vos Promissionem Patris mei.

A. Cap. 42. Ad quaestionem, Quid si quis Fidelis à Principe suo legitimo jubeatur negare Christum?[an] Respondet licitum esse obedire, exemplo Naamani Syri, cui dictum est à Propheta, Vade in Pace. Quae verba non mihi videntur Permissio, sed formula valedictionis.

B Perhaps so, if he had give him some other answer, either approving or disapproving; but in this passage those words cannot be understood in any way other than as a permission. You know that there were very many Christians, a little before the Synod of Nicaea, not very brave, but good nonetheless, who renounced the Christian faith when they were presented with death and torture. What punishments do you think that General Synod of Nicaea imposed on such people? Among the canons of that synod, the nineteenth decrees that 'those who did this when not faced with torture or danger' should revert to being catechumens.[ao] But about those who became renegades when threatened with death it makes no decree. However, I do not deny that it was a sin in an Apostle or Disciple, who had taken upon himself to preach the doctrine of Christ among Christ's enemies – and a great sin in Peter,[ap] though one of weakness, and easily forgiven by Christ.

A In the same chapter he asserts that it is lawful for Christian kings to administer the sacraments.[aq]

B Almost all ministers of the Church of England in the first year of Queen Elizabeth thought the same as him. For as soon as the Queen had reclaimed for herself the supremacy over the Church, she issued certain orders throughout all the dioceses, which she called injunctions. One of them was that all the clergy should acknowledge, with an oath, that the supremacy over the Church belonged by right to the Queen and her successors. However, there were many who refused to take the oath, on the grounds that (as they themselves said) that concession would involve conceding that the Queen could administer the sacraments, if she wished. From this it is evident that those clergymen believed that whoever had the supremacy over the Church would also be allowed to administer, as often as he wished, all those things that are usually administered by priests. Howbeit, to remove this scruple, the Queen replied that she had never intended to take upon herself any other administration or power than what her father Henry and her brother Edward had exercised. And with this answer she neither derogated from that power for her male successors, nor claimed it for herself, knowing that it was forbidden for women to speak in church.[ar]

B. Ita fortasse, si aliquid aliud illi vel approbando vel improbando respondisset; at in hoc loco aliter quam pro Permissione intelligi non possunt. Scis permultos fuisse Christianos, paulò ante Synodum Nicenam, bonos quidem, sed non fortissimos, qui morte & tormentis ostentatis, Fidei Christianae renuntiaverunt. Quas putas poenas in tales statuisse Nicenam illam Synodum generalem? In Canonibus illius Synodi decimus nonus est, quo statuitur eos, qui citra tormenta & periculum id facerent, redire debere ad Catechumenos.[ao] At de illis, qui negarent intentata morte nihil statuitur. Non tamen nego quin in Apostolo vel Discipulo, qui doctrinam Christi praedicare inter Christi hostes in se receperat, Peccatum id esset, & in Petro magnum,[ap] sed infirmitatis, & à Christo facile condonatum.

A. Eodem capite affirmat licitum esse Regibus Christianis administrare Sacramenta.[aq]

B. Omnes ferè Ministri Ecclesiae Anglicanae anno primo Reginae Elizabethae idem senserunt cum illo. Simul enim ac Regina Suprematum Ecclesiae sibi vendicasset, emisit Mandata quaedam, per omnes Dioeceses, quae Mandata appellavit Injunctiones. Quarum una erat, ut Clerici omnes cum Iuramento recognoscerent Ecclesiae Suprematum jure pertinere ad Reginam & Successores suos. Multi autem [365] erant, qui jurare noluerunt, hanc (ut ipsi dicebant) ob causam, quod eo concesso, unà conceditur Reginam si velit posse administrare Sacramenta. Manifestum hinc est, Clerum illum credidisse, in quocunque resideret Ecclesiae Suprematus, eidem quoque licere quoties vult, ea omnia administrare, quae à Sacerdotibus administrari solent. Caeterum ad tollendum scrupulum hunc rescripsit Regina, nunquam sibi in animo fuisse aliam sibi administrationem aut Potestatem assumere, quàm qua usi sunt Pater ejus Henricus & frater Eduardus. Atque hoc rescripto nec Successoribus suis Masculis Potestatem illam derogavit, nec sibi arrogavit; sciens prohibitum esse foeminis loqui in Ecclesiis.[ar]

[ao] Hobbes's reference to the 19th canon is erroneous; he apparently refers to the 11th, though his quotation is very approximate (the 11th canon states that those who have lapsed 'without compulsion' shall be reduced first to the status of 'auditors', then to the status of 'prostrators': the former was below, and the latter was similar to, that of catechumens).

[ar] Hobbes recapitulates here the account he gave in the Latin version of Ch. 42 (see above, pp. 864–5, and the references given there).

A The whole of Chapter 43 is taken up with proving that for a penitent sinner no other faith is necessary for salvation than that which is contained in this one article, 'Jesus is the Christ.'

B Many things are contained in that article, such as that Jesus is the Son of God, King of the Jews, and restorer of the Kingdom of God. The Gospel, too, has no other purpose (as the Apostle John testifies: John 20: 31) than to let us know 'that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God'.[as] In addition, the same Apostle says (1 John 4: 2), 'Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus is the Christ, and that he is come in the flesh, is of God'.[at] Likewise, there are many other passages similar to this one in the New Testament.

A But on the other side of the argument is what we read at the end of the Athanasian Creed, namely this: 'This is the Catholic Faith, which except a man believe as a certainty, he cannot be saved.'[au]

B Do you oppose the words of Athanasius to the Holy Scripture, and to the words of an Apostle? His creed is indeed accepted by the Church as an exposition or paraphrase of the Nicene Creed, but these words of Athanasius form no part of that Creed.

A There are also several other teachings contrary to received opinion in the same book, but as they are too unimportant to delay us now, I shall not mention them.

B As you please. But in those you have mentioned I find nothing contrary to the Faith of our Church, although there are several that go beyond [or: refute] the teaching of private theologians.

THE END.

[as] Hobbes adds 'living' ('viventis'), perhaps under the influence of Matt. 16: 16; John 6: 69.

[at] Hobbes alters the wording from 'confesseth that Jesus Christ is come', which corresponds to the versions found in the Greek, Vulg, and Beza.

[au] Hobbes apparently cites from memory: the version in the Book of Common Prayer is 'which except a man believe faithfully, he cannot be saved'; the Latin of the Creed is 'nisi quisque fideliter firmiterque crediderit, salvus esse non poterit' ('unless each person believes faithfully and firmly, he will not be able to be saved').

A. Caput 43 totum in eo consumitur, ut probet peccatori poenitenti Fidem aliam ad Salutem necessariam non esse quam quae continetur in hoc uno Articulo Iesum esse Christum.

B. In illo Articulo multa continentur, ut Iesum esse Filium Dei, Regem Iudaeorum, Restauratorem Regni Dei. Etiam Scopus Euangelii alius non est, ut testatur Iohannes Apostolus Cap. 20, vers. 31, quàm ut sciamus Iesum esse Christum Filium Dei viventis.[as] Praeterea dicit idem Apostolus 1 Iohan. 4. 2, Omnis Spiritus qui confitetur Iesum esse Christum & venisse in Carne, ex Deo est.[at] Multa item alia loca sunt in Testamento novo hujus similia.

A. Sed contra est quod legitur in fine Symboli Athanasii, nempe hoc, Haec est Fides Catholica, quam nisi quis pro certo credat salvari non potest.[au]

B. Tune Sacrae Scripturae, & verbis Apostoli oppones verba Athanasii? Cujus Symbolum recipitur quidem ab Ecclesia, ut Expositio vel Paraphrasis Symboli Niceni, sed haec verba Athanasii nulla sunt pars illius Symboli.

A. Sunt & alia Paradoxa non pauca in eodem libro, sed quia minoris sunt quam ut illis nunc immoraremur non proferam.

B. Ut libet. Sed in his quae protulisti nihil invenio contra Fidem Ecclesiae nostrae, quamquam non pauca doctrinam Theologorum privatorum superantia.

REGISTER OF LITERAL FAULTS (ENGLISH)

The literal faults listed below, which appear in all copies of the Head edition, have been corrected in this edition; the corrected form is given here before the lemma. Note that literal faults which were corrected in the Errata to the Head edition are not listed here; all Errata corrections have been incorporated in this edition, and the uncorrected faults recorded in the textual apparatus. Deciding what must be treated as a literal fault is a matter of judgement, to be made in the light of general norms of seventeenth-century orthography. Many forms which may surprise modern readers (e.g., battel, beleife, Divel, enforme, hetherto, retrive, wel) would have been acceptable to seventeenth-century ones. Note that the following spellings in particular were permissible in seventeenth-century English, and have not been treated as literals: Democraty, goverment, interessed, terrestiall. Incorrect Greek accents and breathings are listed here; but where the typesetters of the Head edition followed the early-modern convention of placing a breathing and/or accent on the first letter of a diphthong, this has been silently changed.

AMBIGUOUS END-OF-LINE HYPHENATIONS (ENGLISH)

This list records ambiguous end-of-line hyphenations in the Head edition; the form before the lemma is the one adopted in this edition. Where possible, the decision has been made on the basis of other (non-ambiguous) occurrences of the same word in the copy-text. In the absence of such occurrences, it has been made on the basis of the form given in the MS. Note that the word 'Common-wealth' is normally hyphenated in the copy-text; instances of it are not included in this list or the following lists.

46	23	Schoole-men] Schoole-men	with hyphen, pp. 60, 96, etc.

REGISTER OF LITERAL FAULTS (LATIN)

The literal faults listed below, which appear in all copies of the 1668 edition, have been corrected in this edition; the corrected form is given here before the lemma. Note, however, that literal faults which were corrected in the Errata to the 1668 edition are not listed here; all Errata corrections have been incorporated in the present edition, and the uncorrected faults recorded in the textual apparatus. The following spellings, non-standard or unacceptable in classical Latin, have not been treated as literals, as they were acceptable in early modern Latin: aquisierint; carta; coemiteriis; commisserit; connectionem; demonia; demoniaci; difficilimum (etc.); dissentionis; dissertè (etc.); duodecem; facilimum; fideijussores; heresis; humilimè; oportunitas (etc.); paena; parlamenti; penitentiam; phenomeni; preconis; presentibus; pretensio; preventio; promisserant; quantuncunque; quarundem; representare (etc.); representativa (etc.); scolastici; substrahere; thesaurius; tranquilitatem. Incorrect Greek accents and breathings are listed here; but where the typesetters of the 1668 edition followed the early-modern convention of placing a breathing and/or accent on the first letter of a diphthong, this has been silently changed.

GENERAL INDEX

Note: all names are ordered by the first element of the name that bears a capital letter. Books of the Bible (and the named authors of passages quoted from the Bible) are listed here only where they are subjects of discussion in Hobbes's text; otherwise, see the Index of Biblical Citations. The following abbreviations are used: 'NT': New Testament'; 'OT': Old Testament; 'RC': Roman Catholic; 'TH': Thomas Hobbes. At the end of the index there is a listing of those Greek terms of which the index does not contain an English or Latin version.
